

THE STORY OF THE
CHURCH OF EGYPT

BEING AN OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF
THE EGYPTIANS UNDER THEIR SUCCESSIVE MASTERS
FROM THE ROMAN CONQUEST UNTIL NOW

BY

E. L. BUTCHER

AUTHOR OF 'A STRANGE JOURNEY' 'A BLACK JEWEL' ETC.

'Him that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father and before His angels. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches'

IN TWO VOLUMES — VOL. I

LONDON
SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE

1897

[All rights reserved]

DT94
B983
.v.1

186124

FRANKLIN ROYCE

TO MY BROTHER ERNEST

WITHOUT WHOSE SELF-DENYING KINDNESS I SHOULD NEVER HAVE SEEN THE LAND OF EGYPT

AND TO MY BROTHER GEORGE

WHO DIED AT HIS POST IN EGYPT AND WHOSE BODY RESTS IN A GRAVEYARD OF THESE FORGOTTEN CHRISTIANS

THIS BOOK IS DEDICATED

P R E F A C E

THE aim which I have set myself in writing the following pages is a very humble one—to collect together in a readable fashion and in moderate compass all that the researches of scholars and historians have yet been able to discover about that remnant of the ancient Egyptian people popularly called the Copts, from the date of their first acceptance of Christianity until the present day. During the whole of that time their history is inextricably interwoven with that of the successive masters—Roman, Byzantine, Arab, Kurd, Circassian, and Turk—who have verily made the land of Egypt a house of bondage for her own children. There are many now who have discovered that the true descendants of the ancient Egyptians are Christians, not Mohammedans, and who would like to know something about them without the laborious search among dictionaries and translations which, to me, has been a labour of love.

These, indeed, are my only qualifications for the task—a love of my subject and a residence of some twenty years in the land of Egypt, which enables me to go about in the little-known villages where the ancient Christianity of Egypt still holds its own, listening to legends and tales of ancient glories, which were more often than I expected confirmed by search among the scanty records available. I have taken great pains to be accurate, particularly in my dates;¹ but no doubt scholars will find much to criticise. If this book instigates one of them to write the history as it should be written, my attempts will be even more valuable than I have hoped.

viii THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

I had drawn out for my own guidance a Chronological Table—containing the name of every over-lord, whether Emperor or Kaliph; the name of every Vizier or local Sultan; the name of every Patriarch of the National Church; and the name of every Patriarch of the Greek (or Melkite) Church—in four parallel columns, with the date of their accession to power attached. But it seemed too much in the nature of scaffolding to publish with the book, since many of the names were of no interest whatever to the general reader. I have therefore prefixed only the list of Patriarchs.

Certain periods in the first four centuries of Egyptian history have been exhaustively treated from a theological point of view, which is not mine; but there are many who will be glad to know what even I can tell them about the 1900 years which lie between the Ptolemaic Egypt and the political Egypt of to-day.

¹ The supposed necessity for placing a date at the head of every page in a book of history has made my work more difficult. Often the events related in the page can not be accurately dated to a year or two; therefore no date except those in the text must be depended upon.

There is one point to which I should like to call attention. With one imperfect exception, of the seventh century, all the available books on the history of the Church of Egypt, as may be seen by the following list, have been written by men alien in race or hostile in creed—generally both. I would beg my readers to consider how the history of any Western Church would read if the only books upon the subject were written by men of another nationality, openly hostile or indifferent. I have not, to my knowledge, suppressed one disgraceful fact about an Egyptian Pope as recorded by these historians; ¹ yet I do not think the record of the Egyptian Church will be found to compare badly with the proudest of her Western sisters. Let us not forget, in our loyalty to our own Church, that the Church Catholic is above and includes all National Churches, all true Christians, irrespective of race or organisation. For as in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither bond nor free, though the distinctions remain; so in Christ there is neither Greek nor Roman, English nor Egyptian, for we have all come into the kingdom of our Father.

It is true that the Church of Egypt has one chronicle of her own, written by several hands and extending over a period of three centuries. It was begun in the latter half of the tenth century by Severus, Bishop of

¹ On the other hand, respect for the decencies of literature has many times compelled me to present an unduly favourable account of the Moslem governors.

Ashmounayn (Hermopolis Magna), and continued by Michael, Bishop of Tanis, and many others down to the year 1243. But, so far as I know, only one perfect copy of this valuable book is in existence, and that is in the library at Paris. It has never been translated or published in any European language.

The following list of authorities has been included for the convenience of those who may wish to study the subject for themselves. It may be observed that, except for one or two works dealing specially with the Copts, no books which have been published during the last fifty years have been included in the list. Most of us have read the more important recent works, and in any case their titles are easily obtained.

My best thanks are due to those who have kindly helped me in the preparation of this book—especially to Marcus Bey Simaika, who has rendered me most valuable assistance; to Professor Vollers, of the Khedivial library; and to my husband, who has helped me through all the difficulties of my undertaking with unwearied patience, and to whom I am entirely indebted for my index.

E. L. BUTCHER.

CHURCH HOUSE, CAIRO:

St. Peter's Day, 1897.

LIST OF AUTHORITIES

CONSULTED IN THE PREPARATION OF THIS BOOK

	CENTURY
Eusebius, 'Ecclesiastical History'	4th
Socrates	5th
Sozomen	5th
Theodoret	5th
Evagrius	6th
Cosmas (Indicopleustes), 'Topographie Chrétienne'	6th
John of Nikius's Chronicle	7th
Masoudi, 'Histoire Universelle'	12th
Abu Salih, 'Churches of Egypt'	13th
Makrizi, 'History of the Copts'	14th
Shamse-ed-din, 'Histoire d'Égypte'	16th
Memoirs of M. de Maillet	17th
Yusef Abu Dakn, 'History of the Coptic Church'	17th
Renaudot, 'Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum'	18th
Digeon, 'Histoire Chronologique'	18th
Richard Pococke, 'Observations on Egypt'	18th
Ockley, 'History of the Saracens'	18th
Gibbon, 'Decline and Fall'	18th
Sonnini's Travels	18th
Bruce's Travels	18th
Sharpe, 'History of Egypt,' vol. ii.	19th
Neale, 'Patriarchate of Alexandria'	19th
Stanley, Lectures on Eastern Church	19th
Mommsen, 'History of Rome'	19th
Bright, 'History of the Church, 315-431'	19th
Roberts and Donaldson, 'Ante-Nicene Library'	19th
Marcel, 'Égypte Moderne'	19th
Ryme, 'La Domination Arabe'	19th
'Égypte Française'; and various other Publications of the French Institute, in many volumes	19th

xii THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

	CENTURY
Amelineau, Translations of ancient Coptic MSS. (in Vatican and Louvre)	19th
Amelineau, 'La Géographie de l'Égypte Copte'	19th
Letronne, 'Mémoires sur l'Égypte'	19th
Quatremère, 'Mémoires sur l'Égypte'	19th
'Histoire des Sultans Mamlouks'	19th
'Chrestomathie Arabe'	19th
Hyvernat, 'Martyrs of Egypt'	19th
Lane, 'Modern Egyptians'	19th
Paton, 'Egyptian Revolution'	19th
Gabbarti, 'History of Egypt'	19th
'Dictionary of Christian Biography'	19th
Malan's Translations	19th
Butler, 'Coptic Churches'	19th
Lord Dufferin's Report, 1883	19th
Lord Cromer's Report, 1896	19th

LIST OF PATRIARCHS OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

	A.D.		A.D.
1. St. Mark, or Marcus I.	? 45	82. Timothy III.	520
2. Annianus	62	83. Theodosius I.	536
3. Abilius	82	84. Peter IV.	568
4. Cerdo	95	85. Damian	570
5. Primus	106	86. Anastasius	? 603
6. Justus	118	87. Andronicus	614
7. Eumenius	129	88. Benjamin I.	620
8. Marcion	141	89. Agatho	659
9. Celadion	152	40. John III.	677
10. Agrippinus	166	41. Isaac	686
11. Julian	178	42. Simon I.	689
12. Demetrius I.	188	43. Alexander II.	703
13. Heraclas	232	44. Cosmas I.	? 726
14. Dionysius	246	45. Theodore	727
15. Maximus	264	46. Michael I.	743
16. Theonas	282	47. Mennas I.	767
17. Peter I.	300	48. John IV.	? 776
18. Achilles	311	49. Marcus II.	799
19. Alexander I.	313	50. Jacob	? 819
20. Athanasius I.	326	51. Simon II.	? 836
21. Peter II.	373	52. Joseph	? 837
22. Timothy I.	380	53. Michael II.	849
23. Theophilus	384	54. Cosmas II.	851
24. Cyril I.	412	55. Shenouda I.	859
25. Dioscorus I.	444	56. Michael III.	? 869
26. Timothy II.	457	57. Gabriel I.	910
27. Peter III.	477	58. Cosmas III.	921
28. Athanasius II.	490	59. Macarius I.	933
29. John I.	497	60. Theophanuis	953
30. John II.	507	61. Mennas II.	956
31. Dioscorus II.	517	62. Ephraem	975

xiv THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

	A.D.		A.D.
63. Philotheus . . .	? 979	89. John XI. . . .	1427
64. Zacharias . . .	1004	90. Matthew II. . .	1453
65. Shenouda II. . .	1032	91. Gabriel VI. . .	1467
66. Christodulos . .	1047	92. Michael VI. . .	1475
67. Cyril II. . . .	1078	93. John XII. . . .	1481
68. Michael IV. . . .	1092	94. John XIII. . . .	1521
69. Macarius II. . .	1102	95. Gabriel VII. . .	1526
70. Gabriel II. . . .	1131	96. John XIV. . . .	1570
71. Michael V. ¹ . . .	1145	97. Gabriel VIII. . .	1585
72. John V.	1146	98. Marcus V. . . .	1602
73. Marcus III. . . .	1166	99. John XV.	1619
74. John VI.	1189	100. Matthew III. . .	1629
75. Cyril III.	1235	101. Marcus VI. . . .	1646
76. Athanasius III. .	1250	102. Matthew IV. . .	1660
77. Gabriel III. . . .	1269	103. John XVI. . . .	1676
78. John VII.	1271	104. Peter VI.	1718
79. Theodosius II. . .	1294	105. John XVII. . . .	1727
80. John VIII.	1311	106. Marcus VII. . . .	1745
81. John IX.	1321	107. John XVIII. . . .	1770
82. Benjamin II. . . .	1327	108. Marcus VIII. . .	1797
83. Peter V.	1340	109. Peter VII.	1809
84. Marcus IV.	1348	110. Cyril IV.	1854
85. John X.	1363	111. Demetrius II. . .	1862
86. Gabriel IV.	1371	112. Cyril V. (present Patri- arch)	1875
87. Matthew I.	1375
88. Gabriel V.	1409

¹ In the most recent list at the Patriarchate, Michael V. is entered as Mikhail I., and all the first four Michaels under the name of Khail. Both names are forms of Michael, though the Copts now use them as separate names. As I have in this list given the English forms of all the names, I thought it more consistent to render both Khail and Mikhail by Michael.

CONTENTS

OF

THE FIRST VOLUME

PART I

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. THE COMING OF CÆSAR	1
II. THE COMING OF CHRIST	12
III. THE PREACHING OF MARK	19
IV. ONE PATRIARCH AND SEVEN EMPERORS	27
V. NILE TOURISTS IN THE SECOND CENTURY	85
VI. THE FIRST THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE	42
VII. ORIGEN	49
VIII. THE PERSECUTION OF DECIUS	73
IX. THE PERSECUTION OF VALERIAN	90
X. ST. AMMON AND ST. ANTHONY	104
XI. A STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM	111
XII. THE ERA OF MARTYRS	121
XIII. THE ARIAN CONTROVERSY	139
XIV. HERESY AND SCHISM	148
XV. GREGORY AND GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA	165
XVI. THE RETURN AND DEATH OF ATHANASIUS	182
XVII. THE SUICIDE OF THE EGYPTIAN NATION	191
XVIII. THE LAST ARIAN BISHOP OF ALEXANDRIA	200

XVI THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

CHAPTER	PAGE
XIX. THE FALL OF SERAPIS	211
XX. THE TALL BROTHERS	228
XXI. SYNESIUS OF CYRENE	287
XXII. SHENOUDA OF AKHMIN, AND OTHERS	260
XXIII. CYRIL THE GREAT	278
XXIV. RIVAL POPES	288
XXV. THE COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON	291
XXVI. THE VALUE OF A GREEK PREPOSITION	801
XXVII. A REIGN OF PEACE	814
XXVIII. THE BEGINNING OF THE END	822
XXIX. THE REVOLT OF THE BROTHERS	885
XXX. THE PERSIAN CONQUEST	840
XXXI. THE ACT OF UNION	849
XXXII. THE ARAB CONQUEST	854

PART II

I. THE NEW MASTERS	871
II. THE SOUDAN EXPEDITION	877
III. ABD EL AZIZ	888
IV. THE TYRANNY OF TWELVE EMIRS	895
V. REVOLT OF THE COPTS AND FALL OF THE OMMYIAD DYNASTY	405
VI. THE OPPRESSION OF THE ABBASIDE DYNASTY	420
VII. THE LAST GREAT REVOLT OF THE COPTS	480
VIII. THE EMBASSY OF GEORGE OF NUBIA	440
IX. AHMED EBN TOULOUN	449
X. THE ADVENTURES OF EL OMARI	461
XI. THE NEW CITY AND MOSQUE OF EBN TOULOUN	470
XII. THE DYNASTY OF EL IKSHID	488

19

THE STORY

OF

THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

PART I

CHAPTER I

THE COMING OF CÆSAR

B.C. 30 IN the life of a nation which counts its age by centuries and not by years, whose greatest temple, still to be seen in its desolation, took more than two thousand years to build, and near two thousand more to go to ruin, a single century may seem of small account. Yet within the brief compass of a hundred years, Egypt received three visitors whose coming changed the whole course of her national life for many centuries. One of them is honoured through all worlds, another through all Egypt, to this day. Between 30 B.C. and 60 A.D., Egypt witnessed the coming of Cæsar, the coming of Christ, the coming of Mark.

The Cæsar under whom the Roman Empire enclosed in its fatal embrace the ancient land of Egypt, was that same Cæsar Augustus of whom we read in the New Testament that he 'made a decree that all the world should be taxed.' In the year 30 B.C. he laid his iron grip on Egypt, and called her a Roman Province, though the Romans, unlike the Greeks who had preceded them, were from first to last an alien race in the land; despised and detested, yet feared. Nor, to speak accurately, did Egypt ever become in the true sense a Roman province. It was rather a private appanage of the reigning emperor, and no senator was permitted to enter it. In this chapter a brief sketch will be given of the condition of Egypt at the time of the Roman conquest, and just before the introduction of Christianity.

The inhabitants of the country were divided, roughly speaking, into three classes—Greeks, Jews, and Egyptians; though the latter had still an immense numerical preponderance. Now the total number of the Copts, that is, of Egyptians of unmixed blood, in their own country, is less than the number of the Jews who were settled within her borders at the time of the Roman conquest. For the influx of Greeks and Jews during the previous centuries had been so large that they formed, as it were, two distinct foreign nations settled in the country, speaking their own language and living under their own laws.

In spite of having been born and bred for many successive generations on Egyptian soil, the Greeks still regarded themselves as colonists and conquerors, and held their allegiance to their recently acquired Roman emperors very lightly. They had lost the warrior spirit of their ancient race, and their interests were now entirely commercial and intellectual. They lived in their own cities, which in many cases were little more than fortified trading posts, retained their rights as free citizens, laughed at their Roman rulers, and seem generally to have submitted to the yoke because it was the readiest way to secure ease and wealth. Three Roman legions and nine cohorts were found enough to keep the whole Egyptian kingdom in subjection. The principal city of the Greeks was Alexandria—the Paris of the ancient world; while Ptolemais, the only other city in Egypt which was under Greek laws, was, at the time of the Roman conquest, the largest city in the Thebaid, not much smaller than the purely Egyptian city of Memphis. Heliopolis, the ancient university of Egypt, where the wisest men of ancient Greece had gladly come to study, was already a deserted city; where one or two ruined houses were pointed out as those in which Plato and his compatriots had lived. Babylon, the key of the south, had risen greatly in importance since its foundation in the early days of the Persian conquests, and was enlarged and strongly fortified by the Romans. Naucratis, one of the earliest Greek settlements, still contained a university of some note, whose schools were not finally closed till the end of the second century.

Thebes and Abydos had sunk into the position of villages. Cyrene (Kiruan) a Greek colony, which for more than two hundred years had been subject to Egypt, and reckoned as part of that country, maintained its position as a university and great trading city till the end of the fourth century.

Each of the three nations, Greek, Jew, and Egyptian, still held to their own religion, but the two latter far more strongly than the Greeks, who by this time were practically atheists, and thought as little of their gods as of their emperors. Ptolemy Soter had made an attempt to find a common object of worship for his Greek and Egyptian subjects, and had built the great temple of Serapis in Alexandria, to receive a colossus from Sinope, in Paphlygonia, which was recognised by both Greeks and Egyptians as the god of Hades. The Greeks called him Pluto, the Egyptians Asar-Api (Osiris concealed), but before a century had elapsed the god was known only by a contraction of the latter name—Serapis. This, however, was the only common ground between the Greeks and Egyptians, and it was not until after the introduction of Christianity that the worship of Serapis made any way in the country outside Alexandria.

The ancient religion of the Egyptians had long since given place to a mere animal worship; the spiritual and moral elements, which had so deeply influenced the kings and sages of the earlier centuries, had died out of it, or lingered only in forms of the grossest superstition. The beasts and birds, which originally were in all probability only the badges of the different nomes, like the crests of medieval towns and families, were now openly worshipped as gods, and were the causes of¹ fierce rivalries which occasionally broke out in civil war between the different districts. It was this which so greatly contributed to the disintegration of the nation, and rendered it incapable of combination even against a foreign foe. At Memphis the bull Apis reigned supreme, at Ombos the crocodile; at Oxyrynchon a particular Nile fish was worshipped; at Assiut, the wolf; at Cynopolis, the dog; the list is too long to continue. No doubt many of the priests and the upper classes still believed in the one Triune God, Author of all good, of Whom all their deities were but so many manifestations; but they despised the ignorant masses too much to interfere with the jealous championship of beast or bird which had taken the place of religion among them. They had a proverb which showed that some Egyptians, at any rate, still rated the outward observances of their religion as nothing compared to the right faith of a righteous life. 'White linen and a tonsure,' said they, 'will not make a follower of Isis.'

¹ See Juvenal, Sat. 15, 35.

A certain form of spiritualism, which generally seems to accompany a low state of faith, was much practised by the Egyptians. They undertook, either directly or indirectly—and for money—to recall the spirits of the dead and make them answer any questions that might be put to them. Ventriloquism, an art which had always been known in Egypt, was at this time often abused for similar purposes.

The Egyptians had recently been again allowed to coin money, and, for some centuries from the reign of Claudius Cæsar, the series of Egyptian coins is almost unbroken, and of great value to the historian. The porphyry quarries and the emerald mines, which afterwards fell into such total disuse that their very existence was denied, and only rediscovered in our own times, were now in full work, though entirely by slave and convict labour. The Egyptian chemists, dyers, paper, silk, and glass manufacturers were still celebrated throughout the whole civilised world; and their fertile plains, from the first decade of the Roman conquest, were made to supply their foreign masters with enormous yearly shipments of corn. Already eight kinds of paper were made in Egypt, and in the reign of Claudius a ninth kind was produced which was named in his honour. Linen, cotton, and wine were also produced in large quantities, though the quality of the latter was generally considered inferior to the wines of Greece and Italy. A great deal of beer was made and drunk, and this continues to be the case to the present day, though the vine has gone almost entirely out of cultivation, owing to reasons which will appear in the course of the narrative.

The state of the Soudan, which, under the Pharaohs, and at one time under the Ptolemies, had contained some of the most important provinces of the empire, was now such that no trade came down the Nile to Assouan (Syene); but the products of Southern Africa were brought by coasting vessels to Berenice. The Roman rule was never really acknowledged south of Wady Halfa, and their southern frontier was often far short of that. In the reign of Augustus Cæsar, Candace, Queen of Ethiopia, sent an army of thirty thousand men to invade Egypt, and they overthrew the Roman cohorts at Elephantine, Syene, and Philæ, but were driven back afterwards by Gallus, who made himself temporarily master of the Ethiopian capital, Napata.¹

It is computed that at the time of the Roman conquest there must have been about a million of Jews in Egypt. A steady stream of emigration from Palestine had been going on for centuries, since the time when John ebn Kareah, in spite of the protests of the prophet Jeremiah, took the remnant of Judah, and Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch the son of Neriah, and brought them into the land of Egypt, to Tahpanhes, and to Migdol, and Noph, and the country of Pathros.² In Egypt many troubles came upon them as Jeremiah had foretold, but this did not seem to check their immigration; for, about three hundred years afterwards, when the ancient Egyptian empire had been taken by the Persians, who in their turn had given place to the Greeks, we find no less than 120,000 given as the number of Jews in Egypt, whom Ptolemy Philadelphus redeemed from slavery at his own cost. These had come into Egypt against their will, many of them being taken in the wars between his father and the king of Syria; but there were great numbers of free settlers who had been attracted by the prosperity and good government of Egypt, so that the 120,000 freed slaves do not by any means represent the whole Jewish population, even in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus.

¹ Between the third and fourth Cataracts.

² Jeremiah xl.-xliv.

In the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, Onias, the son of the high priest, took refuge in Egypt, and obtained leave from the king to build the afterwards celebrated temple of Onion 'at Leontopolis, in the nome of Heliopolis, which is named from the country Bubastis.' This temple formed a new and very powerful attraction to the Jews, and at the time of the Roman conquest the great bulk of the Jewish population lived in the nome of Heliopolis, or in the city of Alexandria, where two wards, out of the five into which the city was divided, were entirely given up to them.

These two foreign nations, the Greeks and the Jews, possessed the rights of citizenship which were still denied to the unfortunate Egyptians in their own country. They were allowed their own magistrates and courts of justice, and though, on the occupation of the country by Augustus Cæsar, the Greeks of Alexandria at once petitioned him to take away the rights of citizenship from the Jews and restrict them only to Greeks and Romans, he very properly refused to do so. At the same time he could not help the low esteem in which the Jews were held by the Greeks and the native Egyptians, nor enforce those rights of the Jews which the Greeks habitually ignored.

In the reign of Caligula, Alexandria was one long scene of riot between the Jews and the Greeks. The latter gratified their hatred of the Jews by taking upon themselves to apply that decree of Caligula, which ordered the erection of his own statue for worship in every temple of the empire, to the Jewish synagogues; and to enforce it by constant fighting. The Roman prefect Flaccus sided with the Greeks, and a fierce persecution of the Jews was the result. The Jewish king Agrippa happened to come to Alexandria at that time, and his earnest representations induced Caligula to recall the prefect, and consent to receive a deputation from both Greeks and Jews. At the head of the Jewish embassy was the celebrated Philo, the most learned man in Alexandria, and at the head of the Greeks, Apion, who ranked as a Greek citizen because of his descent, though he had been born and bred in Egypt. The Greeks had the wit to confine themselves to one charge against the Jews—that they had refused to worship the statue of Caligula—and as the Jews could not deny this, the emperor refused to hear anything that they had to say. Fortunately Caligula died shortly after, and under the rule of Claudius the Greeks and Jews kept a hollow peace.

It must have been galling to the Greeks to feel that the despised Jews had in great measure achieved supremacy over them on their own ground. The chief Alexandrian scholars and writers were Greeks no longer. The schools of Alexandria, though of far less repute than they had been under the Ptolemies, or than they afterwards became under the Christians, were still renowned throughout the civilised world, but the names of their great philosophers were Hebrew. The chief glory of the Alexandrian school in the first century was the Jewish Philo.

The family of Philo held a very high social and financial position in the city of Alexandria. Philo himself was born shortly after the Roman conquest, in Egypt, and the great firm to which he belonged appears to have attached itself from the first to the fortunes of the victorious emperors. Philo's brother, Alexander, who seems to have been the head of the firm in which Philo himself was probably never more than a sleeping partner, was appointed Alabarch, and entrusted with the affairs of Antonia, the sister-in-law of Tiberius. He lent great sums of money to the Jewish king Agrippa, and eventually married two of his sons to the daughters of that king. Another of his sons, named Tiberius Alexander, forsook the religion of his fathers, and was subsequently made governor of Egypt.

In this busy money-making life Philo took no part. He devoted his whole time to religious, philosophic, and literary labours. When circumstances obliged him for a time to mingle in the politics of the city, and to come forward in the defence of his oppressed countrymen, he did not shrink from his duty, but left on record his regret at being drawn from his beloved studies, and from solitude, into this troublesome sea. In his old age he was apparently in the habit of retiring at intervals to share for a time in the life of that community of Therapeutæ of which he has left so striking a picture in his De Vita contemplativa.

The beginning of the degradation of Alexandria dates from the vicious reigns of the later Ptolemies ; but had the Roman emperors reverted to the wise policy of the three first kings of that race, the city would soon have recovered itself, instead of which its downfall was accelerated by the change of masters. Augustus even made a deliberate attempt to ruin the place by building a new capital, called Nicopolis, about three miles to the east ; to which he forcibly removed the public sacrifices and the priesthood of Alexandria. But nature and the Greeks were too strong for him, and the new capital was left to go to ruin before it was fairly built. And, in spite of the Roman conquest, Alexandria was still, at the beginning of our era and for some time afterwards, the greatest city in the world, not excepting Rome or Athens. Our modern guide-books have a map which gives a good idea of the extent of the ancient city, as compared with the shrunken town which now bears that celebrated name. The palaces and temples of Alexandria in the year 1, covered a fourth part of its whole space. Its two harbours held more ships than any other port in the world could show ; its export trade was reckoned as greater than that of all Italy. The Museum had been rebuilt since the soldiers of Julius Cæsar set fire to it, and in the reign of Claudius Cæsar another was built which was called after his name. A new palace was built by and for the Roman Cæsars, commonly called the Cæsareum, while the great fortress-temple of Serapis held a library which was later reckoned at 700,000 volumes, full of the ancient wisdom of the Egyptians. As the Greeks had their Museum, and the Egyptians their Temple library, so the Jews prided themselves on their great central synagogue, built in the shape of a basilica, an object of pride alike to the Jews of Egypt and of Palestine.

Such, in very brief outline, was the country and the people over whom the Roman emperor came to reign. Little he knew that before his death another King should enter Egypt under whose sway Greek, Roman, Jew, and Egyptian, should alike fall, and whose name should be known in all ages and in all lands where his own power had never penetrated.

CHAPTER II

THE COMING OF CHRIST

Anno Domini IN a certain gallery in London there is a celebrated picture, which most of us have seen, called Anno Domini. It represents a not uncommon scene in the Egypt of that year, a gorgeous procession of the Egyptian gods. The singers go before, the minstrels follow after; in the midst are the damsels playing on the timbrels; and in the place of supremest honour is borne the goddess, Isis, with Horus upon her knee. The sick are brought by their friends to the wayside to receive strength and healing as the gods pass. Little images of them are sold as charms to ward off evil from the purchaser. But in the centre of the canvas a very humble cavalcade meets and makes way for the grand procession of the gods: a tired donkey bearing a woman and child, while the peasant husband trudges alongside. Those ancient gods are lost and forgotten, their temples are lonely ruins; but that child's name is honoured now in every quarter of the globe: Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world.

There is nothing at all improbable in such an incident as we see here represented. Joseph would naturally bring his wife and child from Bethlehem by the route across the desert into Egypt by way of Kantara, and make from thence to Heliopolis on his way to Babylon, where he seems to have eventually settled for the time during which they remained in Egypt. The great Jewish temple of Onion was still standing, a little to the north-east, but they do not seem to have lingered there—probably Joseph had relations or friends settled in Babylon. In almost every place through which they passed the Egyptian legends tell us of miracles of healing performed by the touch of the unconscious infant. Most of the ancient apocryphal gospels also relate the falling down of the idols of Heliopolis when the child was brought into the temple. A certain spring of pure water is still shown at Matarieh, a village just south of Heliopolis, in which, so a very early tradition tells us, Mary washed her infant's clothes as they rested by the wayside on their last day's journey. Then they pressed on to Babylon, where their long wanderings came to an end for the time.

The Egyptian Babylon has suffered an undeserved eclipse in the shadow of the earlier and better known city of the same name in Asia; so much so that there are even now many cultivated Europeans who have never heard of it, and Dean Farrar, writing not many years ago, could refer to it briefly in a footnote as 'an obscure town in north Africa,' whose claims to a visit from St. Peter did not call for a moment's serious consideration! A careful study of the earlier writers, before the thick darkness of the Mohammedan dominion well-nigh blotted out Egypt from the view of Europe, leads to quite a different conclusion.¹

¹ It should be noticed that even during the Mohammedan times, whenever a European crusade or war lets sudden light upon Egypt it is always the Sultan of Babylon that the chroniclers speak of, and not of Memphis or Cairo.

There are several accounts given of the origin of the Egyptian Babylon. Diodorus refers to it in the reign of Rameses II. (Sesostris), and says that the Babylonians whom he had taken in war, and reduced to slavery, at length rebelled, and occupying the port of Ha-ben-ben,¹ a strong position on the river opposite and slightly north of Memphis, maintained a successful war with the surrounding country till Rameses pardoned them, and turned them into peaceful subjects by permitting them to retain possession of the site on which they were camped, as a colony. Here they built a town, which they called, after the capital of their own country, Babylon.²

John of Nikius, writing in the seventh century of our era, says, in speaking of the fortress which Trajan built at Babylon in Egypt :

An earlier fortress had been built here by Nebuchadnezzar, which he called the fortress of Babylon. It was at the time when he had become king in Egypt, when, after the destruction of Jerusalem, he had exiled the Jews, and they had stoned at Thebes in Egypt the prophet of the Lord ; committing sin upon sin. Nebuchadnezzar had then come to Egypt with a numerous army, had conquered the country because the Jews had revolted against him (sic), and called the fortress by the name of his own town Babylon.³

It was of course this earlier fortress which Strabo mentions, when he describes his visit to Egypt just after the Roman conquest of that country. Trajan's fortress, the ruined wall of which is still standing, was built a few hundred yards to the north of the earlier one, about 100–117 A.D.

¹ Professor Sayce calls the fortress Kri-Ahu—most ancient Egyptian towns had a double name.

² The description of the Egyptian Babylon in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography is incorrect, i.e. it puts Babylon North of Fostat.

³ Jeremiah xlv. 13-27.

There are some curious local traditions concerning the ancient settlement of the Jews in Babylon of Egypt. One synagogue still exists whose history goes back through several rebuildings, on the same site, to the time of our Lord. Tradition takes it further back still, to the days of Jeremiah. Makrizi, in his Egyptian archæology, has the following note on this synagogue :

The synagogue of the Syrians is found in the precincts of Kasr el Shamr (i.e. the Castle of the Candle, or Beacon, at Old Cairo¹). It is old ; on the door is an ancient wooden carving in Hebrew, stating that it was built in the year 336 of the era of Alexander, that is to say, about 45 years before the second destruction of the sanctuary of Jerusalem by Titus, or about 600 years before the Hegira.² In that synagogue you find a copy of the Thoreh, concerning which they all agree that it was written wholly by the prophet Ezra.

Up to fifteen years ago this roll of the law mentioned by Makrizi still remained in a sacred hiding-place in the same synagogue, with a curse on anyone who should presume to disturb it. Through the treachery of some Jew its existence then became known to the Gentiles. In the absence of its lawful guardians, and in spite of the curses and threats of the woman left in charge, two zealous antiquarians found their way into the synagogue, broke open the sacred hiding-place, and tried to open the roll. But during the ages of its solitude and darkness a serpent—whose empty skin was found—had made its way through a crack in the wood, and nested in the hiding-place. The edges of the roll were all stuck together with the discharge from the serpent, and the two scholars found that without proper appliances they could not open the roll unless they tore it to pieces. They saw enough to satisfy them that it was of extreme antiquity, and departed, intending to return and make an exhaustive examination. But on visiting the synagogue for the third time they found that the guardians of the roll had taken alarm, and removed it into a new and safer hiding-place in Cairo city. They have substituted a comparatively modern copy, which they now show to visitors as the original. Not long afterwards the old synagogue was pulled down, and a new one built on the same site. Through all the changes of the place, however, a certain tomb has been carefully preserved in the body of the synagogue which the Jews declare contains the body of the prophet Jeremiah.

¹ Old Cairo is the name which has in modern times been given to the town which sprung up on the ruins of the ancient Babylon after its almost total destruction by fire in the twelfth century. Trajan's wall, and the Christian and Jewish town which it then enclosed and still encloses, are all that remain of Babylon now.

² Makrizi doubtless copied the date on the door correctly—336 of Alexander ; but it will be seen that his own calculations are very vague. The destruction of Jerusalem by Titus was 69–70 A.D. ; the Hegira 622.

In any case, it is clear from numerous indications that there was a Jewish colony here before and at the time of our Lord's birth; and that the Jews attached special value to this particular site in the Egyptian Babylon. The bulk of the colony became Christian at an early date, and the synagogue was turned into a church. At the time of the split between the Greek and Egyptian Churches in 451 A.D., this church was one of those left in the hands of the Greek or Melkite party. As the power of that party declined, however, the church fell into disuse and partial ruin. In this state it was suffered to pass into the hands of the Egyptians; and this was the 'ruined Melkite church' in which Michael III. took refuge, when, in the latter half of the ninth century, he was given, by the Mohammedan governor, four months to collect an enormous ransom from his church on penalty of death for himself and persecution for the church.

In the Patriarch's extremity, the Jews of Babylon, who greatly desired the ruined site, saw their opportunity. They offered to buy it of Michael, and the bargain was struck. The money went to swell the required ransom, and the Jews have ever since retained possession of the site and tomb, which, whether it be Jeremiah's or no, they unquestionably regard with great veneration.

Not far from this synagogue, and also within the walls of the Roman fortress, there is a church, which is almost the only one in the country that tourists are taken to see, for the sake of the old tradition connected with it. The church now above ground is dedicated to Anbar¹ or Abu Sergeh, and was not built till after the desertion of the fortress by the Byzantine garrison in the seventh century—probably not till the eighth century. But on the original level of the ground, which has risen very considerably since the fortress was built, is a tiny church of great antiquity, which is now merely a crypt of the upper church. Tradition says that this earlier church was built in the apostolic age to mark the spot where stood the house in which our Lord and his parents dwelt during their sojourn in Babylon. The present coating of the walls, and the tiny pillars which now support the roof, are probably of much later date, but for all that, the spot may fairly claim to be the oldest, and possibly the smallest, church in existence. Both the west and east ends are blocked up, so that its actual length cannot be determined; but the present length is about twenty feet, and the breadth fifteen feet. The baptistery in the south aisle is still used, and the ignorant Copts who now guard this extremely interesting spot occupy the minds of the tourists with ridiculous stories about the sleeping arrangements of Joseph and Mary. The little chapel is dedicated to Sitti Miriam (My Lady Mary¹).

¹ Anbar is old Egyptian for father. It became Apa in later Coptic, and now the Arabic Abu has generally taken its place. The prefix Mar, still used for Coptic saints, is of Chaldean origin, and means Lord—Mari—my Lord. The church is really dedicated to St. Sergius and St. Bacchus, fellow-soldiers and martyrs. But Bacchus, being the name of a heathen god, is never spoken.

In the days of our Lord, this spot was almost on the river bank, and the massive wall, now falling into ruins about it, had not yet been built. It was the Jewish quarter of Babylon, and there is no reason to doubt the tradition which brings Joseph and Mary to settle there during the greater part of their stay in Egypt—a period, the length of which is variously estimated by Western and Eastern controversialists. Some reduce it to six months, others extend it from two to four or even six years.

¹ The prefix Saint is not used in Egypt. For female saints the ordinary word for lady, Sitt or Sitti (my lady), is now in common use as a prefix to the name.

CHAPTER III

THE PREACHING OF MARK

A.D. 45 IT is admitted on all hands that the founder of the Church of Egypt was the Evangelist St. Mark, though the exact year in which he made his first visit to Egypt cannot be stated with any certainty. He seems to have been accompanied as far as Babylon by St. Peter, whose first General Epistle is dated from that city. Absolute proof, indeed, cannot be given that the Babylon of the Epistle is the Babylon of Egypt, and many attempts have been made by Western writers to prove that the city referred to is the ancient Babylon of Assyria, or else a metaphor signifying Rome. But it is fair to say that the balance of evidence is in favour of the more natural supposition that St. Peter wrote from an important and well-known town, largely inhabited by Jews, in the country where his Master had taken refuge, and not from a deserted city outside the confines of the Roman Empire, in a country with no particular claim on him. Nor is there any ground for the assumption that St. Peter, like the mystical author of the Apocalypse, used Babylon as a synonym for Rome. But, even in the early centuries of Christianity, little was known in the Western Churches of the Egyptian Babylon¹;

¹ Even in so recent and careful a work as Smith's Dictionary of Christian Biography I have found mention made of Babylon without any in the ecclesiastical world Egypt was represented by the city of Alexandria. So entirely did the ecclesiastical writers of the West lose all knowledge of Babylon, among other cities of Egypt, after the separation in 451, that all notices of the Egyptian Babylon found in earlier Christian writers were referred without hesitation to the Asiatic Babylon; and, on such mistaken references, the very arguments which seem conclusive in favour of the earlier city were sometimes based.

Mark himself, according to Egyptian tradition, was a native of Pentapolis,¹ which, since the days of Ptolemy I., had been an outlying province of Egypt on its extreme north-west frontier. He belonged to a wealthy family, which was ruined by an invasion of nomad tribes, either before Mark's birth or while he was yet a child. His father, Christobulus, who was brother-in-law to Barnabas, migrated to Palestine and settled near Jerusalem. Peter became connected with the family by marriage, and Mark was early instructed in the Christian faith. His first visit to Egypt was probably in the year 45 A.D.,² and it hint given that the Egyptian Babylon was meant. Indeed, I think the writer of the article must himself have been under the impression that Jerome, from whom he quotes, was writing about Babylon in Assyria. Yet a reference to the context in Jerome would have proved beyond question that he was speaking of Babylon in Egypt. He says that Hilarion left Bethlehem with '40 monks who could march without food till sunset. On the fifth day he came to Pelusium, then to the camp (Scenæ Veteranorum) to see Dracontius, and then to Babylon to see Philo.'—Exiled Bishops.

¹ This district included five old Greek colonies: Cyrene (Kirwan), Ptolemais (Barca), Arsinoe (Teucheira), Berenice (Hesperides), and Apollonia. The name Pentapolis was given to it in consequence. It remained a province of Egypt for some centuries after the Roman Conquest.

² Eusebius gives the second year of Claudius as the date of Mark's was on this occasion that he may have been accompanied by St. Peter. Like most travellers in that age, they came by the caravan route across the desert from Syria, and through Heliopolis to Babylon. After a sojourn here they separated; and Peter went back into Palestine by the way that he came, sending Mark to Alexandria and Pentapolis. It is not unlikely that a good deal of the Gospel of St. Mark was written during this stay at Babylon with Peter, for the use of Mark in the evangelisation of Egypt.

Tradition says that Mark's first convert in Alexandria was one Annianus,¹ a shoemaker by trade. Those of us who know the Egyptian shoe bazaars—cool, dark interiors, relieved by long festoons of red and yellow shoes, with narrow divans where the picturesque workers chat leisurely with the passers-by—will find no difficulty in imaging the scene of Mark's first preaching, and his subsequent discussions with the shoe merchants. It is said that he wrought a miracle on Annianus—probably cured him of some disease which had been considered hopeless.² Annianus, in his gratitude, invited the stranger to stay in his house, and finally embraced Christianity. His example was followed by others, and when Mark returned to Palestine—which must have been before the end of the year 49, probably earlier—he consecrated Annianus as first bishop of the new church, with three priests and seven deacons as assistants.

first visit to Alexandria—i.e. about 43 A.D. The Chronicon Alexandrinum places it in 40. The year 45, however, seems to fit better with the events recorded in the Acts of the Apostles.

¹ The spelling of this name varies in the different authorities.

² The Oriental expression of a very simple fact would often give the impression to a credulous person that a miracle had been wrought, without intention to deceive on the part of the narrator.

In the year 50 we find both Peter and Mark in Palestine, on the occasion of the Council at Jerusalem. Some little while after, a new journey was projected by Barnabas and Paul, in which the former wished Mark to join them. The sequel is well known; the two Apostles separated, and Barnabas took his nephew with him to Cyprus. The narrative in the Acts follows them no further, but it is most probable that Mark went thence to Cyrene, and returned through Pentapolis to Alexandria. Incidental allusions in the New Testament favour this view, and the Egyptian tradition states that Mark founded five other churches between his first and second visit to Alexandria, including those of Cyrene and Libya.

Whether Mark ever left Egypt again, we cannot tell, but if he ever were in Rome with Peter it must have been towards the close of that Apostle's life. All the earlier writers speak of Mark as if he had remained in Alexandria from the time of his second arrival there to the time of his death.

During this period the first church in Alexandria is said to have been built at a place called Baucalia near the sea-shore. Baucalia was afterwards the parish of the great heretic Arius, though, considering the constant persecution and destruction which prevailed during the first three centuries in Alexandria, it is not likely that the church of which Arius had charge was that built in the time of St. Mark. Strabo tells us that the suburbs had formerly been occupied by cattle pastures, hence the name Baucalia or Boucalia.

All the dates given for St. Mark's life vary in the early authorities by two or three years, and that of his death is no exception to the rule. The most probable date seems to be the eighth year of Nero, or early in 62 A.D. The 25th of April was a great feast to Serapis, and in the year 62 this fell on a Sunday. Mark is said to have publicly denounced the approaching festival as idolatrous and impious, and thereby exasperated the pagans of the city, who were already concerned at the rapid spread of Christianity. The excitement ended in a riot on the Saturday, and towards evening the pagans seized Mark, and tying a rope round his neck, dragged him through the principal streets of the city. At nightfall he was thrown into prison, where he was cheered by the vision of an angel strengthening him. On the following day he was again dragged round the city, probably in the triumphal procession of Serapis, till death ended his sufferings. He was buried in the church of Baucalia, and for centuries afterwards the election of the Alexandrian Patriarchs took place at his tomb.

The Church of Egypt, thus founded by St. Mark, differs less from the Church of Egypt of to-day, as far as its constitution and ceremonies are concerned, than almost any Church from the time of its first founder. In it the due succession of the three orders—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons—has continued without a break unto the present day. Unfortunately, like all the Churches, it fell into the snare, some centuries later, of imposing a compulsory celibacy on the Patriarch and the Bishops of its communion; but it never diverged so far from primitive rule as to enforce the same disability on the lower orders of the clergy. The Egyptian priesthood, like the Greek and unlike the Latin, is emphatically a married priesthood.

From the earliest time the Egyptian Church has acknowledged seven sacraments while laying stress only on two as necessary to salvation—Baptism and Holy Communion. Even baptism was, in the third and fourth centuries, constantly postponed to the close of a man's life. Many of the customs which survive even in our Western Churches to this day were borrowed from the ancient Egyptians in the early days of the Church. Of these we may instance the surplice, the white linen garment of the priests of Isis ; the tonsure which was also a distinguishing mark of the Egyptian priesthood ; and the use of the ring in the marriage service. The ancient Egyptians before the introduction of coinage used rings of different metals for money. In their marriage contract it was customary for the man to give his wife a ring of gold in token that he thereby endowed her with his wealth. This custom continued among the Egyptians after their conversion to Christianity, and passed from them into the Church at large.

The fasts of the Church have perhaps altered more than anything else, having greatly increased in severity. The primitive use varied considerably, but once in the year, at any rate, all men fasted forty hours between Good Friday and Easter Day, the time which our Lord was thought to have remained in Hades. By the end of the second century the fast of forty days instead of forty hours had become general in many countries. Demetrius, who became Patriarch of Alexandria in 189, is said to have fixed the Lenten Fast of the Egyptian Church at forty days. Now, indeed, the Egyptians fast nearly half the year. Forty days before Christmas ; forty-five before Easter (many fast also on the Sundays, and make it fifty)¹ ; forty days after Pentecost, called the fast of the

¹ Sozomen, writing about the year 444, mentions that in his day the duration of Lent varied in different localities from two weeks to six or Apostles; three days in the spring, called the fast of Nineveh; fifteen days in August in honour of the Virgin; and every Friday up to the hour of nones. Moreover Egyptian fasting is a very real thing. Not only is fish and flesh of every kind forbidden, but no milk, eggs, or butter are allowed in the house during the entire period. Nothing is permitted but fruit and vegetables, either raw, or cooked in water or vegetable oil, rice with other farinaceous food, and plain bread. In some houses no food of any description is taken till three o'clock during the fast; in some districts the bread is baked at the beginning of the fast, and becomes so hard that half an hour's soaking in warm milk produces no impression on it. The people become exhausted as the fast goes on, and do as little work as they can possibly help. Sunset brings them no relief, as it does to the Moslem, who obtains so much credit for his fast once a year of twenty-eight days, during which as far as possible he sleeps all day and feasts all night. It does not seem impossible that the increasing frequency and severity of these fasts have contributed to weaken the energy of the Copts; who, for several centuries now, have made no attempt to fight for their freedom and independence.

So far as we can ascertain, there were no Christian monks and nuns in the first century of the Church; but in the middle of the second century this custom of embracing a life of fasting, solitude, and prayer, instead of fulfilling the natural duties of life, was also borrowed from seven. He also says, 'There are several cities and villages in Egypt where, contrary to the usages established elsewhere, the people meet together on Sabbath (Saturday) evenings; and although they have dined previously, partake of the mysteries.'

the religion of the ancient Egyptians, and spread from them over the whole Christian world.

Such is the Church of Egypt founded by St. Mark, and enduring through storm and stress, through persecution and oppression, until the present day. The Western visitors are apt either to ignore her existence, or to sneer as they pass by, and look only on her humiliation and degradation. Yet the ensuing pages will tell a story which may well put to shame the records of more favoured branches of the Church Catholic, whose Head will judge, not with man's judgment, at the last day: 'And they that feared the Lord shall be Mine, saith the Lord of Hosts; in that day when I make up My jewels.'

CHAPTER IV

ONE PATRIARCH AND SEVEN EMPERORS

A.D. 62 VERY little is known of Annianus beyond the fact that he succeeded St. Mark as Patriarch of Alexandria about the year 62, and governed the see with good report of all men for twenty-two years.¹ During this time no fewer than seven emperors—Nero (who died about six years after Annianus had been elected Patriarch), Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian—successively occupied the Imperial throne. The Prefect of Egypt in the year 62 was Babilius, who had succeeded Tiberius Alexander in the year 56. He apparently took an intelligent interest in the country he was sent to govern, for he wrote a history of Egypt, which is unfortunately lost. He also employed Dionysius, the head of the museum and an author, as his secretary of state. Still he does not seem to have been popular with the Egyptians, and, on the death of Nero, he was recalled by Galba, who appointed Tiberius Julius Alexander, son of the prefect Alexander, and grandson of Philo's brother. He was, therefore, like the Patriarch Annianus, an Alexandrine Jew, but was probably, like his father, a renegade from his religion. In the Great Oasis an inscription still remains, recording the decree issued by this prefect to redress the grievances which the Egyptians had suffered under Nero. Among other items the prefect assures his Egyptian subjects that nobody shall be forced in future to act as a provincial taxgatherer, that no sales shall be made void under the pretext of money owing to the imperial revenue, and that no freeman shall be thrown into prison for debt, unless it be a debt due to the royal revenue. The language of this decree, as of all others, was Greek. It is very curious to observe how absolutely untouched Egypt always remained—in spite of her Roman rulers—by the Latin language, or Latin influence of any kind. This was partly owing to the fact that, although the great empire to which they now belonged was called by courtesy 'Roman,' the earlier and truly Roman emperors took little or no interest in Egypt, except as a source of revenue, and before two centuries had elapsed the imperial throne was occupied by a series of successful adventurers of mixed Greek, African, Syrian, or even barbarian blood, who cared nothing for Rome except as the outward and visible sign of their sovereign power. Later we shall see how the change of the imperial capital affected the empire, particularly Egypt and its eastern provinces.

¹ It is true that Annianus was consecrated some years earlier, on the occasion of St. Mark's first departure from Egypt. But his accession as Patriarch is generally dated from the death of Mark.

The short reigns of Otho and Vitellius left no mark on Egypt, but when Vespasian, in the midst of his wars in Palestine, determined to make himself Cæsar, he wrote first to Tiberius Alexander, the governor of Egypt, informing him that he had been elected emperor by the army, and desiring to know if he might count on his support and that of the legions in Egypt. Tiberius at once took the necessary steps, and Egypt acknowledged Vespasian as emperor without a dissentient voice. It is a little curious that the Jews should apparently have been as ready as the Greeks and Egyptians to accept the man who was waging such bloody wars against their own countrymen in Palestine, but we do not hear that any member of the Jewish community in Egypt protested. Their great historian, Flavius Josephus, had already given up the unequal struggle, and being made a prisoner at the taking of Jopata, had attached himself to the fortunes of Vespasian as both friend and subject.

Vespasian maintained himself at Beyrout, and the unhappy country of Palestine enjoyed a few months' respite, till he heard that the general whom he had sent to take possession of Rome in his name had succeeded in his attempt. Then he went, not to Rome, where he evidently depended upon his son Domitian to keep order, but to Alexandria, where he was received by the philosophers of the schools and the magistrates with great pomp and every appearance of a hearty welcome. The three principal philosophers of Alexandria at this time were Euphrates, a Platonist, Dion, surnamed Chrysostome or the golden-mouthed, and that curious personage Apollonius of Tyana, who was afterwards exalted by his biographer Philostratus into a sort of divine prophet. The latter wrote the life of Apollonius, in fact, much on the lines of our own Gospels, and with evident, though indirect, reference to Christianity. He likens him to Pythagoras, and though he does not liken him in so many words to Christ, the inference is sufficiently obvious.

Apollonius attached himself to Vespasian during the whole of his stay in Egypt, and was of great use to him in securing to him the adherence of the Alexandrians. A curious story is told by Tacitus, which indicates that, even at that time, a belief prevailed in the healing power of the sovereign's touch. Two men, the one blind, and the other crippled in the hand, threw themselves at the feet of Vespasian as he walked in the streets of Alexandria, and entreated him to touch them, that they might be made whole. Vespasian laughed, but finding that the physicians of Alexandria affected to believe in the remedy, he consented to apply it, and it is recorded by the friends of the emperor that the experiment was successful.

Vespasian professed to be much attracted by the religion of the Egyptians, and consulted the god Serapis as to his own future and that of the empire. He lingered in Alexandria for some months, sending his son Titus back to finish the war in Palestine. But he soon began to lose ground in the affections of the fickle Alexandrians. Instead of the largesse which they expected from him he increased some of the taxes ; but his crowning offence was that, in a fit of passion at some foolish jest of the townsfolk about a debt of six oboli, of which he had exacted repayment from one of his friends, he imposed this sum as a fine or poll-tax on every man in the city. The imposition was, indeed, immediately remitted at the instance of his more politic son Titus, but good feeling was not restored, and Vespasian sailed for Rome without waiting for the close of the war in Palestine.

In the autumn of that year (70) came the long-expected news that Jerusalem had fallen. Ninety-seven thousand Jews were condemned to slavery, chiefly in the mines of Egypt, and, besides the sad spectacle of this slave army following Titus, hundreds of Jews poured into the country to take refuge with their more fortunate Egyptian brethren. This influx of wronged and desperate men continued for some time, till the Jews of Alexandria became alarmed for their own safety. For many of the Palestinian Jews openly reproached the Jews in Egypt with their tame submission to the Roman emperor, and called upon them to take up arms in defence of their liberty and their desolate country. Such a Holy War found little favour in the eyes of the rich and cultivated Egyptian Jews, who had everything to lose and, in their opinion, nothing to gain by revolt. They branded these fanatic preachers of a forlorn hope with the name of Sicarii or ruffians, and as the danger seemed to increase, the principal Jews in the city actually called together a general assembly of their countrymen, and demonstrated that their only hope of safety lay in seizing these unfortunate exiles, and delivering them up to the Government, in order to free themselves from any suspicion of complicity in their wild hopes. Six hundred of these outcast patriots were seized at once, and though many escaped into the provinces, most of them were caught and brought back. These were in many cases put to the torture in order to make them swear fealty to Vespasian, but not even the young children among them would consent to do so, and they were all put to death. No wonder that the early Christian writers briefly imply that the episcopate of Annianus was not a time of peace. But no one has left any existing record of the part he took in these troublous days. The flame of rebellion among the Jews spread even to Cyrene, where one Jonathan, a weaver by trade, preached patriotism with some success 'among the poorer sort,' as Josephus describes them. He led out his unarmed army into the desert towards Egypt, promising them supernatural aid in their undertaking. But the treachery of their richer brethren in Cyrene betrayed them to Catullus, the governor of that province, and he hastily pursued and easily discomfited them. He spared the life of Jonathan, however, on condition that he would give up the names of those Jews who had promised to side with him in the event of his success. Whether Jonathan swore truly, or whether he merely wished to revenge himself on those who had betrayed him, can never now be known; but he gave up the names of many of the richest and most powerful Jews, not only in Cyrene, but in Alexandria and Rome. Those in Cyrene, amounting, according to Josephus, to near three thousand, Catullus slew without more ado, and confiscated their wealth to the public service. Concerning the Jews of Alexandria and Rome, he sent information to the emperor, and the end of it all was a heavy blow to the pride and power of the Egyptian Jews. The decree went forth that the Temple in Egypt was to be closed, and the public worship of the Jews allowed no more.

For three hundred and forty-three years this temple had been the pride and glory of the Egyptian Jews. It was a rival to the older Temple which had just been destroyed at Jerusalem, and thus, at one stroke, the Egyptian Jews were reduced to the same position, from a religious point of view, as the Palestinian Jews whom they had despised. They were not, indeed, legally deprived of their citizenship, but practically they lost this also, and sank to the level of the native Egyptians. The site of the temple of Onion is now reduced to a more desolate condition than it was in the days when Ptolemy Philometor granted Onias leave 'to purge that temple which is fallen down at Leontopolis,' that he might build there. It is indeed 'a place of heaps'—a deep scar on the face of the fertile earth. The lines of the double enclosure stand bare and high above the plain, and within is a mere bed of broken potsherds, from two to five feet deep. The Mohammedans, in the course of centuries, have taken away all the stones, till there is not one left upon another—only one huge granite block of the older Egyptian building (Rameses III.) and a few scattered fragments of white alabaster were there in 1893. Now, as you approach the desolate Tell across the clover plains, where the crowned hoopoes flit from furrow to furrow, and the white ibis stalks lazily among the rippling green, you meet the creaking carts, which are fast taking the place of the silent camel, laden with the very potsherds on their way to be ground into cement for the foundation of new houses.

The native Egyptians were better off under Vespasian and Titus than they had been for some time. Titus himself went to Memphis in state, to assist at the ceremony of the consecration of a new Apis, or sacred bull; and, in the reign of Vespasian, the great temple of Kneph, at Latopolis,¹ which, like most Egyptian temples, had been the slow growth of centuries, was finished building. It was a building worthy of the best times of Egyptian architecture, and the name of Vespasian was carved in the dedication over the entrance door.

In the reign of Domitian, the Roman poet Juvenal, though now in his old age, was sent in command of a cohort into Egypt, and died there. He disliked this exile, as he considered it, very much, and left an unflattering picture of the provincial Egyptians and their sacred animals.

¹ Esneh.

It was in this reign that Annianus died, and was succeeded in the patriarchate by Abilius.

Nerva, who succeeded Domitian, gained the gratitude of the Jews by remitting the poll-tax, of half a shekel a head, which had been imposed upon them since the time of the Ptolemies. The tax was, however, reimposed by a later emperor. During these reigns the Church of Egypt was at peace, and increased greatly.

CHAPTER V

NILE TOURISTS IN THE SECOND CENTURY

A.D. 98 IN the earlier years of his reign, Trajan was fully occupied with the affairs of Europe ; but two important works were executed at this time in Egypt. The Ptolemaic canal between the Nile and the Red Sea had fallen into disuse and disrepair, and Trajan not merely repaired but added considerably to its length by prolonging it to Babylon, via Scenæ Veteranorum and Heliopolis. This canal is substantially the same as the present El Khalig, though it had to be again repaired, and slightly prolonged (owing to the shifting of the river) in Mohammedan times. He also built at Babylon the great fortress which in its present ruinous state is called Kasr-el-Shamma.¹ It now encloses six of the oldest Christian churches in Cairo, but at that time the only one in existence was the present crypt of Abu Sergeh. The site of the older fortress, mentioned by Strabo, lies to the south of the Kasr-el-Shamma, near the present Deyr Bablun.

Everyone knows the celebrated letters of Pliny and Trajan respecting the Christians ; and as they appear to have had no bearing on the affairs of Christians in Egypt we shall not quote them here. Trajan's policy towards the

¹ See, for account of Kasr-el-Shamma, Butler's Coptic Churches, vol. i. chap. 4.

Christians seems to have been tolerant, in the main ; but the martyrdom of St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, has left a dark stain upon his name. In the eighteenth year of the reign of Trajan fresh riots began between the Greeks and Jews of Alexandria, and this swelled at length into a general rebellion of the Jews all over Egypt and Cyrene, which the prefect Lupus in vain attempted to suppress.

One Lucuas, of Cyrene, was chosen as the leader of the Jews, and for two years he maintained himself against the Roman rule, while the unhappy country suffered all the horrors of civil war. At length the emperor sent Marcus Turbo with a large army into Egypt, and after an obstinate struggle, and several pitched battles, the Jews were defeated and slain by thousands. They were now legally deprived of their citizenship, and, losing all hope of Jewish dominion, became subsequently Christians in great numbers.

Very soon after the close of this civil war Trajan died, and was succeeded by Hadrian, who, in the fourth year of his reign, set out on a prolonged and personal inspection of the different provinces of his empire.

In due course he came to Egypt, and went up the Nile, accompanied by his favourite Antinous, a European slave of great beauty. The true circumstances of the latter's death will never now be known, but a legendary version makes it a supreme act of self-sacrifice. As the Royal procession of boats came down the Nile, with its fluttering flags and triumphal music—just as similar regal and vice-regal processions have come and gone upon the same old river for five thousand years before the time of Hadrian, and near two thousand more since his day—the soul of the emperor was oppressed with superstitious fear. His happiness and prosperity had been so great that it must needs rouse the anger of the jealous gods, and some great sacrifice must be made to appease this jealousy, ere ruin overtook him. Antinous, who loved his master above all things, discovered the reason of the cloud which overshadowed him, and delayed not to make his choice. Proudly asserting that, since he knew himself to be his master's dearest possession, it was sweet for him to die in order to insure that master's happiness, he plunged into the Nile and was drowned. Hadrian's extravagant grief is well known; how he decreed divine honours to his dead friend, and founded a city, which was called after him Antinous, near the spot where he had laid down his life. This city became afterwards the capital of the Thebaïd, and to-day its site is occupied by a little Arab village named El Bersheh. The name of Antinous was also given by the Alexandrian poet Pancrates to a new variety of lotus which he presented to the emperor on his return from the Nile. Its rarity consisted in the fact that it was rose-coloured instead of blue or white. Besides the poet Pancrates, other writers of note in Alexandria at the time of Hadrian's first visit were Apollonius Dyscolus, whose writings are almost all lost except part of a collection of Egyptian folk-lore and fairy tales; and Appian, a lawyer, who had spent several years of his life in Rome, and wrote a Roman history after his return to his native country.

In the year 131-2 another Jewish patriot, nicknamed Bar Cochba (the son of a star, or, as some say, the son of a lie), raised the standard of revolt in Palestine with temporary success. An army of Jews marched out of Egypt and Libya to join his forces, but as Tinnius Rufus, the prefect of Judæa, showed himself unequal to the occasion, Severus was recalled from Britain, and put an end to the rebellion after a bloody struggle which lasted nearly four years.

In the year 131 also, Hadrian paid a second visit to Egypt, and this time he brought his Queen Sabina and a train of ladies with him. They went up the Nile again, Queen Sabina being specially anxious to see and hear the far-famed musical statue of Memnon, one of the great statues on the Theban plain, which we now recognise as those of Amenhotep III., and belonging to a vanished temple of his far-distant reign. When Queen Sabina visited the spot the statue was in a worse state of ruin than it is even now, the upper half lying in fragments on the ground, and no sounds were heard from the broken lips when the merry royal party gathered round it to listen for the wonder, at sunrise. A threat of the emperor's displeasure was enough for the Egyptian priests, and the musical sounds were heard greeting the dawn on the following morning. The Queen's attendants cut their names on the base of the statue, like any tourist of to-day, and one of them, Julia Balbilla (the daughter of that Claudius Balbillus who had been prefect of Egypt in the reign of Nero, and had written an Egyptian history), amused herself by cutting two or three short poems on the foot of the statue, in which she recorded her descent from King Antiochus of Commagene, and her visit to Thebes with the emperor and his wife.

On this occasion Hadrian stayed about four years in Egypt, keeping his court for the most part in Alexandria. Since his first visit to the country in 122, the Patriarch Primus had died, and been succeeded by Justus, of whom it is recorded that he was one of those baptised by St.

Mark. Justus had died the year before Hadrian's second visit to Egypt, and the patriarchal throne was now filled by Eumenes or Hymenæus, of whom little is known.

There is a vague tradition that the Christians of Alexandria suffered persecution under Trajan, and again at this time under Hadrian ; but this is not borne out by any of the known facts of history. It is only too probable, however, that many Christians suffered as Jews in the suppression of the rebellions under both these emperors, for they were frequently regarded in the first and second centuries as a particularly dangerous sect of Jews. Moreover, Egypt has always been fertile in the heresies born of restless intellects, and at the time of Hadrian's second residence in Egypt, the Alexandrian Christians were divided into so many different schools that Hadrian may well be excused for the confusion of ideas into which he fell concerning them. Carpocrates, Basilides, and Valentinian were all natives of Egypt, and were then teaching and perfecting their mystic speculations in Alexandria. These men were all branded as heretics after death ; but there does not seem to be any evidence that any of them were condemned by the Church in their lifetime. They all believed the fundamental truths of the Christian religion, and seem to have given offence chiefly by their attempt to graft the occult mysteries of Egyptian thought on the simple facts of the Christian religion. The speculations on the nature of the three Persons of the Trinity and the constitution and creation of the world in which they indulged, were certainly best confined, as the Egyptian priesthood had confined them, to those who had been carefully trained in such mental exercises. It must have been this form of Christianity which chiefly came under Hadrian's notice, as the following letter by him will show:—¹

Hadrian Augustus to Servianus the Consul—greeting.

As for Egypt, which you were praising to me, dearest Servianus, I have found its people wholly light, wavering, and flying after every breath of a report. Those who worship Serapis are Christians, and those who call themselves bishops² of Christ are devoted to Serapis. There is no ruler of a Jewish synagogue, no Samaritan, no presbyter of the Christians, who is not a mathematician, an augur and a soothsayer. The very Patriarch himself, when he came into Egypt,³ was said by some to worship Serapis, and by others to worship Christ. As a race of men they are seditious, vain and spiteful; as a body, wealthy and prosperous, of whom nobody lives in idleness. Some blow glass, some make paper, and others linen. There is work for the lame, and work for the blind; even those who have lost the use of their hands do not live in idleness. Their one God is nothing;⁴ Christians, Jews, and all nations worship him. I wish this body of men was better behaved, and worthy of their number; as for that they ought to hold the chief place in Egypt. I have granted everything unto them; I have restored their old privileges, and have made them grateful by adding new ones.

Before the close of his life Hadrian became better acquainted with the Christian religion than at the time he wrote this letter. Two of the earliest 'Apologies'

¹ Some deny that this letter was written by the Emperor, and give it a slightly later date.

² Except the Patriarch himself, there were no bishops in Egypt, as we understand the office, till the time of Demetrius. Those under the Patriarch were priests and deacons only; but he had in Alexandria a body of priests with special privileges, answering to the Chapter of an English Cathedral.

³ I.e. when he went through Egypt proper, as distinct from the town of Alexandria.

⁴ I.e. nothing peculiar to their religion.

for the Christian religion were presented to him, one written by Quadratus, and the other by Aristides. The first of these authors can hardly have been living in the time of Hadrian, since he says in his Apology (on the testimony of Eusebius, who had read it) that some of those on whom our Lord's miracles of healing had been worked were still alive. The tract may have been presented to Hadrian by some member of the church either at Athens, Alexandria, or Rome. It is not known to what country Quadratus belonged, since he cannot be identified with the Bishop of Athens of that name in the time of Hadrian. Aristides was a Christian philosopher of Athens, and his Apology, after having been lost for centuries, was found in an Egyptian tomb within the last few years. *

We find traces of Gnostic influence even in the coins of Hadrian's reign, which are remarkable both for their number and variety. Every nome or district in the country had its own coinage, some marked with Gnostic emblems, some with Egyptian, and one with the head of the deified Antinous. It has been often said of Hadrian that he built temples without statues towards the end of his reign, intending to dedicate them to Christ; but though the existence of such temples may be accepted, there is no authority in contemporary history for the intended dedication. Three years after his final departure from Egypt the reign of Hadrian and the great Sothic period of 1,460 years came to an end together.

CHAPTER VI

THE FIRST THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE

A.D. 138 IN the reign of Antoninus a new survey was made of all the military roads in Egypt, which is known as the Itinerary of Antoninus. These roads were six in number, two of which ran through Babylon, one from Nubia, which, after leaving Babylon, passed through the districts of the Jews to Klyasma, and one from Memphis to Pelusium, which crossed the river at Babylon. Antoninus also caused a hippodrome or race-course to be built in Alexandria, and added the two gates, called the Gate of the Sun, and the Gate of the Moon, to that city. We have evidence also that there was still life left in the old religion of the country, for in this reign a new temple was built to Amon Kneph, in the Great Oasis. In this reign also—probably about the year 151—a tradition, which there is no reason to disbelieve, tells us that St. Fronto or Frontonius, weary of the world, gathered a company of the brethren together and led them into the desert of Nitria (now called Wady Natron), where he founded the first Christian Laura.¹

¹ A Laura was distinct from a monastery in that it was a collection of separate cells, generally cut out of the rock, under an abbot elected by the ascetics themselves. They lived much more to themselves, and regulated their own self-discipline much more, than the inhabitants of a monastery could do. The community of St. Fronto appears to have died with him. The permanent settlement of Nitria began with Ammon.

In 161 Antoninus died, and was succeeded by his adopted son, Marcus Aurelius. This emperor had been carefully trained by Diognetus, an artist, in the Stoic philosophy, and particularly in a disbelief of all miracles and visions. In his reign 'it was death either to confess Christianity or to accuse another of being a Christian,' so that in the outbursts of persecution against the Christians they were generally arraigned as guilty of abstaining from the worship of the gods, or as atheists. Several Apologies were written in this reign, a second by Justin Martyr, and that known as the Epistle to Diognetus (tutor of Marcus Aurelius) which all critics unite in praising, and many rank next after the canonical epistles of the New Testament. For some centuries this Apology was attributed to Justin Martyr, and only in our own time have the labours of Cureton established the fact that he was a certain Ambrosius, 'a chief man of Greece, who became a Christian, and all his fellow councillors raised a clamour against him.' But the pleadings of Justin and Ambrosius were of no avail. In 166 or 167 Justin himself was martyred at Rome; a few years before St. Polycarp had suffered at Smyrna; and in 177 Blandina and her companions perished at Lyons. It does not seem likely that Justin Martyr had ever paid more than a passing visit to Egypt, but there was no lack of eminent Christian teachers, heretic and otherwise, in Alexandria, and many noble recruits were won from the ranks of paganism. Athenagoras (a native of Athens) filled one of the professorial chairs in the Museum, that stronghold of intellectual paganism in Alexandria. He was much interested, like all the Platonic philosophers of his time, in Christianity, and, desiring to expose its fallacies and presumptions, he set himself seriously to study its writings. The very natural result was his own conversion to that religion. He still wore the garb of the Philosopher, and did not forsake his former studies; but he became one of the great champions of Christianity. His 'Apology' is addressed to Marcus Aurelius and Commodus, and its probable date is 176-177.

Contemporary with Athenagoras was Claudius Ptolemy, the geographer, as he is called, though he was equally famous as an astronomer. He belonged to the mathematical school of Alexandria, and wrote a book, amongst other subjects, on musical harmony. He left a record of a series of observations of eclipses for eight hundred years before his time. Most of them were taken at the Assyrian Babylon, but the later ones, by the latitude and longitudes given, were probably observed at the Egyptian Babylon.

During the peaceful years which had followed the suppression of the last Jewish rebellion in 135 Christianity had increased greatly in Egypt. It was towards the close of this century that the celebrated college, known as the Catechetical School of Alexandria, was founded, but neither the date of its foundation nor the name of its first principal is undisputed. Unfortunately we know hardly anything about the reign of Marcus Aurelius in Egypt, except that in the year 172 there was a rebellion of the 'native' regiments, which, after an obstinate struggle, was put down by Avidus Cassius, at the head of the Roman legions, who afterwards (175) declared himself emperor. But before Marcus Aurelius, at the head of another army, could arrive in Egypt, he was met by the news that the army of occupation in Egypt had slain both Cassius and his son, and returned to their allegiance. Marcus continued his march, and remained some time in Alexandria, where it is reported that he won golden opinions by his clemency, and his friendly intercourse with the philosophers in Alexandria. It was during this journey, and either at Athens or Alexandria, that Athenagoras presented his Apology to the Emperor, and we hear nothing of persecution in Egypt, though the persecution of Lyons took place in the following year.

In the first year or two of the reign of Commodus we find Pantænus at the head of the Catechetical College. It seems probable that both he and his more celebrated contemporary, Clement of Alexandria, had been pupils of Athenagoras; and both, like most of the early Egyptian Christians, had been well educated in all the learning of the ancients, as well as in the truths of Christianity. At this time Julian was the Patriarch of Alexandria, having succeeded Agrippinus in 179, the last year of Marcus Aurelius. A curious story is told concerning the appointment of his successor. Julian, being at the point of death, was informed by an angel, in a vision or dream, that the man who should on the following day bring him a present of grapes had been chosen by God to succeed him in the Patriarchate. On the morrow the man appeared, and proved to be a young layman, in fact an illiterate Egyptian peasant, or fellah, who was married, and brought of the produce of his vineyard. On being informed of his election to the Patriarchate he earnestly entreated to be spared so great a responsibility, and was, we are told, consecrated by main force. He immediately applied himself, with great diligence, to remedy the defects of his education, and became one of the most learned prelates of his time. His episcopate lasted for forty-three eventful years.

One of his earliest acts was to dispatch Pantænus on a missionary journey to India. He had received an embassy from that country¹ with a request that the Patriarch of Alexandria (then famed as the most learned city in the world) would send them a teacher of the Faith, whose learning should equal his piety. Demetrius carried the request to Pantænus, who willingly consented to go himself, and left Clement in charge of the school till his return. It is recorded that he found in use among the Indians, and regarded by them as their greatest treasure, a copy of St. Matthew's Gospel in Hebrew, which they said had been brought into the country by St. Bartholomew. Jerome states, but does not give his authority, that Pantænus brought this MS. back with him to Alexandria. It is not known how long Pantænus was away, but on his return he resumed the charge of the Theological College until his death. This took place probably in the year 194; for he is stated to have lived into the reign of Severus (193-211), and cannot have lived much longer, since Clement had evidently been some years sole head of the school when the persecution broke out in 203.

The great development of Christian learning stimulated the pagan school to fresh activity. The shelves of the Alexandrian library contained at this time copies of all the ancient authors of Greece and Egypt, and fresh books were continually being added. The writing from dictation of living authors and the multiplication of copies of the works of the dead gave employment to a whole army of scribes in Alexandria. They were divided into two classes—the quick writers and the book-writers—whose different functions are suggested by their names. Three of the most celebrated authors of this time—Athenæus, Julius Pollux, and Cheiron—were all natives of Naucratis. Of the former we still possess one book, called the Deipnosophist, or Table-talk of the Philosophers, which gives an amusing picture of society in Alexandria. Julius Pollux was little more than a verbal critic, but Cheiron wrote a history of the Egyptian kings and priests which is, most unfortunately, lost. Another writer of the reign of Commodus was Lucian, the author of the Dialogues, who was at this time secretary to the prefect of Egypt. One of the philosophers of the pagan schools, Celsus, an Epicurean, wrote an attack on the new religion, which had become already greater than the Jewish or pagan faiths in Egypt; but his writings are chiefly known to us through Origen's reply to his arguments. Many books also, which come under the head of 'pious frauds,'¹ were written during this reign; and many more creditable facts render it evident that Christianity, besides conquering the stronghold of learning in the world, and showing in Alexandria alone such a triad of names as Demetrius, Pantænus, and Clement, was rapidly becoming the dominant religion in Egypt. Up to this reign the Patriarch of Alexandria had been the sole bishop in Egypt, but Demetrius found it necessary to ordain three others for the more distant provinces. Another indication is found in the pathetic lament for the overthrow of the old national religion by the author of Hermes Trismegistus :—

¹ It should be remembered that the India of the second century was a very vague geographical name. Still we have every reason to conclude that the India above referred to is India proper.

Our land (he writes) is the temple of the world; but as wise men should foresee all things, you should know that a time is coming when it will seem that the Egyptians have by an unfailling piety served God in vain, and their holy religion will become void ; for the divinity will return from earth to Heaven, Egypt will be forsaken, and the land which was the seat of the divinity will be void of religion. For when strangers shall possess this kingdom, religion will be neglected, and laws shall be made against piety and divine worship, with punishment on those who favour it. Then this holy seat will be full of idolatry, idols' temples and dead men's tombs. Oh Egypt, Egypt ! there will remain only a feigned show of thy religion, not believed by posterity ; and nought but the letters which stand engraven on thy pillars will declare thy pious deeds ; and in thee will dwell the Scythians, the Indians, or some other barbarous nation. The divinity will fly to Heaven, and Egypt will be forsaken by God and man. I call upon thee, most holy river, I foretell unto thee what will come to pass. Thy waters and holy streams will be filled with blood and will overflow thy banks, so that the dead will be more numerous than the living ; and he that remains alive will be known to be an Egyptian only by his language, while in his deeds he will seem a barbarian.

¹ Many of these writings were not intended as frauds at all, but as fiction, which, in the later uncritical days, were taken for facts.

About this time also, it was found necessary to translate the life of Christ into Egyptian, or, as it is now called, Coptic. This Gospel according to the Egyptians, as it was entitled, has long since been lost, so that we cannot now tell from which of the four Gospels it was translated. Indeed, from the few fragments which remain to us (in Greek), it seems to have been more a compilation than a translation, and to have been so deeply tinged with Egyptian mysticism that Origen and Jerome mention it as an heretical writing. At the time, however, it circulated freely in the country without protest from any section of the learned and tolerant Church whose peace was so soon to be broken by the first recorded persecution of Christians, as such, in Egypt.

CHAPTER VII

ORIGEN

A.D. 193 IN the beginning of the reign of Severus, Clement of Alexandria, as he is always called to distinguish him from his namesake of Rome, was, as we have said, head of the Catechetical School in Alexandria. The full name of this remarkable man was Titus Flavius Clemens, which points to a connection with the imperial family; but nothing is certainly known of his birth, though he is generally called an Alexandrian. He was converted from Paganism after some years of travel and study, and afterwards became the intimate friend and pupil of Pantæus. During the absence of the latter in India he took charge of the Theological College, and on his death succeeded him as Principal. About this time, also, he was ordained priest; indeed, with the exception of Origen, who was not ordained till after his connection with the school had been severed, the Principal seems generally to have been a clergyman.

Clement was not only great as a teacher, he was a voluminous writer, and five of his books have been preserved to the present day, besides numerous fragments. The great truth, which he was one of the first to proclaim, and which he brings out in many different ways, is that Christianity is the heir of all the past, and the interpreter of the future. Not an isolated fact, nor in opposition to earlier manifestations, but the fulfilment and exponent of all that had been earlier revealed or rightly taught in the schools of Jew or Gentile, in the philosophies of Greece and Egypt. He quotes expressly and continuously not only from the Old and New Testaments, but from the books of the Apocrypha, and from what may be called the Christian Apocrypha—the Epistles of Barnabas and Clement of Rome, the preaching of Peter, the Pastor of Hermas, and the Gospel according to the Hebrews. The first two of these he regards as having equal weight with the Canonical Epistles.

But these tranquil times in Egypt, this seventy years peace between the rebellions and oppressions of the Jews, and the persecutions of the Christians, during which almost the whole country had become Christian, were now drawing to an end. Since his accession Severus had been occupied with incessant wars against rival claimants to the throne, and had taken little notice of Egypt, while he had shown himself absolutely favourable to the Christians, even employing them as servants for his son. It is not known what made him turn his attention to the suppression and persecution of the only peaceable people in his Empire, so soon as he had reduced the fighting elements to subjection ; but about the year 202 he published an edict forbidding future conversions to Judaism or Christianity.

Immediately after the promulgation of this edict he visited Egypt,¹ and travelled up the country as far as Thebes. Apparently he considered the widespread and learned Christianity he found there a danger to the Roman Empire, for coincidently with his arrival the persecution became far more severe, and continued for some time after his departure. The prefect, or viceroy as Eusebius calls him, Lætus, carried out his master's orders con amore, dragging his victims from all parts of Egypt. Alexandria itself, as the stronghold of Christianity, suffered most. Demetrius stood firm at his post, but, apparently with his sanction, the school was temporarily closed; the pupils dispersed to their homes, and Clement saved himself by a hasty flight from the country. He lived for some years, and most of his books were published after this time, but no particulars are known of his future life and death.

¹ Severus was born at Leptis Magna, which was then included in the territory of Egypt.

The muster roll of Egyptian martyrs, even of those whose names have come down to us (an inappreciable fraction of the whole), is so long that, in no persecution will it be possible to do more than give one or two of the principal names among them. Potamiana has always been remembered for her youth and beauty, for the prolonged torture to which she was subjected in the hope of making her recant, before she was finally committed to the flames with her mother Marcella; and for the fact that her courage and constancy so wrought upon the officer who had charge of her execution, that not long after her death he gave himself up to the authorities as a Christian, and was beheaded. It is curious to observe that, according to all accounts, it was always the women who suffered most cruelly in these persecutions; the men being often beheaded without additional torture. Among these men was Leonides, whose title of honour for all time has been that he was the father of Origen. Beyond this, indeed, little is known about him, though some authorities by no means contemporary, have described him as a bishop. If so, he must have been one of those recently appointed for the provinces by Demetrius. He had a wife and seven sons, of whom Origen, the eldest, was, at the time of his father's arrest, about 15 or 16. He had already attracted notice in Alexandria as one of the most promising pupils in the college, and bearing also the highest character for good conduct and earnest faith, he was the joy of his parents' hearts. When Leonides was arrested Origen was apparently away from the house, and returned to find his mother and the younger boys in the depths of despair. The poor mother's feelings may be imagined when, on pouring out her sad story to her eldest son, he immediately declared his intention of giving himself up to the authorities and joining his father in a glorious martyrdom. Her passionate tears and entreaties seem to have kept him from immediate action, perhaps it was already too late in the day, and in the night the unhappy woman stole away every fragment of clothing belonging to her son while he slept, and kept him so a prisoner, till he had promised not to forsake her without necessity. From this loving confinement the boy sent a letter to his father in the prison, entreating him not to be influenced by any fear for them or their future. Eusebius, indeed, had made a collection of over a hundred letters written by Origen during his life, but like so much else, they have perished in the burnt libraries of Egypt and Palestine.

At length the news came that Leonides was beheaded, his property confiscated to the imperial treasury; and Origen found himself left penniless, with a mother to support, and six younger brothers to bring up. A certain lady of great wealth and influence, whose name is not given, exerted all her efforts to protect the Christians during that time of fear and trouble in Alexandria. Both the secrecy which shrouds her, and the immunity which she seems to have enjoyed, make it likely that this lady was not herself an acknowledged Christian; but her purse and house were open not only to the members of the orthodox Church, but also to heretics both from Egypt and Antioch.

The persecution lasted for some years, and during that time Origen owed his immunity in great measure to the fact that he was known as a protégé of this lady. For after his father's death he concealed himself no longer, but went boldly to visit the confessors who thronged the prisons, rendering to all such services as were possible, and strengthening their faith. The Patriarch Demetrius took a great interest in the boy, and encouraged him not only to continue his own studies, but found him pupils even in these dangerous times, whose fees were the principal support of the poverty-stricken household. Little by little in fact, though they did not venture to reassemble in the college buildings, the whole school collected round this lad who had so lately been one of its principal scholars. It is difficult to realise the daily life of the Egyptians under these persecutions. They seem to have been generally intermittent; a fierce spasm of fury, when men and women were taken almost at hazard from the Christian population, and many of them tortured and murdered almost at once. Then the rest would be left to languish in the prisons, severely treated or not, as the caprice of the moment might dictate, but often allowed to communicate freely with their friends, and receive comforts from them. The routine of life, the buying and the selling, the amusements and business of the city, would go on as before; and the Christians went to and fro among their Jewish and Pagan neighbours, none knowing when his turn might come, or what might be the fate of those already in prison. Then the news would be whispered among them, 'Have you heard? So and so has been arrested; they say he will never hold out'; or 'What a terrible loss; can nothing be done?' as another and another disappeared, till the prisons grew too full, or a fresh popular outbreak led to a fresh crowd of executions. And all this time the peasant-born old Patriarch, and the highly educated lad Origen, with many others, went sturdily to and fro on their daily labours, and no one laid hands on them, though often they must have been in imminent danger. No fewer than five of the pupils of the Catechetical School, who continued to come to Origen for instruction, were one after another arrested; and, after weary days of insult and imprisonment, were led out to die for the faith which the brave lads refused to renounce. The first of these five was Plutarch, brother to another pupil Heraclas, who by some means escaped arrest, and lived to be head of the college, and afterwards Patriarch of Alexandria. Origen stayed by his friend to the last, and pressed forward to give him a final kiss of farewell on the place of execution in spite of the howling mob, who shouted for his arrest, and pelted him with stones; yet he escaped. The other pupils were Severus who was burnt to death, Heraclides and Heron who were beheaded, and another Severus who suffered prolonged torture before the sword set him free.

After about two years of this life, Demetrius formally appointed Origen head of the college which had refused to be dispersed, and of which he had had practical charge ever since the beginning of the persecution. This made Origen a still more conspicuous mark for hatred on the part of the pagan populace, but Demetrius seems to have trusted with good reason to the secret, yet powerful, protection under which Origen lived. His danger, constantly imminent, lay in the chance of being murdered in the streets by the mob, not in the likelihood of arrest by the authorities. Eusebius says that 'the persecution against him daily blazed forth with such virulence that the whole city of Alexandria could no longer contain him as he removed from house to house, driven about in every direction, on account of the great number of those that had been brought over by him to the true faith.' And yet even the mob showed itself at times sensible of the charm of this lad, who daily defied them all, yet not with railing, but with ready wit and even temper. Epiphanius relates that one day the mob seized him in the street and bore him in a tempestuous procession to the great temple of Serapis. Here by main force, but apparently without real violence, they gave him the tonsure,¹ clothed him in the white robe of a priest of the temple, and then brought him out, and held him on the top of the great flight of steps. Here they bade him distribute the palms to the throng of idol worshippers who laughed and applauded below. Origen took the palm branches and offered them to the people, crying aloud as he did so: 'Come and receive the palms, not of idols, but of the Lord Jesus Christ.' It is a pleasant scene to dwell upon in that gloomy and painful time: the great temple fortress, dark against the blue of an Egyptian sky; the court below, full of the laughing, hooting, many-coloured, oriental mob, such as one may see now at the procession of the Mahmal; the majestic flight of steps swarming with more insistent pagans laden with the graceful branches, and in the midst of them, that one youthful figure with the strong sunlight on his white robe and smiling face, holding up the palm, and striking silence on the crowd with his clear, dauntless call to the worship of Christ.

¹ A mark then of the pagan priesthood; not permitted to Christians.

Up till the time of his formal appointment as head of the school, Origen had taught not only Christianity, but all the branches of learning and science in which he had himself been educated. Before the persecution broke out, he and many other Christian youths had studied not only in the Theological College of the Christians, but in the pagan school of Ammonius Saccus, one of the most learned professors in Alexandria. 'But when,' says Eusebius, 'he saw a greater number of pupils coming, the instruction of them having been committed to him entirely by Demetrius, the bishop of the Church, he thought that to teach literature and philology was inconsistent with the study of Divine truth (in his new position), and without delay he abandoned the school of philosophy as useless and an obstruction to his sacred studies.' This opinion he subsequently saw reason to modify, and returned to his studies in the ancient learning with redoubled diligence; but meanwhile he sold all his old school books and the copies which he had himself written of books in the library to a man who allowed him in return four oboli¹ a day, upon which he lived. Indeed, he seems at this time to have plunged into that passionate enthusiasm of self-denial and self-sacrifice which has always been so striking a characteristic of religious Egyptians, and which denies all lawful scope to the exercise of the reasoning faculties. His real genius, his humility, and may we add, his sense of humour, saved him from that flight to a desert tomb in search of death in life which was the logical consequence for so many Egyptian saints of such premises, and eventually brought him up again into a clearer and healthier atmosphere; but meanwhile he had sorely wasted his powers and branded himself with a disability which no after-repentance could remove. Yet, how touching is the story of those early days, when he strove to fulfil literally every precept in the New Testament, when he refused to own two garments, went barefoot winter and summer, allowed himself only the bread, water, and uncooked green food of the poorest Egyptian peasant, and denied himself even all those literary studies which had been his greatest pleasure. Nor even here did he draw the line in his literal interpretation of Scripture. He was but a youth, with the passions of a youth, and when his duties in these troubled times threw him into constant familiar intercourse with both sexes at all hours, he suffered from temptation, and determined to put himself beyond all possibility of failure and suspicion in the way suggested by a certain verse in the nineteenth chapter of St. Matthew.

¹ An obol is a small copper coin of uncertain value. Crusé rates it as a penny, Mommsen as a farthing of our money.

We can imagine the growing concern and perplexity with which the simple-minded old Patriarch who had thanked God for his wife, and brought the fruits of his vineyard to offer to the Church, must have watched this new development in the character of the brilliant youth whom he loved and honoured. In particular he was aghast at Origen's culminating act of self-sacrifice, not only as an abstract principle, but also for the practical reason that, in the Patriarch's mind it put an end to all idea of admitting Origen, like his predecessors Clement and Pantænus, to the priesthood. Though up to this time there had been no formal enactment of a canonical law on this subject, the general opinion of the Church was clear and strong. Moreover, by his act Origen had made himself amenable to the civil law of the empire, which reckoned it as murder.¹ By a Canon of Nicea it is enacted that any priest who has mutilated himself in this manner 'should cease from his ministrations.' In later days Origen made a touching confession of his error on this point, by the words of his comment on the passage in question.

Through the whole seven years of this persecution, the Christians of Rome, and particularly the Christian attendants in the palace of the Emperor, seem to have been left unmolested. They were probably, though a numerous, a comparatively uninfluential body; and did not constitute in the opinion of the Emperor the same danger to the State that a rich and learned kingdom like Egypt, keenly conscious of her lost political and present intellectual eminence, might become, if once united by the ties of a common religion. In Carthage, Antioch, and the whole province of Egypt, Christianity must be put down; in the Capital, under the shadow of the Court and Army, it might be despised and tolerated. It was probably during a lull of the persecution in Alexandria that Origen went on his short visit to the sister Church of Rome, and on his return, or perhaps before his departure, Heraclas, who was now in priest's orders, was associated with him in the charge of the school. About this time Origen permitted himself to learn Hebrew in order to fit himself for the compilation of the Hexapla, which was one of his great works, not published however till years after this time. This was a six-fold Bible arranged in parallel columns, the first giving the Hebrew text, the second the same in Greek characters, the third was the translation of Aquil/a,¹ the fourth that of Symmachus, an Ebionite Christian who lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, or as some authorities say under Severus. He lived and wrote, it is believed, in Palestine, but Origen must have known the translation of Symmachus well, before he found the copy which long afterwards Palladius describes as having seen endorsed in Origen's handwriting: 'This book I found in the house of Juliana the Virgin in Cæsarea when I was hiding there; who said that she had received it from Symmachus himself, the interpreter of the Jews.' The fifth was the edition known as the Septuagint, and the sixth that of Theodotion, a native of Ephesus, who wrote about the year 180. Irenæus states that he was a convert from paganism to Christianity. His translation was of the Old Testament only, and is believed not to have included the book of Lamentations. It was collated with various anonymous manuscripts which, as Eusebius says, Origen searched up and traced to I know not what ancient lurking places, where they had lain concealed from remote times, and brought them to the light. In which, when it was doubtful to him from what author they came, he only added the remark that he had found this translation at Nicopolis, near Actium, 'but this other translation in such a place.' In the Hexapla indeed of the Psalms, after those four noted editions, he adds not only a fifth, but a sixth and seventh translation, and in one it is remarked that it was discovered at Jericho in a tub in the times of Antonine (Caracalla), the son of Severus.

¹ See Mommsen, p. 228, vol. ii.

3

¹ A native of Pontus, employed in public works at Jerusalem under Hadrian, and converted to Judaism, or as some say to Christianity.

The Hexapla, as Origen wrote it, perished like so many other precious volumes ; but his recension of the Septuagint was constantly copied from the original MSS. preserved at Cæsarea in the time of Eusebius and Pamphilius, and came into common use for public reading. Early in the seventh century Paul, Bishop of Pella, translated this edition of the Septuagint into Syriac, and for more than 1,000 years a copy of this translation was kept in one of the monasteries of the Nitrian desert. It is now in the British Museum, but in an incomplete state.

In the prosecution of such a work as this, and as his fame spread more and more, Origen gradually learned how mistaken had been his earlier self-maiming both of body and mind, and set himself to rectify his error as far as possible. He could not take back that birthright of manhood which he had so recklessly surrendered, but he returned with avidity to his studies in science and literature. Indeed, it afterwards became necessary for him to defend his secular studies against the censure of the narrow-minded and ignorant, and we have still part of the letter in which he did so. He writes :

When I had devoted myself wholly to the word, and my fame went abroad concerning my proficiency ; as I was sometimes visited by heretics, sometimes by those who were conversant with the studies of the Greeks, especially those that were pursuing philosophy, I was resolved to examine both the opinions of the heretics and those works of the philosophers who sometimes speak of the truth. This we have also done in imitation of Pantænus, by whom so many have been benefited before us, and who was not meanly furnished with erudition like this. In this I have also followed the example of Heraclas, who has now a seat in the presbytery of Alexandria, who I have found persevered five years with a teacher of philosophy before I began to attend to these studies.

And one of his most celebrated pupils in later years (Gregory Thaumaturgus) wrote of his master's method :

There was no subject forbidden to us, nothing hidden or inaccessible. We were allowed to become acquainted with every doctrine, barbarian or Greek, on things spiritual or evil, divine and human ; traversing with all freedom and investigating the whole circuit of knowledge, and satisfying ourselves with the full enjoyment of all the pleasures of the soul.

Besides the Hexapla, Origen began during this time that long series of commentaries on the books of the Bible, most of which are long since lost to us, though they were well known in the days of Eusebius. As the fame of the great Christian teacher of Alexandria, who seemed to bear a charmed life through all the troubles of that unhappy city, spread more and more through the civilised world, people came or sent to him from all countries. Eusebius mentions three separate expeditions to Arabia. It must be remembered that ' Arabia,' like India, was in these days a name of wide and vague significance. The town of Bostra, Botzra, or Bosrah, is in an oasis of the Syrian desert, now called the Hauran, about four days' journey to the south of Damascus.

The earliest of his expeditions took place during these years (from 203 to 215). On this first occasion it was the Governor of Arabia who sent letters, both to the Prefect of Egypt and the Patriarch of Alexandria, desiring that the man Origen might be sent to him without delay, to explain to him the doctrines of Christianity. It is extremely improbable that while the persecution continued such a message could have been openly sent from one governor to another. But in 211 Severus died, and the Christians of Egypt once more breathed freely. His son and successor, best known by his nickname of Caracalla, was by his early training and associates rendered favourable to Christianity, and with his accession the persecution came to an end. The date of Origen's first visit to Arabia may therefore be fixed about the year 212-13. He left Heraclas in charge of the school during his absence, which did not last very long. One Beryllus was appointed bishop of Bostra in Arabia, probably consecrated by Demetrius as head of the mission in that country. Origen could not be spared to remain there, even if it were not evident that Demetrius considered him, with all respect for his sanctity and learning, ineligible for admission to the priesthood.

Caracalla was the kind of man whom we should now call, with more signification than strict accuracy perhaps, a Levantine. His father was half Gaul, half African; his mother a Syrian woman, and this mixed origin well accords with the mixture of deceitful cunning, supple cleverness, and outbursts of savagery apparent in his character. In one of these latter he killed his brother, in their mother's presence, the year after they had jointly succeeded to the throne. Incidentally, and desiring only to increase his revenue, he changed the whole status of the Egyptian Christians at one stroke. A certain tax was imposed upon Roman citizens, from which aliens and serfs were free. Caracalla doubled the amount of this tribute, and extended the franchise to all the provinces. Henceforth, the long oppressed Egyptian, Carthaginian or Syrian could hold up his head on equal terms with the dominant race. If a Christian, though his life might still, at any moment, be declared forfeit to the State, he could no longer, unless actually a slave, be crucified, or thrown to wild beasts. His tortures must be only such as Roman citizens were liable to, and his final death must be by the sword.

It has already been mentioned that to the mocking spirit of the Alexandrians, whether Christian or Pagan, no emperor, living or dead, had any sacredness about him ; and many bitter jests and unflattering nicknames had been bestowed in turn upon the different Cæsars. Caracalla had suffered more than any of his predecessors at their tongues, and though he affected to despise their sayings, in reality they sank deep into his heart, and he was but waiting a favourable opportunity for revenge. In 215 he was in Syria, and announced his intention of visiting Alexandria. The inhabitants of that city, grateful for the three years of freedom from persecution which they had enjoyed under this emperor, forgetful of the sharp sayings in which they had signified their disapproval of his murder of his brother and other crimes, and ready enough to show loyalty by festivities, and public spectacles, made all ready to greet him with honour ; and crowds flocked into the city to witness the daily fêtes and hail him with acclamations during his visit.

When he announced that, having already a Macedonian phalanx, and a Spartan phalanx, he was about to honour the chief city of Egypt by the formation of an Alexandrian phalanx, the citizens greeted the idea with joyful readiness, and on the appointed day, thousands of young men ranged themselves on the plain outside the city, for the Emperor's inspection before they were enrolled, and given arms. It was a public holiday, and the friends and relations of the young men crowded out from the city in the bright sunshine to see the show. The regular army was drawn in close ranks round the parade ground, while Caracalla with his guards rode down the lines of volunteers, greeted with loyal acclamations. Then he withdrew, with the expected signal to the callous mercenaries, who well knew what butcher's work was expected of them. They levelled their spears, and charged from all sides upon the defenceless multitude. The shouts of joy and sounds of music were changed to shrieks of rage and despair, as the young men and their friends were butchered in cold blood, or thrust half dead to be drowned in the ditches and canals which led to the sea. It is said that the waters of the Nile flowed red to the sea with the blood of the sufferers. One or two terrified fugitives escaped, and, making their way to the city, struck consternation into all hearts with the news. No one knew what might happen next, and it seemed probable that this might be the first act of a more terrible persecution than any that had yet been known. It was said that the legions would be let loose on the city next, and that the Emperor had specially ordered the dissolution of the academies. All who could do so fled hurriedly from the city, and Eusebius, who does not mention Caracalla by name, but says of this terrible episode that 'a considerable war broke out in the city,' mentions that Origen was among those who made their escape out of Alexandria, and, 'not thinking it would be safe to stay in Egypt, came to Palestine, and took up his abode in Cæsarea.' Demetrius and Heraclas remained, and the Christians soon discovered that the rage of the Emperor was not specifically directed against them, though his revenge did not end here. He stopped the public games, and the allowance of corn to the citizens; also, to lessen the dangers of rebellion, he built fortifications between the city proper and the great palace quarter called the Bruchium. He encouraged the dying religion of ancient Egypt, and built a temple to Isis in Rome. Caracalla did not stay long in Alexandria, and two years afterwards was assassinated by Macrinus.

Meanwhile Origen had been received with the utmost honour in Cæsarea, so much so, that, in addition to his professorial lectures on week days, he was asked by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, who had been a fellow pupil of Origen's, and Theocistus, Bishop of Cæsarea, to preach publicly in the churches. When this came to the ears of Demetrius in Alexandria, he wrote to remonstrate with the two bishops for permitting a layman, even though he were Origen, to preach in the church. The bishops wrote back in respectful defence, quoting precedents for the course they had taken; but the stout old Patriarch was not to be moved. He next sent letters by deacons of the Church to Origen himself, exhorting him to cease these irregular practices and return, now that all was quiet again, to his proper work in Alexandria. Origen, with that humility which is one of the most beautiful traits in his character, at once obeyed, and returned to Alexandria.

Macrinus only reigned two months, but during that time he recalled the Prefect of Egypt, and sent Basilianus, a friend of his, with Marcus Secundus as second in command. The latter should be noted as the first senator that had ever held command in Egypt.

Caracalla had left no son, but his mother's sister, Julia Moesa, who was a Phœnician, had two daughters, each of whom had one son. These three women, Julia Moesa, Julia Soëmia, and Julia Mammea, had lived at the Roman Courts during the lifetime of Caracalla, but on his murder they were compelled to take refuge in Syria. Here they formed a successful plot to regain the power which had been lost to their family. Julia Soëmia gave out that Caracalla was the real father of her son. This boy had about six imperial names, but, like his predecessor, is generally known by a nickname. He was called Heliogabalus, or Elagabalus, in reference to his Syrian religion. The Roman legions in Syria readily acknowledged the boy, and received him, with his mother and grandmother, into their camp. A pitched battle between the followers of Macrinus and Heliogabalus decided the sovereignty in favour of the latter. But in Alexandria peace was not restored for some time. Every day the rival parties fought in the streets, till at length Marius Secundus was killed, and the prefect fled the country.

The four years' reign of Heliogabalus were evil days for most of the Roman world, but after the first, they were times of peace in Egypt. Origen continued his teaching and writing labours with renewed zeal; Demetrius, who never seems to have left his post for a single day, applied himself with greater diligence and freedom to the affairs of the Church; and the new pagan school of philosophy, founded by Ammonius Saccas,¹ grew and flourished.

¹ That Ammonius Saccas founded the School of the Alexandrian Platonists, and that not only Plotinus and Longinus, but the Christians, Origen and Heraclas, and others, were his pupils, is generally accepted by all writers. Opinions differ, however, whether Ammonius Saccas was himself at any time of his life a Christian.

About this time Origen made the acquaintance of a man of wealth and position who is called Ambrose 'of Alexandria'; but if he had been a native we should probably have heard of him before the time of Origen's return from Palestine. It seems more likely that he was one of the friends whom Origen made in Palestine. The warm affection which existed between them from this time till the death of Ambrose had an important influence on the life of Origen. Ambrose had belonged to one of the numerous heretical sects before he met Origen, who brought him into the fold of the Church. Many of Origen's principal books were written at the instigation and the cost of Ambrose, who maintained a staff of shorthand-writers and book-writers (some of whom were girls) for this purpose.

In 222 Alexander Severus became sole emperor. This youth was the son of Julia Mammea, who had returned to Rome with her sister Julia Soëmia on the accession of the latter's son Heliogabalus. The soldiery had grown tired of the savagery of their young ruler, and a strong party grew up in favour of his cousin Alexander. It came to open war at last, the two sisters, each with her son, placed themselves at the head of the rival armies, Soëmia and her son were slain, and Mammea's son took the throne.

Alexander Severus was then about 17, and was one of the best of the Roman Emperors. His short reign of eleven years shows a constant struggle with the lawlessness and corruption of the empire, and a brave effort to check the advance of their ancient enemy the Persians, who at this time experienced a wonderful renewal of national life. He protected the Christians, gave judgment in favour of their competency to own land, and though he did not openly forsake the Syrian worship, in which he had been educated, he regarded Christ as one of the greatest teachers that ever lived, and set up his statue, in company with those of Abraham, Orpheus, Alexander the Great, and Apollonius of Tyana, in his private chapel! By a confusion of names, not unnatural, when we remember that each emperor was known by a different name, or nickname, in almost every province of the empire, Alexander Severus was represented in later times as a persecutor of the Christians; but the evidence, not only of his contemporaries, but of all the historians for more than two centuries after his death, disproves this calumny. In his reign the philosophers at Alexandria, both Christian and Pagan, pursued their labours in peace. Plotinus, who was a native of Lycopolis (Assiout), brought the principles of neo-Platonism to their highest development, and Herodian worked at his history.

Origen appears to have been absent twice from Alexandria during this period, once when he was sent for to Mammea, the mother of the Emperor, and once when he was sent on affairs of the Church to Greece. This second journey was a crisis in his life, and ended in a rupture between him and his old friend and bishop, Demetrius. It is a sad story, and neither of them can be entirely absolved from blame, though much of the bitterness of the dispute was due to the partisanship of their different friends.

It is clear that Demetrius, while respecting the enthusiasm which had led to Origen's mistaken act of self-sacrifice in his youth, had all along regarded it as disqualifying him for the priesthood, which otherwise he was so well qualified to fill. Origen as evidently desired ordination, but till now had respected the decision of his bishop. Demetrius had again and again shown his confidence in Origen by the whole tenor of his behaviour, and by sending him, layman as he was, on special embassies connected with the affairs of the Church. It is probable that Ambrose and others of Origen's admirers were inclined to resent this exclusion from the divine office of the greatest theologian living, by a patriarch who up to the time of his unexpected elevation had been an illiterate farmer; and they urged him to defy Demetrius, and go to the Palestinian bishops, who were his old schoolfellows, and only too anxious to ordain him. However this may be, Origen, instead of going straight to Greece on the mission entrusted to him, went on his way to Palestine, and was ordained at Cæsarea.

Demetrius was very angry at this flat defiance of his authority. He wrote to those concerned in it in no measured terms, and when, some months afterwards, Origen returned to Alexandria, he soon found that his position had become untenable. He might have felt himself justified in the course which he had taken, but he was much too great both in mind and character not to see clearly that it would be wrong under the circumstances for him to remain in Alexandria. He resigned all connection with the Theological College, and prepared to leave the city altogether. It is difficult to estimate what scandal and disgrace might have been brought upon the Church if Origen's nobility and humility of character had not thus led him frankly to accept the consequences of his own actions, and withdraw into voluntary exile. Unfortunately Demetrius did not show the same magnanimity.

He had a right to refuse to receive into his diocese a priest whom he had always declared ineligible for ordination, and who had received orders from the bishops of another country in defiance of his known opinion. But he did not stop here. Though Origen, in accordance with the decision of the Council of Bishops and Presbyters whom Demetrius called together, resigned his connection with the Catechetical School, and left his native country, Demetrius was angered beyond measure at the kind of triumph with which he was received by his friends the Palestinian bishops, who had probably foreseen what would happen. To judge from the passage in which Eusebius alludes to their action, they seem to have paraded their affectionate admiration for Origen, and their contempt of the opinion of Demetrius, in a way which gave the latter some excuse for indignation. But even this cannot excuse the Patriarch's action. Smarting at the desertion and defiance of the man, who, after all, owed much to him, and whom he had loved from boyhood, he assembled his bishops and formally excommunicated Origen; sending letters to all the churches afterwards to notify them of the fact. Origen felt this excessive harshness keenly, as may be seen from the following extract, written after he was settled at Cæsarea:—

After this we were drawn forth from Egypt, for God rescued us, who led from thence his people. Afterwards when my enemy urged most bitter war against me, by his fresh letters, which were truly at enmity with the gospel, and roused all the winds, reason exhorted me to stand to the contest, and to save the ruling principle within me lest troublous disputes should avail to bring the storm even upon my own soul, rather than to compose the rest of my commentary before my understanding received calm. Further, the absence of my usual shorthand-writers prevented me from dictating my meditations. But now, since God has quenched the many fiery darts which have been hurled against me, so that their force is spent, and my soul, familiarised with the things which have happened because of the Heavenly Word, is constrained to endure more easily the assaults that have been made upon me; having as it were, obtained some fair weather, I wish to defer no longer the dictation of what remains.

The sentence of excommunication was treated as a dead letter by the Bishops of Arabia, Greece, Cappadocia, and Palestine. Origen exercised in Palestine all the functions of a priest, in addition to his continued labours as a teacher and theologian. He seems, however, to have been troubled sometimes, in his sensitive humility, lest after all he had done wrong. In Jerusalem he read out for his text: 'But unto the wicked, saith God, Why dost thou take my covenant in the mouth, seeing thou hatest to be reformed, and hast cast My words behind Me.' Then, apparently struck by a bitter consciousness that his old friend and bishop would have applied such words to himself, he burst into such a passion of tears, that he was unable to proceed with his sermon; and all the congregation wept with him.

Origen finally settled at Cæsarea, where Ambrose, with his wife and family, at once joined him, and pupils thronged to him. His two schoolfellows who had been his dear friends in Egypt, Heraclas and Dionysius, never slackened in their personal affection for him, but on the actual point in dispute they must have shared the opinion of Demetrius, for though, in Origen's lifetime, they both succeeded to the Patriarchate, they neither of them offered to recall him to Alexandria. Not long after this melancholy quarrel with his old favourite, Demetrius died, at a great age, having seen no less than six successive emperors ascend the throne. Heraclas succeeded him in the Patriarchate, and Dionysius became head of the Catechetical School.

CHAPTER VIII

THE PERSECUTION OF DECIUS

A.D. 235 Two years after Origen's departure from his native land, the Emperor Alexander was murdered by Maximinus—a barbarian giant, who owed almost everything to him, even the position in the army which enabled him to become the idol of those fickle soldiers, and organise the conspiracy against his master. As usual, the Senate could do nothing against the choice of the army, and Maximin was acknowledged as emperor. He at once commenced hostilities against the Christians, apparently because they had been specially trusted and favoured by Alexander. The persecution was in Italy and Palestine. Ambrosius and another friend and pupil of Origen at Cæsarea were arrested and carried prisoners to Germany. Origen escaped, and took refuge in Cæsarea of Cappadocia, whose bishop, Firmilianus, was also his warm friend and admirer. Here he lived for some time in the house of a rich and cultivated woman named Juliana. In Egypt Heraclas retired from Alexandria to escape the persecution of Maximin, but several Egyptians, both from Alexandria and the provinces, lost their lives in it.

The tyrannous usurpation did not last very long. Before three years were over a revolt in Mauritania raised the two Gordians, father and son, to the Imperial throne for three months. On their deaths, the son in battle, the father by his own hand, Maximus and Balbinus were elected, and in the war which followed Maximus was assassinated by his own soldiers. The mob and the army however were not yet content. The Gordian family were the idols of the hour. The two Emperors who had been elected by the Senate were murdered in the palace at Rome, and Gordian the Third, a boy of fifteen, was invested with the Roman purple. On his accession the land had rest from persecution, though not from war. Origen returned from Cappadocia and rejoined Ambrose, whose life was probably saved by the reversal of authority consequent on these revolutions. The six years' reign of Gordian call for no special remark. They were years of peace and apparently of growth on the part of the Christian Church in Egypt, for we are told that Heraclas created several new sees. Some writers have asserted that Heraclas was the first Egyptian Patriarch who was called Pope; but this is a mistake, the title was in use in Egypt from the earliest times, and was originally applied to the priests as well as the bishop. Julius Africanus visited Egypt at this time.

It was probably during the later years of the reign of Gordian that Origen took his second journey into Arabia where Beryllus, Bishop of Bostra, had fallen into heresy, and was teaching that our Lord did not exist before his human birth. Origen had many discussions with him, and finally Beryllus was convinced of his error, so that a fresh schism in the Church was averted. Origen must have heard a good deal during this visit of a certain Philip, a native of Bostra, whose father is called 'a noted robber chief'—in other words, a Bedawi of the desert. This Philip had been made prætorian prefect, and was already intriguing against his imperial master. All through the reign of Gordian the Persians had been harassing the eastern frontier of the empire, and at last Gordian determined to march against them in person. So little was a defeat expected that Plotinus, the Platonic philosopher of Alexandria, joined the expedition in hopes of learning something of the Persian philosophy. But Philip chose this opportunity to betray his master; Gordian was slain, at the age of twenty-one, and Philip, concluding a hasty peace with the Persians, returned to Rome. Here also came Plotinus, who had escaped with difficulty from the rout of the army, and being joined by others of the learned men of Alexandria, he lived and taught at Rome for the rest of his life.

Eusebius calls Philip a Christian, but as he afterwards himself mentions Constantine as the first Christian emperor, and as Philip undoubtedly persecuted the Christians, at any rate in Egypt, it seems probable that this is a mistake. Just before the persecution began Heraclas died, and was succeeded by Dionysius, who had been head of the Theological College.

Dionysius was a man of good family, who was educated as a pagan. It is said that one day a poor Christian woman lent him the Epistles of St. Paul to read, and they interested him so much that he bought the book and asked if the Christians had any more books of the same kind which he could borrow. She advised him to apply to the priests, who readily lent him other books. He became a Christian and a pupil of Origen. It seems clear that he had been a married man, if his wife were not still alive at the time of his elevation to the Patriarchate. Dionysius was one of the most celebrated men of his time, and many of his letters are still preserved, some of which will be here inserted, as giving a vivid picture of these troubled times. His successor, as head of the Catechetical School, was Pierus, a learned priest and writer. Pierus was also celebrated for his eloquence, which gained for him the name of the younger Origen. Some say that he suffered martyrdom; if so, it must have been in the persecution of Valerian. The date of his death is nowhere given, but when Theonas became Patriarch, in 282, the head of the School was Theognostus, of whom little is known. The celebrated Pamphilus of Cæsarea received his education at the Alexandrian College under Pierus.

The outbreak of persecution under Philip appears to have been confined to the Egyptian province, and to have been due rather to local bigotry than to any State enactment. Dionysius, writing afterwards to Fabian, Bishop of Antioch, gives an account of it as follows:—

The persecution with us did not begin with the imperial edict, but preceded it a whole year. And a certain prophet and poet, inauspicious to the city whoever he was, excited the mass of the heathen against us, stirring them up to their native superstition. Stimulated by him, and taking full liberty to exercise any kind of wickedness, they considered this the only piety, and the worship of their demons, viz., to slay us. First then, seizing a certain aged man named Metra, they called upon him to utter impious expressions, and as he did not obey, they beat his body with clubs, and pricked his face and eyes; after which they led him away to the suburbs, where they stoned him . . . Then, with one accord, all rushed upon the houses of the pious, and whomsoever of their neighbours they knew, they drove thither in all haste, and despoiled and plundered them, setting apart the more valuable of the articles for themselves; but the more common and wooden furniture they threw about and burnt in the roads, presenting a sight like a city taken by the enemy. But the brethren retired, and gave way, and like those to whom Paul bears witness, they also regarded the plunder of their goods with joy. And I know not whether any besides one, who fell into their hands, has thus far denied the Lord. But they also seized that admirable virgin, Apollonia, then in advanced age, and beating her jaws, they broke out all her teeth, and kindling a fire before the city, threatened to burn her alive, unless she would repeat their impious expressions. She appeared at first to shrink a little, but when suffered to go, she suddenly sprang into the fire and was consumed. They also seized a certain Serapion in his own house, and after torturing him with the severest cruelties, and breaking all his limbs, threw him headlong from an upper storey. But there was no way, no public road, no lane, where we could walk, whether by day or night; as they all, at all times and places, cried out, whoever would refuse to repeat those impious expressions, that he should be immediately dragged forth and burnt. These things continued to prevail for the most part after this manner. But as the sedition and civil war overtook the wretches,¹ their cruelty was diverted from us to one another. We then drew a little breath, whilst their rage against us was a little abated. But, presently, that change from a milder reign was announced to us, and much terror was now threatening us. The decree had arrived,² very much like that which was foretold by our Lord, exhibiting the most dreadful aspect; so that, if it were possible, the very elect would stumble. All, indeed, were greatly alarmed, and many of the more eminent immediately gave way to them; others, who were in public offices, were led forth by their very acts; others were brought by their acquaintance, and when called by name, they approached the impure and unholy sacrifices. But, pale and trembling, as if they were not to sacrifice, but themselves to be the victims and the sacrifices to the idols, they were jeered by many of the surrounding multitude, and were obviously equally afraid to die and to offer the sacrifice. But some advanced with greater readiness to the altars, and boldly asserted that they had never before been Christians. Concerning whom the declaration of our Lord is most true, that they will hardly (i.e. with difficulty) be saved. Of the rest, some followed the one or the other of the preceding; some fled, others were taken, and of these some held out as far as the prison and bonds, and some after a few days' imprisonment abjured (Christianity) before they entered the tribunal. But some, also, after enduring the torture for a time, at last renounced. Others, however, firm and blessed pillars of the Lord, confirmed by the Lord himself, and receiving in themselves strength and power, suited and proportioned to their faith, became admirable witnesses of his kingdom. The first of these was Julian, a man afflicted with the gout, neither able to walk nor stand, who, with two others that carried him, was arraigned. Of these, the one immediately denied, but the other, named Cronion, surnamed Eunus, and the aged Julian himself, having confessed the Lord, were carried on camels throughout the whole city—a very large one, as you know—and in this elevation were scourged, and finally consumed in an immense fire, surrounded by the thronging crowds of spectators.

¹ This refers to the civil war, which ended in the murder of Philip and accession of Decius.

² Of Decius—early in the year 250.

Here follow accounts of the martyrdom of six men and four women, with whom was a youth named Dioscorus. Some of them were brought in from the provinces, others were citizens of Alexandria.

After scourging the rest (he continues) he also delivered them to the fire. But Dioscorus was dismissed by the judge, who admired the great wisdom of his answers to the questions proposed to him, with the view, as he said, to give him further time for repentance on account of his age. And now this most godly Dioscorus is among us, expecting a longer and a more severe conflict.

This letter was written soon after the renewal of the persecution in the reign of Decius ; but the next which we shall insert refers to the earlier period mentioned in the first half of this letter ; the outbreak under Philip. Germanus, a bishop in the interior of Egypt, had heard that Dionysius, unlike Demetrius, had withdrawn from Alexandria very soon after this persecution began, and had not returned till the struggle for the empire between Decius and Philip gave the Christians that breathing-space to which Dionysius alludes in the foregoing letter. Supposing this to be the effect of cowardice, Germanus reproached his patriarch, and drew forth the following earnest and dignified defence from Dionysius :—

To Germanus, . . . But I speak before God, and he knows that I lie not ; it was never by my own counsel, nor without divine intimation, that I projected my flight. But before the persecution of Decius, Sabinus, at the very hour, sent Frumentarius to search for me. And I, indeed, stayed at home about four days, expecting the arrival of Frumentarius. But he went about examining all places, the roads, the rivers, the fields, where he suspected that I would go, or lie concealed. But he was smitten with blindness, not being able to find the house, for he could not believe that I would remain at home when persecuted. Four days had scarcely elapsed when God ordered me to remove, and opened the way for me in a most remarkable manner. I and my domestics, and many of my brethren, went forth together. And that this happened by the providence of God, was shown by what followed, and in which, perhaps, we were not unprofitable to some. . . . But about sunset, being seized, together with my company, by the soldiers, I was led to Taposiris. But Timothy,¹ by the providence of God, happened not to be present, nor even seized. But coming afterwards, he found the house deserted, and servants guarding it, and us he found reduced to slavery. . . . A certain man of the country met Timothy flying, and much disturbed, and when he was asked the cause of his haste, he declared the truth. When he heard it, he went his way, for he was going to a marriage festival (as it is the custom with them on these occasions to keep the whole night), and when he entered he told it to those that were present at the feast. These, forthwith, with a single impulse, as if by agreement, all arose, and came as quick as possible in a rush upon us, and as they rushed they raised a shout. The soldiers that guarded us immediately took to flight, and they came upon us, lying as we were upon the bare bedsteads. I indeed, as God knows, supposed them at first to be robbers, who had come to plunder and pillage. Remaining, therefore, on my bed, naked as I was, only covered with a linen garment, the rest of my dress I offered them as it lay beside me. But they commanded me to rise and to depart as quick as possible. Then, understanding for what purpose they had come, I began to weep, beseeching and praying them to go away and to let us alone. But if they wished to do us any good, to anticipate those that had led me away, and to cut off my head. When I thus cried out, as my companions and partners in all my distresses well know, they attempted to raise me by force. I then cast myself on my back upon the ground. But they seized me by the hands and feet, and dragged me away, whilst those who were witnesses of all these things, Caius, Faustus, Peter, and Paul, followed on. These also, taking me up, bore me away from the town, and carried me off on an unsaddled ass.

¹ Probably the son of the Patriarch.

This persecution of Decius was very severe in Palestine also, and this time Origen did not escape. He had recently paid his third visit to Arabia, where certain members of the Church were preaching that the soul died with the body and rose again with it, but not before.¹ Origen was again

¹ The ancient Egyptian belief was that although the body died, the spirit (Ba) and the human soul (Ka) continued to live; the one in appealed to, and again successful in convincing those whose opinions were opposed to the received doctrine of the Church. On his return into Palestine, Origen was thrown into prison. Eusebius gives us no particulars of his arrest, but after mentioning that both Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, and Babylas, Bishop of Antioch, died in prison after torture, he continues :—

But the number and greatness of Origen's sufferings there during the persecution . . . under an iron collar and in the deepest recesses of the prison, when for many days he was extended and stretched to the distance of four holes on the rack, besides the threats of fire, and whatever other sufferings inflicted by his enemies, he nobly bore. And finally the issue of these sufferings, when the judge eagerly strove with all his might to protract his life (in order to prolong his sufferings) and what expressions after these he left behind, replete with benefit to those needing consolation ; all this the many epistles of the man detail with no less truth than accuracy.

Only two of these many letters have been preserved entire, and neither of them tell us anything about the persecution. The rest are mere fragments. Since almost all of Eusebius' book on Origen has been lost, too, it is strange how vivid an impression of the man's personality stands out against the sombre background of the time. Origen's torture lasted long, and wore out an already enfeebled frame. He was cheered by receiving a letter from Dionysius encouraging and sympathizing with him. This letter has not been preserved.

So many Christians fell away during this persecution another world, the other in the mummy, prepared to contain it till the Day of Resurrection, when the Ba and the Ka would be again re-united. Hence the importance attached to the preservation of the mummy, as the Ka's resting-place.

and sacrificed when demanded, that it became a serious question in the Church how to treat them when the persecution slackened, and they came to confess their fault and to entreat that they might be received back into the Church. Afterwards a regular system of penance was drawn up by the Church to meet such cases. They must have occurred during every persecution ; but this seems to have been the first time that the question became a practical one, and it occasioned a good deal of correspondence between the bishops of the different provinces. Most of them were inclined to show mercy on evidence of repentance, but Novatus, a priest of Rome, whose own record was not very good, and who had procured, from bishops of a distant province by false representation, his own consecration as Bishop of Rome, was so violent in his condemnation of those who had fallen away in time of persecution, that he created a partial schism. He declared that those who had once denied Christ in persecution could never be received into communion again, whatever penance they might perform, as the Church had no power to forgive them. A council of at least sixty bishops, besides priests and deacons, was called at Carthage, under the presidency of Cyprian, to consider the matter, and passed unanimously the following resolution :—

That Novatus, and those united with him who had determined to adopt the uncharitable and most inhuman opinion of the man, these they considered among those that were alienated from the Church ; but that brethren who had incurred any calamity should be treated and healed with the remedy of repentance.

The one thing on which all the parties agreed was in appealing to the Bishop or Pope of Alexandria. Cornelius, who had recently been elected Bishop of Rome in place of the martyred Fabian—for their irregular consecration of Novatus¹ was never acknowledged except by his own small party—wrote to Dionysius in somewhat heated and extravagant terms of complaint of that ‘artful and malicious beast,’ as he calls Novatus; and Novatus himself wrote to Dionysius excusing himself for his irregular consecration, and declaring that it had been forced upon him by certain brethren. The violent reproaches of Cornelius and Cyprian seem to have had no effect upon Novatus, but the following letter from Dionysius must surely have touched his heart:—

Dionysius sends greeting to his brother Novatus. If, as you say, you were forced against your will, you will show it by retiring voluntarily. For it was a duty to suffer everything, rather than to afflict the Church of God; and indeed it would not be less glorious to suffer even martyrdom for her sake than for refusing to sacrifice to idols; in my opinion, it would have been a greater glory. For in the one case the individual gives a testimony for the sake of his own soul, in the other for that of the whole Church. And now, if you can persuade or constrain your brethren to return to concord, your well doing will be greater than your fault; but if you have no influence with them and they refuse, save at least your own soul. With the hope that you are desirous of peace in the Lord, I bid you farewell.

Dionysius also wrote to Fabius of Antioch, who seemed inclined to adopt the uncharitable views of Novatus. We give one extract:—

¹ Eusebius and Socrates call him Novatus all through. He is by many authorities called Novatian, to distinguish him from his namesake, contemporary, and friend, Novatus of Carthage. Some writers, indeed, consider Novatian to be the correct form of the name.

But I will give you one example that occurred with us. There was a certain Serapion, an aged believer, who had passed his long life irreproachably, but as he had sacrificed during the persecution, though he frequently begged, no one would listen to him. He was taken sick, and continued three days in succession speechless and senseless. On the fourth day, recovering a little, he called his grandchild to him, and said, 'O son, how long do you detain me? I beseech you hasten, and quickly absolve me. Call one of the presbyters to me.' Saying this, he again became speechless. The boy ran to the presbyter. But it was night, and the presbyter was sick. As I had, however, before issued an injunction, that those at the point of death, if they desired it, and especially if they entreated for it before, should receive absolution, that they might depart from life in comfortable hope, I gave the boy a small portion of the eucharist, telling him to dip it in water, and to drop it into the mouth of the old man. The boy returned with the morsel. When he came near, before he entered, Serapion having again recovered himself, said, 'Thou hast come, my son, but the presbyter could not come. But do thou quickly perform what thou art commanded, and dismiss me.' The boy moistened it, and at the same time dropped it into the old man's mouth. And he, having swallowed a little, immediately expired. Was he not, then, evidently preserved, and did he not continue living until he was absolved, and his sins being wiped away, he could be acknowledged as a believer for the many good acts that he had done?

The story of Paul the hermit belongs to this persecution, though he did not become famous till long afterwards, and Dionysius appears to have known nothing about him. He was a native of the Lower Thebaid, and was left an orphan at the age of fifteen. He inherited a considerable property, and had been well educated. After the death of his parents he lived in the house of a sister, whose husband was apparently not a Christian, till the outbreak of the Decian persecution, when he retired for safety to a country house belonging to his brother-in-law. Here, not long afterwards, he was warned, probably by his own sister, that his brother-in-law intended to inform against him to the Government, for the sake of acquiring his property. Acting in accordance with the letter of Scripture, Paul at once made over the whole of his possessions to his sister and her husband, and announced his intention to devote himself to a solitary life of communion with God in the desert as St. Frontonius had done before him. He bade farewell to his sister and went forth alone into the desert, which is within a day's walk of the river anywhere south of Memphis. He lived a wandering life there for some time, but one day he discovered by accident a retreat among the hills which suited him so well that he took up his permanent abode there. The entrance was well concealed from the outside, but inside it opened out into a good-sized space, surrounded on all sides by inaccessible rocks, and open only to the blue sky. Here he found strange tools and old metals which had been abandoned for centuries; in fact, as his education soon enabled him to discover, he had stumbled upon an illicit mint which had been used by false coiners in the days of Cleopatra the Great. But, more important for his purposes, a date palm grew in this secluded nook, and a tiny spring of water ran beneath it which lost itself almost immediately in the sand. In this retreat Paul established himself, and here he is said to have lived the hermit's life for ninety years. If so, he must have been about 112 years old when he died, for he was twenty-two when he settled in the cave. The thing is not absolutely incredible, for we know that many of these Egyptian hermits lived to an enormous age. His sole food at first was dates and water, but as the simple country folk of the nearest inhabited district became aware of the presence of the holy man, they used to bring him offerings of green food and bread, and ask his advice on all important occasions. He preached Christianity to them when they came out to him, and became so great a power that his fame travelled far, and shortly before his death Anthony himself came to see him, and remained to give his body burial.¹

At the time of Paul's flight from the world he was but one of unknown hundreds who forsook all for Christ's sake in the country of Egypt. But a time of deliverance, though but a short time, was at hand. In October 251 Decius was slain in an expedition against the Goths, who invaded the Roman empire for the first time in 250; and Gallus, his successor, allowed the persecution to drop. Some time afterwards, in writing to Stephen, the new Bishop of Rome, Dionysius congratulated the Church that with the cessation of the persecution the schism of Novatus had also come to an end.

It was during the persecution of Decius that Mercurius, familiarly known as Abu Sefayn, or 'the father of two swords,' suffered martyrdom. The accounts of this saint, one of the most widely known and revered in Egypt, are conflicting and obscure; and the legends dwell more on his coming down from heaven to kill Julian the Apostate, than on any detail of his life. Two versions of the Egyptian legend concerning him are given in the second volume of Mr. Butler's book on Coptic Churches.

The death of Decius set Origen free, but not in time to save his life. He lingered about a year afterwards, and died at Tyre, early in 253, being sixty-nine years old. Where he died there he was buried, and his tomb was known and honoured till the city was destroyed. A splendid cathedral was built over his tomb, which was visited by many travellers; but by the middle of the sixteenth century the place where Origen lay was only known by tradition. To this day it is said that the natives point out the relic of an ancient church, now covered by their huts, and say that the body of 'Oriunus' lies in a vault underneath.

¹ A full account of the life and death of Paul will be found in Kingsley's 'Hermits.'

In a popular history any criticism of the works of this great Egyptian would be out of place. The number of his books is very large; indeed, Epiphanius states that popular report attributed six thousand works to him! This must be a mistake of the copyist for six hundred; but, even so, the amount is extraordinary, considering all the circumstances of the time. Only a limited number have been preserved to our day, and many of these are incomplete. They included lengthy commentaries on almost every book of the Old and New Testaments; replies to Celsus and other heretics, exhortations, homilies, and treatises beyond counting. The most celebrated and characteristic are his book 'On First Principles,' written at Alexandria, when he was about thirty years old; the 'Hexapla,' the 'Reply to Celsus,' and the essay on 'Prayer.'

The story of the Church of Carthage has nothing to do with our subject, yet it is worth while to pause for a moment and contrast briefly the two Churches in Africa, and the characters of the great men whom they both produced about this time. Tertullian, who lived to a decrepit old age, was but lately dead, and Cyprian was at the height of his power and fame. To read the writings of these two, and compare them with the writings of Clement and Origen, is to wonder whether they could really have been members of the same faith. Nowhere are racial characteristics more sharply contrasted. Both Churches were planted on African soil, but the Church of Alexandria was Egyptian by descent and Greek in language ; the Church of Carthage was Phœnician by descent and Latin in language.

If we try the spirits of the two African Churches we are struck by the extraordinary difference in their temper and their teaching. Both held to the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, but like the pillar of cloud, which seemed to some a shaft of fire, the Creed was to the Church of Alexandria a radiant beacon ; to the Church of Carthage a mystery of clouds and darkness. Tertullian and Origen, Clement, and, in later years, Augustine, recited the same formulas of faith ; but to the Carthaginians they conveyed very different views of the Divine Nature from those which the Alexandrians found in them. The ancient religion of the founders of Carthage consisted of fierce rites and bloody sacrifices, and gloried in oaths binding men to lifelong vengeance. Christian precepts dominated this angry spirit, but had not changed it, so the God of Tertullian's theology was a Being exulting in the agonies of His rebellious creatures, and hoarding purposes of vengeance from generation to generation. The fierce denunciations and harsh decisions of Augustine passed into the popular theology of the West, while for centuries the loving genius of Origen was ignored, and the mystical speculations with which he pleased himself were condemned as heresy. It is a fact, full of significance, that we have canonized Augustine and excommunicated Origen.

The fierce Church of Carthage has passed away from the earth, the Egyptian Church is but a shadow of her former self; but, as a sympathetic student¹ has pointed out, her art, even in its decline, is still honourably distinguished by an absence of ghastly images. Though the Church of Egypt has suffered more from persecution, and the terrible tortures too often consequent thereon, than any other Church in the world, they have not destroyed the tender hopefulness of her religious life. Go where you will in the poverty-stricken Egyptian churches, you will not find one representation of hell or torture, no grinning skull or ghastly skeleton. Her martyrs smile calmly down from the walls, as if the memory of their sufferings were long forgotten. Warrior saints there are, indeed, who slay in fair fight a dragon or a crowned apostate; but their own sufferings are never represented, nor those of any sinner after death. They are content to leave not only themselves, but their enemies and oppressors, to the mercy of God.

¹ Mr. Butler in his 'Coptic Churches.'

CHAPTER IX

THE PERSECUTION OF VALERIAN

A.D. 254 ON the death of Decius there was the usual scramble for the empire. Gallus seized the sovereign power for two years, and with his son Æmilianus established himself for a few months in Pannonia. During this time the persecution of the Christians was dropped, but it seems that the terrible outbreak of diphtheria, which Dionysius alludes to in a following letter, began even before the accession of Gallus.

In July 254, Valerian, a man of good Roman birth, who had filled all the high offices of state, was recognised as Emperor, and his son Gallienus associated with him in the government. The bishops of Rome changed almost as rapidly as the emperors. Since Dionysius had succeeded to the Patriarchate of Alexandria he had known Fabian, Cornelius, Lucius, Stephen, and now we find him writing to Xystus, Bishop of Rome, who had succeeded Stephen, concerning a man who had been baptized with the baptism of heretics and desired to be re-baptized. Apparently the heretics in question were followers of Novatianus, who taught that there was no forgiveness of sins committed after baptism—a doctrine which had fatal effects in causing people to put off their baptism, as in the case of Constantine, till just before death.

At the beginning of his reign, Valerian had shown himself favourable to the Christians, and his palace was filled with believers. But he was more inclined himself to the ancient wisdom of the Egyptians, and one of his most trusted councillors was the Prætorian Prefect Macrianus, who was an Egyptian. Dionysius calls him 'the master and chief ruler of the Egyptian magi'; by which he probably meant that Macrianus was an influential member of the ancient priest-royal caste of Egypt. At any rate, he seems to have been devoted to the ancient religion of his country, and was never tired of impressing upon his royal master that the distresses of the empire were due to the neglect of the true gods and the tolerance of this vile superstition of the crucified carpenter. Indeed, the distresses of the empire were greater at that time than they had ever been before. From all sides the barbarians—Goths, Germans, Franks, Burgundians, and Persians—poured, into the different provinces of the empire, ravaging and laying waste the land. City after city was taken by storm, from Tarragona in Spain to Antioch in Syria. And, above all, the plague, which had begun before the death of Decius, grew more and more deadly, especially in Egypt, where it lasted fifteen years. Dionysius lays the whole blame of the renewed persecution on Macrianus; doubtless an ancient enemy of his in the faith, of whom even he can hardly speak with charity.

A letter to Germanus, who had again reproached Dionysius, this time apparently for suspending the public assemblies of the Church, gives an account of his own arrest, and of the confession which they at once made before the prefect. He describes how they were sent prisoners to Cephro:—

But in Cephro a large congregation collected with us,

partly of the brethren that accompanied us from the city, partly of those that joined us from Egypt; and thus God opened a door for the word likewise there. And at first, indeed, we were persecuted, we were stoned; but, at last, not a few of the heathen, abandoning the idols, turned to God, for the word was then first sown among them as they had never before heard it. And thus, as if God had conducted us for this cause to them, after we had fulfilled this ministry, we were again transferred to another part. . . . For Æmilianus designed to transport us, as it seemed, to places more rough, and more replete with Libyan horrors, and he commanded those in the Mareotic district everywhere to collect, appointing them separate villages throughout the country. But our party, together with those that should be first taken, he commanded to be left on the way. For, no doubt, it was among his plans and preparations, that whenever he wished to seize us he might easily take us captive. But when I was first ordered to go away to Cephro, though I knew not the place where it was, having scarcely even heard the name before, yet I nevertheless went away cheerfully and calmly. But when it was told me to remove to the parts of Colluthion, those present know how I was affected. For here I shall accuse myself. At first, indeed, I was afflicted, and bore it hard. For though these places happened to be more known and familiar to me, yet they said that it was a region destitute of brethren and good men, and exposed to the insolence of travellers, and the incursions of robbers. But I received comfort from the brethren, who reminded me that it was nearer to the city. Cephro indeed brought us a great number of brethren promiscuously from Egypt, so that we were able to spread the Church farther; but as the city was nearer there (Colluthion) we should more frequently enjoy the sight of those that were really beloved and most dear to us. For they would come, and would tarry, and as if in the more remote suburbs there would be still meetings in part. And it was so.

Of the priests and deacons mentioned by Dionysius in this letter, Eusebius tells us that Faustus suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Diocletian at a great age; Maximus succeeded Dionysius himself as Patriarch of Alexandria, and Eusebius became subsequently Bishop of Laodicea. Dionysius relates that on his return to Alexandria only three of the deacons, many of whom had remained in hiding in the city to minister to the brethren, were found to have survived—Faustus, Eusebius, and Chæremon; all the others having died of the plague.

The persecution of Valerian only lasted forty-two months. In 260 he was taken alive by the Persians, and lived in captivity till his death. Gallienus, who succeeded him, made Odenathus, king of Palmyra, his colleague in the East, and imposed on him the duty of defending that frontier from the Persians. He also put a stop to the persecution, and Dionysius made a lengthened tour in Egypt among his scattered people, consecrating and ordaining, where it was necessary, and striving to comfort them in their afflictions. In the diocese of Arsinoe,¹ he found the beginning of a very promising schism, and it is instructive to see how he dealt with it.

The former bishop of this diocese was one Nepos, a learned man of very high character, whose flock believed in him implicitly. He had taught them to look for a material reign of a thousand years of Christ in person upon the earth, interpreting literally all passages of this nature in the Apocalypse, and had written a book against those who declared the book to be a sacred allegory. While he lived, the people of his diocese were content to accept his teaching without troubling themselves about the opinion of the rest of the religious world; but after his death, as so often happens, they began to dispute with one another, and finally formed a separate party under the leadership of one Coracion. Fortunately, however, they all agreed in appealing to the patriarch on his arrival, and Dionysius was equal to the occasion. He received them all with equal respect and courtesy, and, calling together the priests and deacons of the diocese, with any of the faithful laity who chose to attend, he proposed that the matter should be quietly and candidly discussed, and the treatise of Nepos read aloud among them, that they might all agree in godly union and concord. The people readily consented, and for three days, from morning till night, the good bishop sat among his people—as we may see the teachers sitting at this day among a crowd of disputants on the floor of the El Azhar, hearing and asking questions. The result shall be given in his own words:—

¹ In the Fayoum.

¹ Then also I was greatly pleased to observe the constancy, the sincerity, the docility and intelligence of the brethren as we proceeded to advance in order; and the moderation of our questions and doubts and mutual concessions. For we studiously avoided in every possible way insisting upon those opinions which were once adopted by us, though they might appear to be correct. Nor did we attempt to make objections, but endeavoured as far as possible to keep to our subject, and to confirm these. Nor ashamed, if reason prevailed, to change opinions, and to acknowledge the truth, but rather received with a good conscience and sincerity, and with single hearts, before God, whatever was established by the proofs and doctrines of the Holy Scriptures. At length Coracion, who was the founder and leader of this doctrine, in the hearing of all the brethren present, confessed and avowed to us, that he would no longer adhere to it nor discuss it, that he would neither mention nor teach it, as he had been fully convinced by the opposite arguments. The other brethren present rejoice also at this conference, and at the conciliatory spirit and unanimity exhibited by all.

¹ From the 'Treatise on the Promises,' by Dionysius.

At a later period Dionysius found it necessary to refute these opinions in writing, which he did in the 'Treatise on Promises,' from which we give the following extract :—

But they produce a certain work of Nepos, upon which they lay great stress, as if he advanced things that are irrefragable, when he asserts that there will be an earthly reign of Christ. In many other respects I agree with and greatly love Nepos, both on account of his faith and industry, and his great study in the Scriptures ; as also for his great attention to psalmody, by which many are still delighted. I greatly reverence the man also, for the manner in which he has departed this life. But the truth is to be loved and honoured before all. It is just, indeed, that we should applaud and approve whatever is said aright, but it is also a duty to examine and correct whatever may not appear to be written with sufficient soundness. If, indeed, he were present, and were advancing his sentiments orally, it would be sufficient to discuss the subject without writing, and to convince and confirm the opponents by question and answer. But as the work is published, and as it appears the same is calculated to convince ; as there are some teachers who say that the law and prophets are of no value, and who give up following the Gospels, and who depreciate the Epistles of the Apostles (and who at the same time announced the doctrine of this work as a great and hidden mystery), and who also do not have any sublime and great conception, either of the glorious and truly divine appearance of our Lord, nor of our own resurrection and our being gathered and assimilated to Him ; but they persuade them to expect what is little and perishable, and such a state of things as now exists, in the kingdom of God. It becomes necessary, therefore, for us also to reason with our brother Nepos as if he were present.

In the course of this book he carefully examines the Book of Revelation, and shows that it is impossible it should be understood in the obvious and literal sense. He also states modestly but firmly, and giving good reasons for his own opinion, that the Apocalypse was not written by the Apostle John, though he says he does not deny that it is the work of a John, and, moreover, the work of some holy and inspired man. But while clearly showing that the Gospel and Apocalypse could hardly have been written by the same man, he says : ' For my part I would not venture to set this work aside, as there are many brethren that value it much.'

These examples will show the spirit in which Dionysius both met and exercised criticism. But he had not much leisure in his episcopate for such writings. His pastoral epistles he never failed to make time for, though it was often difficult to send them when written. Peace from persecution had hardly been established when civil war again broke out. Macrianus assumed the purple, and did his best to make himself sole master of the empire. But it was not to be expected that Christian Egypt would acquiesce in the reign of a man who, though he might be of their own blood, had shown himself their worst enemy. In Alexandria, therefore, the Prefect Æmilianus was set up in opposition both to Macrianus and to Gallienus, who was living idly at Rome. This man took the name of Alexander, and governed Egypt during his short reign with great vigour. He marched down through the whole country and drove the southern barbarians back into the Soudan with a courage and quickness to which they had been unaccustomed of late. The tribute sent to Rome was stopped, and Egypt bade fair to regain her independence. But Theodotus, the general of Gallienus, came to the rescue of the Roman domination and attacked Æmilianus in Alexandria. The latter fortified himself in the Bruchium quarter, and Theodotus laid siege to him, occupying the other half of the city. The situation is best described in Dionysius's own words. This letter is addressed to Hierax, another bishop in Egypt:—

But what cause of wonder is there, if it be difficult for me also to address epistles to those that are so very remote, when I am at a loss to consult for my own life, or to reason with myself? For, indeed, I have great need to send epistolary addresses to those who are as my own bowels, my associates and dearest brethren and members of the same Church. But how I shall send these I cannot devise. For it would be more easy for anyone, I would not say to go beyond the limits of the province, but even to travel from east to west, than to go from Alexandria to Alexandria itself. For the very heart of the city is more desolate and impassable than that vast and trackless desert which the Israelites traversed in two generations, and our smooth and tranquil harbours have become like that sea which opened and arose like walls on both sides, enabling them to drive through, and in whose highway the Egyptians were overwhelmed. For often they appear like the Red Sea, from the frequent slaughters committed in them; but the river¹ which washes the city has sometimes appeared more dry than the parched desert, and more exhausting than that in which Israel was so overcome with thirst on their journey that they exclaimed against ¹ This must have been a canal. The Nile did not even then flow immediately by Alexandria.

Moses, and the water flowed for them from the broken rock by the power of Him who alone doeth wondrous works. Sometimes, also, it has so overflowed that it has inundated all the country round; the roads and the fields seeming to threaten that flood of waters which happened in the days of Noah. It also flows always polluted with blood and slaughter, and the constant drowning of men, such as it formerly was when, before Pharaoh, it was changed by Moses into blood and putrid matter. And what other purification could be applied to water, which itself purifies all? Could that vast and impassable ocean ever wash away this bitter sea? or could that great river itself which flowed from Eden, though it poured the four heads into which it was divided into one Gihon, wash away this filth? When will this air, corrupted as it is by the noxious exhalations everywhere rising, become pure and serene? For there are such vapours from the earth, and such storms from the sea-breezes, from the rivers and mists coming from the harbours, that make it appear as if we should have for dew the gore of those dead bodies that are putrefying in all the elements around us.

. . . Wherefore it is that this mighty city no longer cherishes within it such a number of inhabitants, from speechless children to the aged and decrepit, as it formerly had of those firm and vigorous in years. . . . And yet, though they constantly see the human race diminishing and wasting away in the very midst of this increasing destruction, this annihilation, they are not alarmed.

Again he says in his Paschal letter,¹ written probably in the year 264:—

¹ The Paschal letter was a sort of General Epistle issued before every Easter by the Pope of Alexandria, who thus notified to the Church in general, and to his own country in particular, the day on which Easter would fall that year. The great respect in which the astronomical and mathematical science of Egypt was held, made it natural that the decision on such a point should be left to the head of the Church of

To other men, indeed, the present would not appear a fit season for a festival, and neither is this nor any other time a festival for them, not to speak of sorrowful times, but not even that which a cheerful person might especially deem such. But now all things are filled with tears, all are mourning, and by reason of the multitudes already dead, and still dying, groans are daily resounding throughout the city. For as it is written respecting the first-born of Egypt, thus now, also, a great lamentation has arisen, for there is not a house in which there is not one dead. And I wish, indeed, this were all. Many and horrible calamities have preceded this. First, indeed, they drove us away, but solitary and in exile, persecuted and put to death by all, we still celebrated the festival; and every place marked by some particular affliction was still a spot distinguished by our solemnities—the open field, the desert, the ship, the inn, the prison. But the most joyous festival of all was celebrated by those perfect martyrs who are now feasting in the heavens.

After this, war and famine succeeded, which indeed we endured with the heathen, but bore alone those miseries with which they afflicted us, whilst we also experienced the effects of those which they inflicted, and suffered from one another. And again we rejoiced in the peace of Christ, which He gave to us alone, when both we and they obtained a very short respite. Then we were assailed by this pestilence. . . . For neither did it keep aloof from us, although it assailed the heathen most.

Most of our brethren, in their exceeding great love and brotherly affection not sparing themselves, and clinging to one another, were constantly superintending the sick, ministering to their wants without fear and without rest. While healing them in Christ, they have departed most sweetly with them. Though filled with the disease from others, taking it from their neighbours, they voluntarily, by suction, extracted their pains.¹ Thus many who had healed and strengthened others, themselves died, transferring their death upon themselves, and exemplifying in fact that trite expression which seemed before only a form of politeness, or an empty compliment; they were in fact, in their death, 'the offscouring of all.' The best of our brethren have departed this life in this way, some presbyters, some deacons, and of the people those that were exceedingly commended. So that this very form of death, with the piety and ardent faith which attended it, appeared to be but little inferior to martyrdom itself. They took up the bodies of the saints with their open hands and on their bosoms, cleaned their eyes and closed their mouths, carried them on their shoulders, and composed their limbs, embraced, clung to them, and prepared them decently with washing and garments, and ere long they themselves shared in receiving the same offices. Those that survived always following those before them. Among the heathen it was the direct reverse. They both repelled those who began to be sick, and avoided their dearest friends. They would cast them out into the roads half-dead, or throw them when dead without burial, shunning any communication and participation in death, which it was impossible to avoid by every precaution and care.

Egypt. These epistles often began with a kind of sermon addressed to the Church.

The horrors of this siege were greatly mitigated in other ways by the conduct of the Christian priests, particularly Eusebius and Anatolius, who were afterwards successively appointed to the bishopric of Laodicea. Eusebius the historian, in speaking of Anatolius says:—

They relate innumerable achievements of his at the siege of the Bruchium at Alexandria, as he was honoured by all officials with extraordinary distinction ; but, as a specimen, we shall only mention this. When the bread, as they say, failed in the siege, so that they were better able to sustain their enemies from without than the famine within, Anatolius, being present, devised a project like the following. As the other part of the city was in alliance with the Roman army, and therefore happened not to be besieged, he sent to Eusebius, who was among those not besieged (for he was yet there before his removal to Syria, and was very celebrated, and in high repute even with the Roman general), to inform him that they were perishing with famine. On learning this, he begged of the Roman general to grant safety to those who would desert from the enemy as the greatest favour he could grant him. Obtaining his request, he immediately communicated it to Anatolius. The latter, receiving the promise, collected the senate of Alexandria and proposed the resolution, that the whole multitude, whether of men or women, that were not needed for the army should be dismissed from the city, because there would be no hope of safety at all for them, who, at any rate, were about to perish with the famine, if they continued and lingered in the city until the state of affairs was desperate. All the rest of the senate agreeing to this decree, he nearly saved the whole of the besieged ; among the first providing that those of the Church, then those of every age in the town, should make their escape, and among these not only those that were included in the decree, but, taking the opportunity, many others, secretly clad in women's clothes, went out of the city by his management at night, and proceeded to the Roman camp. There Eusebius, receiving them all, like a father and physician recovered them, wasted away by a protracted siege, with every kind of attention to their wants.

¹ This implies that the operation of tracheotomy for diphtheria was known at this time to the Egyptians; for the only way in which suction could be used was, as now, to clear the windpipe after the operation. It is a dangerous proceeding, and more than one English physician has lost his life in consequence.

With the capture and murder of Æmilianus by the Roman general, the wars in Egypt came to an end, though the pestilence still raged in this unhappy country. The labours of the Patriarch in controversy also were not yet at an end.

Dionysius is no exception to the general rule, that all the greatest and wisest men of the Church have either during their life-time or after their death been accused of heresy. He was fortunate in that the accusation came during his life-time, when he was able to disprove it once for all. And that he was ready to do so is only another instance of his self-mastery and humility. He was, as it may be called, the doyen of all the Patriarchs or Popes in the world at this time. The very expressions which gave offence to some of his flock occurred in a letter to the bishops of the district of Pentapolis, written with intent to reconcile some disputed opinions and prevent the rise of a new heresy. The action of the Pentapolitans was absolutely indefensible. Without writing to their own Patriarch, and probably influenced by Roman visitors among them, they actually sent an accusation of heresy against him to Dionysius of Rome, the sixth bishop whom Dionysius of Alexandria had known in that chair since he had been a Patriarch himself, and presumably therefore a young and inexperienced man by comparison. The action of Dionysius of Rome was no less singular. He first called a local council, and condemned Dionysius of Alexandria, and then wrote to the Pope of Alexandria telling him that he had done so and asking for his defence. But the Christianity of Dionysius of Alexandria was proof even against this insult and injustice. Instead of visiting his in subordinate diocese with just wrath, and refusing the impertinent demand of his namesake of Rome, he at once wrote a careful and dignified answer at some length. He points out in detail how his words had been quoted in so disjointed and arbitrary a manner that the sense of them had been entirely misrepresented, and mentions in one place that he had refrained from using the disputed term 'consubstantial' because he had not found it in Scripture, but his meaning was the same, as could be seen by those who would read his own words upon the subject in the former letter—of which he regretted that he could not send a copy to Dionysius.

By this temperate and dignified conduct a scandal in the Church was avoided, and the reputation of Dionysius of Alexandria rose higher than before. In the last year of his life he was invited to attend the Council at Antioch, which condemned the well-known Paul of Samosata (whose story does not concern us here), but excused himself on the ground of age and infirmity. He gave them his own opinion, however, on the subjects before them, in a letter. While the deliberations against Paul were proceeding, the great Bishop of Alexandria rested from his manifold labours, and entered into the joy of his Lord.

CHAPTER X

ST. AMMON AND ST. ANTHONY

A.D. 268 IN 268 A.D. Gallienus was killed before Milan in a struggle with a rival pretender. On his death the usual uncertainty who should succeed brought fresh trouble on unhappy Egypt. Claudius took the throne in Europe, and the coins of Alexandria bear his name for parts of three years, but he was very far from reigning there. The Egyptians never submitted willingly to any foreign domination except the Greek, and they seem now to have invited Zenobia, the widow of Odenathus, and the queen whose beauty and fame keep alive the memory of the kingdom of Palmyra, to invade Egypt. She asserted that she was descended from the great Cleopatra, and would make good her claim to the kingdom of her ancestors. She had at her Court many learned men who had been educated in Alexandria, among whom was the celebrated Longinus; but it appears probable that she was of Roman extraction herself, and how the blood of Cleopatra ran in her veins has never been shown. But in beauty, courage, and final misfortune, the two women were not unlike. Her army took possession of Alexandria and marched down the valley of the Nile in triumph, led by an influential Egyptian named Teniagenes, who put himself at the head of the invaders. On their way back they were met by a Roman general and army, who tried to bar their way at Babylon, but the superior knowledge of the country possessed by Teniagenes enabled him to defeat his enemy, and the Roman general killed himself.

The occupation of Egypt by the Palmyrenes lasted till the reign of Aurelian, who took Zenobia prisoner, and destroyed the city of Palmyra after a double siege. The Egyptians, however, did not submit again to the Roman dominion without a struggle, and, though this period is very obscure,¹ it seems that no less than two other rival emperors in Egypt had to be personally conquered by Aurelian. At length, however, the country was reduced to submission again, and Aurelian went back to Rome, leaving an able lieutenant in the person of Probus.

During the temporary sway of Zenobia in Egypt the Christians had been left in peace as far as their religion was concerned, though they must have shared with their neighbours in the horrors of civil war. The successor of Dionysius in the Patriarchal throne was Maximus, of whom we hear nothing, after his elevation, except in connection with the condemnation of Paul of Samosata.

It was during the Patriarchate of Maximus, however, that two celebrated Egyptian characters took the first steps in a life of absolute though mistaken self-sacrifice. These were St. Anthony and the less-known, but more loveable, St. Ammon, the real founder of the Nitrian settlement, though Frontonius had chosen that desert valley for his retreat about a century before.

¹ Even Professor Mommsen seems to have fallen into chronological errors here. He himself gives the date of the Palmyrene conquest of Alexandria as 267-8; yet he makes the letter of Dionysius describing the struggle between Emilianus and the Roman general refer to this period, whereas Dionysius died in 265, or, according to the latest German authorities, in 264.

Anthony was born at Koma, in Upper Egypt, of wealthy Christian parents, but he showed no taste for learning, and, though not so illiterate as some writers have imagined, he never seems to have learnt any language but his own, which was unusual among the upper classes in Egypt. He was deprived of the care of his parents before he was eighteen, and left the sole guardian of his sister. We see in him the same enthusiasm and spirit of self-sacrifice as in Origen; but though it did not spur him to quite such lengths in the beginning, he had neither the reasoning power nor the wise friends which brought Origen safely through his spiritual crisis to a higher level of thought and action.

Anthony six months after his parents' death (about 268 A.D.) heard the lesson read in church where Christ says to the rich young man, 'If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow Me.'¹ Forthwith he resolved to obey this command literally, reserving only a small portion for his sister. But, on the occasion of his next attendance in church, the words 'Take no thought for the morrow' fell upon his ears as a rebuke for this reservation. He left his sister in charge of a Christian woman in the village, his broad lands to be sold for the poor, and wandered away, barefoot and alone, to live the life at war with himself and every God-implemented instinct, by which in all ages men have so strangely thought to come nearer to God. After one or two vain changes of residence, he shut himself up in a ruined castle on the Nile, and refused to look upon the face of any human being. He would preach, however, to the simple country folk, who readily gave him their superstitious reverence, and came to listen to the impassioned and often incomprehensible utterances of the unseen hermit. They brought him the bread of the country—flat cakes which, once made, will keep for months, and become so hard that it is necessary to moisten them with water before they can be eaten, as the poorer Egyptian labourer may still be seen doing any day. His mode of life naturally gave rise to a thousand rumours, which were afterwards embodied in the extraordinary legends now clustered round his name. Here he lived, unseen, but with ever-growing fame, for twenty years.

¹ Matthew xix. 21.

The birthplace of Ammon is not certainly known, but it was not far from Alexandria. He also was the child of wealthy parents, and early left an orphan. That he was of pure Egyptian blood is shown by his name; for, though many pure Egyptians took Greek names at their baptism, no Greek, or child of a mixed marriage, being a Christian, ever called his son by the name of an Egyptian god. Being come to the years of early manhood (probably between 265 and 270), he desired to embrace the monastic life, but to this his uncle and guardian refused his consent, declaring it to be necessary that he should contract an alliance with a young lady whose estates presumably went well with his own. Ammon seems to have been still legally under the power of his uncle, for his next step was to appeal to the young lady herself. He soon fired her with his own enthusiasm for a life of self-sacrifice, and the two young people agreed together in what seemed to them the only right course. They married on the mutual understanding that they were to live together as brother and sister, and for several years the compact was faithfully carried out. Authorities differ whether they at once retired into the desert or no, but it seems more probable that during this time they lived together on their estates, and did their duty by them. But after a time, whether poor Ammon thought that he was happier than he ought to be, or whether he could not any longer trust himself in his self-imposed celibacy, he retired, with the full consent of his wife, to the desert in Nitria, where a great multitude of zealous disciples followed him and his better-known successor, Macarius; so that, about eighty years later, Rufinus mentions some fifty convents in the Nitrian desert. Nor were those early colonists of the Wady Natron, as Nitria is now called, all monks and hermits. The lower valley was not absolutely desert; the salt lakes were ringed round, as now, with a scanty vegetation; and fresh water, for cultivation as well as drinking, could be obtained by digging. But Ammon's attention must have been at once attracted by the natron deposits, and the use which could be made of them in finding work for his men who had followed him; for almost immediately after his settlement there, we find that certain towns and villages on the rif, or cultivated land of the Delta, which was from 30 to 35 miles distant from the settlement, formed themselves into a company, which started regular caravans to fetch the natron worked by Ammon and his colony, and dispose of it in the markets of Egypt. It was with one of these trade caravans that the young Macarius came to Nitria, and was fired with holy zeal at the sight of the ascetic and hard-working community. Visions were not wanting to confirm his purpose of joining their exile; and when he had faithfully performed the business entrusted to him, he returned to Nitria and joined the colony. But the lay element—for Ammon's followers were by no means all monks—and the bustle of commercial activity soon made him feel that Nitria was not strict or solitary enough for him. He left the working colony round the Natron lakes, and retired to the upper valley, which has no oasis to relieve its desert desolation. In the French maps the two valleys—Scetis and Nitria—are confounded in one, but there is a marked division and a difference of elevation between the two, which Mr. Hooker has faithfully recorded in his survey of the year 1896. The upper valley, which trends to the south-east, had no name when Macarius made his solitary dwelling in one of its caves; but from that time it became known as Scetis, from an expression signifying 'the place of disciplined souls.' For Macarius, like Ammon, was soon followed by his disciples, who lived in the cells they hollowed out for themselves, and held aloof from the little world of Nitria. They had far to go for water, and their only industry was basket-making, by which they obtained means to sustain the bare life which seemed to them the highest form of existence. Here Macarius dreamed his life away, while down below him Ammon toiled with his labourers, permitting himself twice a year to tramp the six days' journey across the desert and the Delta, to look upon his wife and assure himself of her welfare. No doubt he made himself pay dearly for the indulgence by many an extra penance in his desert cell, and one can imagine with what bitter heart-sickness of suspense he must have watched and waited for tidings from the outer world during those terrible years from 303 to 322. Ammon himself did not die till about 345, and during that time he beheld from far off the last desperate struggle of his native country for freedom from the Roman yoke, and the terrible revenge of that Roman emperor who had himself been born a slave.

CHAPTER XI

A STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM

A.D. 282 AFTER the murder of Aurelian, Tacitus took the throne for a short time in Europe, while the widow of Aurelian ruled for eight months in Egypt. On the death of Tacitus the regiments stationed in Egypt unanimously elected their beloved general Probus, who shortly afterward left Egypt to secure the European provinces. The Blemmyes, however, who had already invaded Egypt from the south in the interest of the Egyptian-Palmyrene party, took advantage of his absence to seize upon the kingdom of Upper Egypt, and Probus had to return to hard fighting, and to reconquer Coptos and Ptolemais as if they were foreign cities. In spite of constant wars, however, Probus found time to look after public works in Egypt, and treated the unfortunate inhabitants of that country with a kindness and justice to which they had long been strangers. But in 282 Probus was assassinated by his own soldiers, and Carus the Prefect took the throne. He died in 283, on an expedition against the Persians, which was hastily abandoned in consequence. His two sons, Carinus and Numerianus, succeeded him; but, after a year of intrigue and fighting, Diocletian succeeded in making himself master of the empire.

Meanwhile Maximus the Patriarch had died in 282, and there seem to have been difficulties about the choice of a successor, which kept the see vacant for some months. At length Theonas was elected, and for some few years governed his flock in peace. In this breathing-space between wars and persecution a great church was built at Alexandria and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, the first cathedral of Egypt; for though, of course, many other churches existed before this in different parts of Egypt, this seems to have been the first attempt of the Christians to build a great national temple for their public worship.

Indeed, that the Christians knew of no special reason why they should distrust Diocletian is shown by a letter which the Patriarch wrote to the Christian Lucian, who was appointed to the office of High Chamberlain, or, as we might better translate it, Steward of the Palace, shortly after the accession of the new Emperor :—

The peace (writes Theonas) which the Churches now enjoy is granted to this end : that the good works of Christians may shine out before infidels, and that thence our Father which is in heaven may be glorified. This should be our chief end and aim, if we would be Christians in deed and not in word only. For, if we seek our own glory, we desire a vain and perishable thing ; but the glory of the Father and the Son, who for us was nailed to the Cross, saves us with an everlasting redemption, that great expectation of Christians. I neither think therefore, nor wish, my dear Lucian, that you should boast because many in the Court have come by your means to a knowledge of the truth ; you should rather give thanks to God, who hath chosen you as a good instrument to a good result, and hath given you favour in the sight of the prince to the end that you should spread abroad the savour of the Christian name, to His glory and to the salvation of many.

Then, after insisting on the extreme care for their duty which ought to distinguish Christian servants in a heathen Court, he particularises one fault to which his countrymen, like all Orientals, seem to have been liable.

God forbid (he says) that you should sell to any the entry of the palace or receive a bribe to suggest what is unseemly to the Emperor's ear. Put away from you all avarice, which maketh idolatry rather than Christian religion. Unworthy gain and duplicity do not befit one who embraces Christ, the poor and simple. Let there be no evil speaking nor immodest language among you. Let all things be done with kindness, courtesy, and justice, that in all things the name of our God and Lord Jesus Christ may be magnified. Fulfil the duties to which you are severally appointed with fear towards God and love towards the Emperor, and with exactness and diligence account that all commands of the prince, which offend not against those of God, proceed from God Himself. Put on patience as a robe ; be filled with virtue and the hope of Christ.

After this general exordium he proceeded to give suggestions in detail for the performance of their several duties. Most of the officials of the palace seem to have been Christians, and, though the office of librarian was not yet filled up, Theonas had good reason to suppose that a Christian would be chosen for the post. As for the keeper of the privy purse, he must keep strict accounts, 'never trusting to memory,' and they must be so managed that the exact position of affairs could be shown at a glance, 'which will be easily done if the receipts themselves, the time, the medium, and the place be written distinctly.' Of the keeper of the robes and ornaments, he directs that he must be punctilious in noting—

What the things are, of what sort, where stored up, when received, by whose means, with or without flaw, and must often look there, and always know where to find each article, doing all this with humility and cheery patience, so that Christ's name may be praised even in so small a matter.
VOL. I. I

But it is on the duties of the librarian that Theonas dwells most earnestly, and here also he shows the same wisdom and tact. The librarian must know all the books in his charge, often turn them over, arrange them according to their catalogue, employ the most accomplished copyists for purposes of transcription, etc. He is particularly warned not to think himself above secular studies, especially those which the Emperor himself might show any turn for. He must acquaint himself with the principal orators, poets, and historians of antiquity; yet, as occasion served in his intercourse with the Emperor, he must bring in some judicious mention of the Septuagint as a book that had been so much valued by the famous Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, that it might be worth the attention of an Emperor of Rome.¹

There are directions as to the kind of books he should recommend for reading aloud to the Emperor, with a hint that he must be able to cite authorities in their favour. He must not neglect to get old manuscripts repaired and rebound as they need it, etc.; but always to be ready to introduce some mention of the books relating to Christ. Theonas also lays great stress on the necessity for Christian servants to be always clean, neat, 'bright-faced,' and respectful.

¹ Theonas evidently does not conceive that an Emperor of Rome would be so ignorant as never to have heard of Ptolemy Philadelphus. This was probably the fact, however, for even Diocletian's admirers would acknowledge his ignorance of all save practical matters.

Let us now turn our attention to the Emperor from whom the Egyptian Christians hoped so much.

We know him by the Grecian or Roman form of a name which was originally only a nickname derived from the Dalmatian town to which his mother belonged; for Diocletian was born a slave, of slave parents, but at an early age displayed a boundless ambition and a natural genius for success, together with an absolute want of scruple as to the means by which it was to be obtained. Rising rapidly in the army, he was commander of the body guards at the time when Numerian died at Chalcedon on his return from the Persian war. Having by well-planned intrigues secured his election by the generals and tribunes who were then with the army, he began his reign by slaying in cold blood and with his own hand, without trial or even inquiry, the only man whose pretensions were immediately dangerous to his own, and who had been brought before him in chains, accused by popular outcry of the murder of Numerian. Two years afterwards, finding that it was impossible for him single-handed to keep in order an unwieldy empire the different provinces of which were far from submitting easily to his usurpation, he associated with himself in the empire Maximian, an illiterate peasant, who, like himself, had risen to high rank in the army by native talent for commanding men, and gave him the title of Emperor of the West. Six years later he found it necessary to appoint two sub-emperors or Cæsars—Constantius, a man of good family, under Maximian; and Galerius, once a herdsman, under himself. Each of these men was required, as a condition of his elevation, to divorce his wife and marry a daughter of his patron.

There was plenty of work for all these men as defenders of the empire. One province after another refused to acknowledge the son of a barbarian slave as their emperor, and elected some prince of their own to fight once more for their ancient liberties. Britain revolted under a native prince called Carausius ; Gaul, under Elianus and Amandus ; Carthage, under Julian ; and finally Egypt, under Achilleus, took up arms to regain her independence. Considering the duration and importance of this struggle in Egypt, it is curious how little we positively know about the man who for more than nine years successfully defied the Roman power, and whose death in battle deprived his countrymen of their last hope ; for it seems probable, though it is nowhere expressly stated, that Achilleus, in spite of his Greek name, was by birth an Egyptian and by religion a Christian. In the last sixty years the Egyptians had been growing more and more intolerant of the government of these barbarian upstarts who called themselves Roman emperors, and claimed the ancient kingdom of Egypt as their private inheritance. Six times already during those sixty years had they risen to arms on the side of anyone who seemed likely to help them to regain their independence ; and now, nothing daunted by the constant defeats inevitable when highly disciplined and veteran mercenaries are pitted against a people to whom for centuries the use of arms has been denied, they looked no more to foreign aid, but joined once for all—Greek, Egyptian, Christian, and pagan alike—in one desperate effort for freedom.

But, so far as this world is concerned, the race is always to the swift and the battle to the strong. For four years they enjoyed their liberty in a precarious fashion, and Achilleus ruled in the Thebaid ; while Galerius—though, whenever he could force an actual engagement, demonstrating the superiority of his troops by routing the Egyptians—could not make himself obeyed beyond the limits of his own camp. Then Diocletian came in person with a fresh army, and the long struggle began between learning, Christianity, and weakness on the one hand, and ignorance, infidelity, and strength on the other.

Coptos and Busiris, after prolonged sieges by the Emperor in person, were taken and wholly destroyed. Diocletian marched through the Thebaid, and made a treaty with the Nubians and Ethiopians, by which he ceded to them the district between Assuan and Wady Halfa on condition that they should defend the frontier against the Blemmyes. This treaty was annually ratified by a religious sacrifice, according to the rites of the ancient Egyptian religion, on the Island of Philæ, in which the Roman garrison took part. There are still the remains of the wall which Diocletian built across the valley; and according to some authorities, not venturing to trust entirely to the Nubians to defend the Egyptian frontier, he agreed to pay a yearly tribute both to the Nubians and the Blemmyes.

After this, Diocletian left Egypt; and with his army the Roman rule was again withdrawn. All the Egyptians rallied again round Achilles, who had escaped Diocletian, and Alexandria welcomed him with open arms. The dates of this reign are very difficult to determine, but, as the independence of Egypt is variously computed to have lasted from six to nine years, it cannot have been immediately that Diocletian returned again to reconquer the country.

When he did so, however, the fate of unhappy Egypt was not left long in suspense. As Achilles was in Alexandria, Diocletian turned his attention to that city and entered upon a formal siege. He cut off all the aqueducts which supplied the city with water, and being able himself to receive constant supplies and reinforcements by sea, while he could prevent all communication between Alexandria and Egypt, there could never have been much doubt of the final issue. All the neighbouring nations were fighting for their own lives against one or other of the Roman emperors.

The Blemmyes and the Nubians had been bribed to inaction, and Egypt itself was wasted by Diocletian's former campaign, and deprived of her king, who was shut up in Alexandria. After eight months of brave but hopeless resistance Alexandria was taken by storm and Achilles put to death. Irritated beyond all self-control at the gallant resistance with which he had met, Diocletian is reported to have sworn that the massacre of the citizens should not cease until their blood flowed to the level of his horse's knee in the streets. Thousands perished ; and the slaughter continued till, whether sated with the horrible sight, or seeking from motives of policy for some way of escape from the fulfilment of his hideous vow, Diocletian hailed an opportune stumble of his horse as a sign that the vengeance of Heaven was appeased, and gave orders for the massacre to cease. It is said that the solitary column which now rises from the ruined heaps of ancient Alexandria, and is known by the nickname of Pompey's Pillar, was erected by the citizens or by order of the Emperor in the temple of Serapis to commemorate this event ; but until very extensive excavations are made in Alexandria, it is impossible to feel sure of anything in that city. Diocletian knew how to bide his time, and his full revenge on Egypt was not taken till some years later ;

but the punishment which immediately followed was heavy enough. Few conspicuous persons in Egypt escaped a sentence of death or exile, the national coinage of Egypt was discontinued, and worse than all was the loss of their ancient scientific books; for Diocletian, with the superstition of ignorance, conceived the idea that the Egyptians were able by means of alchemy to transmute metals into gold, and that only this could account for the lavish sacrifice of wealth which they had made during these years of struggle for their liberty. He therefore ordered all such books to be given up to him, and, in spite of the protests and entreaties of the Egyptians, the edict was carried out; and the records of science, which, fanciful and faulty as it may have been, was yet the best the world had then to offer on chemistry and kindred subjects, were solemnly burnt by the barbarous Emperor.¹

Soon after these events the Patriarch of Alexandria died—worn out probably with all he must have gone through. The order of the succession to the headship of the Catechetical School is very uncertain during these troubled times. We know the names of the Principals, but not the order in which they succeeded. It seems probable that to Theognostus succeeded Achillas, who was appointed by Theonas. Achillas succeeded at a much later date to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, but meanwhile both Peter and Serapion seem to have successively taken charge of the school. It is most probable therefore that Achillas, as Clement had done at an earlier period, withdrew from Alexandria during these troubled times, and that Peter took charge in his absence. The date of the death of Theonas is given as 300, and he was succeeded by Peter, who seems to have been comparatively a young man with a wife and daughters.

¹ The accounts given by Gibbon of these events afford a curious proof how far his prejudice in favour of anyone who oppressed Christianity could distort his judgment.

For nearly three years Egypt remained in suspense,¹ and then the storm broke which left the Church half-dead, and inflicted on the Egyptian nation a blow from which it has never recovered.

¹ John of Nikius says that in Egypt the persecution began immediately after the suppression of the revolt. This seems much more probable, and would solve some chronological difficulties relating to the Meletian schism in Egypt. In the case also of the Decian persecution we know that it began in Egypt a full year before the publication of the edict through the empire.

CHAPTER XII

THE ERA OF MARTYRS

A.D. 303 THE persecution which has earned for Diocletian so unenviable an immortality in Egypt was not, of course, confined to that country ; it was part of a great organised scheme for stamping out Christianity from the earth ; for it had gradually dawned upon Diocletian—and earnest efforts were not wanting on the part of those around him to impress the fact upon him—that the strength of the opposition which he had met with lay in this obstinate religion, which claimed a citizenship other than that of the Roman Empire and allegiance to a Divinity of whom the Roman Emperor was not the visible manifestation. In Gaul, in Britain, in North Africa, he found the same underlying cause prompting the struggle for independence as in Egypt. Galerius¹ urged the gravity of the case repeatedly upon him ; and the diviners, whom Diocletian repeatedly summoned to forecast the future, declared that it was impossible for them to constrain the spirits to answer while the palace was filled with infidels (Christians), whose presence prevented all manifestations.

¹ It must be remembered, in justice to Diocletian, that the persecution called by his name did not reach its full barbarity of procedure till his temporary insanity, and subsequently his forced abdication, left Galerius free to act in his name. The first edict was bad enough ; but the second and third, which followed it in a few weeks' time, and decreed firstly the imprisonment of all the clergy, and secondly that they should be compelled by torture to sacrifice, were the result of a fire in the palace, which contemporary writers assert, uncontradicted, to have been kindled by order of Galerius himself, who then laid the blame upon the Christians, and so extorted the consent of Diocletian to fresh measures against them. The fourth edict was published while Diocletian was out of his mind, and the worst of the persecution was after his abdication.

Thus worked upon both by superstitious fear and considerations of policy, Diocletian gave orders for the issue of a formal edict against the Christians on February 23—being the day of a pagan festival—in 303. Both Diocletian and Galerius were in Nicomedia at the time, and watched the opening of the nine years' tragedy from the palace. The Prefect, attended in full state by officers and secretaries, with a body of pioneers, went in procession to the principal church of Nicomedia. The doors were broken open, all the sacred books and the fittings of the church were burnt, and then the workmen with axes and crowbars laid the church itself level with the ground. The provisions of this edict, which was published next day in the market-place, were as follows :—

All churches were to be demolished.

All sacred books to be burnt.

All Christians who held any official position were not only to be stripped of their dignities, but to be deprived of civil rights (that they might thereby be rendered liable to torture and other outrages).

All Christians who were not officials were to be reduced to slavery.

It may be imagined how the crowd gathered in the market-place—those who were Christians silently slipping away, as they learned the worst, in the vague hope of concealment and escape ; those who were pagans not daring to lift their voices in protest, lest suspicion should fall also upon them. All at once—so runs the story—a Christian of tougher metal than the rest pushed his way through the market-place to read the proclamation, and then, in the face of the awe-stricken crowd, he deliberately tore down the Imperial edict and flung it away. He was instantly seized, tortured, and finally burnt alive at a slow fire.

Popular tradition has identified this nameless martyr with the great St. George who is now the patron saint of our own country. There is no reason why this should not be true, but this act is not recorded in the Egyptian legend of St. George. In this legend, however, a most curious explanation is incidentally given of the dragon myth, which has led some people to see in the story of St. George and the Dragon only a Christian version of the classical Perseus. The Dragon was the Egyptian nickname for Diocletian, and the encounter between them was the prolonged contest between the will and power of the Emperor and the heroic resistance of the martyr! In the oldest form of the legend there is no hint of a material dragon, or indeed of any animal against whom St. George waged war. The Emperor is represented as the ruler of the world, with eighty kings under him; and the legend says that for three years after the publication of the Emperor's edict no one dared to say 'I am a Christian,' so terrible were the tortures with which Diocletian had threatened them. Then, it proceeds to relate, the young officer George, summoned to the city to receive promotion, would not keep silence, but declared openly that he was a Christian; and his martyrdom was prolonged because the Emperor did not desire to lose so good an officer, and at every stage renewed his offer of pardon and promotion if the young man would yield. As in all cases, fable has overgrown the ancient story, and it is probable that interpolations were deliberately made at a much later date by an Arian editor in order that the Arian St. George should usurp the honours of his earlier namesake, which at one time he succeeded in doing. Now the process is reversed, and since the Arian sect died out of Egypt the two or three churches which had been dedicated to the Arian St. George¹ all claim the earlier martyr as their patron saint, and fill their churches with representations of the mediæval myth, which have almost as little to do with the real history of the one as of the other. St. George on his fiery steed slays the mythical monster which both Greeks and Egyptians call a dragon,² and delivers the princess, like Perseus of old. But there is neither monster nor princess in the early Egyptian legend. The dragon was the nickname for the Emperor, whom St. George addresses all through by that name; and the princess was one of the Emperor's 'wives,' who was shut up with the young warrior for a whole night, in order that her seductions might weaken the resolution which torture had only strengthened. But he knelt down immediately in the farthest corner of the room, and continued praying till she bade him impatiently say aloud to her what he was muttering to himself. Then he told her the story of Jesus, and so wrought upon her, that in the morning, when the Imperial officers came to seek them, she declared herself a Christian, and was forthwith slain by the Emperor's order.¹

¹ It is said that the Greek church of St. George in the fortress of Babylon was originally dedicated to the Arian saint, and there was another at Girgeh.

² What the animal was which in prehistoric times originated the dragon myth will probably never be known. In Genesis it is translated 'whale'; in Egypt it is represented sometimes as a crocodile, sometimes as a winged crocodile, sometimes as a great serpent.

The best answer, however, to those who, beginning with Reynolds in the seventeenth century, have tried to identify St. George of the dragon with the Arian George of Alexandria is a simple statement of fact. George of Alexandria was not murdered till 361; and if churches were ever dedicated to him, it was not till some time afterwards. But churches were dedicated in honour of the great St. George as early as the year 346.

At the present time the process of confusion of two saints one with another is going on in Egypt, and it is to be feared that the comparatively modern and doubtful personality will obliterate the other; for everyone in the West has heard of St. Catherine of Alexandria, whereas few know the name of Sitte Dimiana, the most widely revered virgin-martyr of Egypt. Her picture is in every church, and there are few members of the Egyptian Church who cannot tell you her history. If St. Catherine existed at all, which is extremely doubtful, she is probably to be identified with Theodora, who was martyred at Alexandria about the date generally ascribed to St. Catherine. It is argued that Theodora before her conversion may have borne the name of Hecaterina, from the goddess Hecate, in which case she would have changed it at her baptism. But this is pure assumption, and, so far as can be ascertained, the Egyptian Church never heard of St. Catherine till the Roman Catholics brought the fame of her to her supposed native country centuries after her legendary martyrdom.

¹ In the Little Oasis (Oasis Parva) there was in the thirteenth century a church of St. George which claimed to possess the body of St. George. The head they acknowledged to be at Lydda, but said that the body was sent to them, long after the martyrdom, for safety.

When the European tourists came to see the Egyptian churches and asked for the picture of St. Catherine, the dragoman obligingly pointed out the picture of the only great virgin-martyr whom the priests knew anything about, Sitte Dimiana, with her palm-branch in her hands and surrounded by her forty nuns. Some time ago, happening to be in one of the principal churches in Cairo, I overheard the priest describe the picture of Dimiana as that of Catherine. 'What made you say that?' I asked him. 'Has not that always been a picture of Sitte Dimiana?' 'What can I say?' answered the priest with a deprecatory gesture. 'Your excellency knows that it is Sitte Dimiana, but the tourists know nothing of Sitte Dimiana; and when I tell them, they do not understand. They say it must be St. Catherine; and—what do I know?—it may be that Catherine is the English for Dimiana. So I tell them it is St. Catherine, and they are content.' Since then I find that the picture in this church—almost the only one visited by tourists—is always described as St. Catherine, and only the other day I found in Alexandria a further development. The Roman Catholics have dedicated a church here to their St. Catherine of Alexandria, and the Egyptian Catholics have become aware of her existence. I went into the only surviving Coptic church there, which has been restored of late years, and found a newly painted picture of Dimiana, represented—not with a palm branch, but with a wheel—in the midst of her forty nuns. The name Dimiana was painted on the picture, and I asked them why they had represented her with a wheel, as if she were St. Catherine. 'But the Frangis say she is St. Catherine,' they told me. 'Catherine is the Frangi (European) translation of Dimiana, so we have given Sitte Dimiana a wheel too'!

It may not be amiss to give a brief account of Sitte Dimiana, whose name is the feminine of Dimian, or, as it is generally written in English, Damian. She was one of the martyrs in this persecution, a girl of great beauty, who dedicated herself to the cloister at the age of fifteen. Her father was a native Egyptian, who had been made governor of one of the provinces of Egypt, and he built a nunnery for his daughter about two hours' ride north of Bilkaas, whither she betook herself with her maidens. She became the abbess, in spite of her youth, and the number of her nuns is given at forty when the persecution broke out. Dimiana's father was greatly respected, and the Emperor, unwilling to lose so good a servant in a troublesome country, used his personal influence to persuade the man to sacrifice. It is said that he offered to be content with one outward sign of submission, and in return would permit the governor to control the execution of the edict in his province and save his friends from torture. The governor hesitated; but when Dimiana heard of it she pleaded so powerfully with her father on the other hand that he refused all compromise, and defied the Emperor. Diocletian, enraged at being foiled by a woman, wreaked his vengeance, not on the father, but on the daughter. Dimiana and all her nuns were arrested and commanded to sacrifice. On their refusal they were subjected to the most cruel and prolonged tortures; but, as none of them would yield, they were all beheaded together. The convent where their bones are said to rest still exists near Bilkaas, and it is a curious fact that the native Mohammedans—those, that is, whose ancestors were Egyptian Christians, but at different times have become apostate—still retain the traditional reverence for Sitte Dimiana, and go with their Christian neighbours on the yearly pilgrimage to her shrine, which is one of the most interesting sights in Egypt.

For three years the persecution continued with a steady, relentless ferocity over the whole empire. The first edict was published in 303; and in 304, while Diocletian was suffering from an attack of insanity, Galerius published the fourth edict. This was more stringent than any of those which had preceded it, and was directed against all Christians, without respect of age, sex, or social status. Eusebius of Cæsarea, who visited Alexandria while the horrors of this time were yet fresh in the minds of those who had witnessed them, has left a vivid picture of the sufferings of the Christians in Egypt, where Arrian, himself afterwards a martyr, was conspicuous above all the governors by the zeal with which he carried out the orders of his Imperial masters. It is not perfectly clear from the language of Eusebius whether he was himself in Egypt during the persecution, and it is possible that the sentence in the following letter, in which he speaks of what he had himself seen, may refer to the martyrdoms in Palestine, which enable him to receive without question the similar stories related to him of the persecution in the Thebaid:—

But it would exceed all power of detail to give an idea of the sufferings and tortures which the martyrs of Thebais endured. These had their bodies scraped with shells instead of hooks, and were mangled in this way until they died. Women tied by one foot, and then raised on high in the air by certain machines, with their naked bodies and wholly uncovered, presented this most foul, cruel, and inhuman spectacle to all beholders ; others again perished bound to trees and branches, for, drawing the stoutest of the branches together by machines for this purpose, and binding the limbs of the martyrs to each of these, they then let loose the boughs to resume their natural position, designing thus to produce a violent action to tear asunder the limbs of those whom they thus treated. And all these things were doing not only for a few days or some time, but for a series of whole years. At one time ten or more, at another more than twenty, at another time not less than thirty, and even sixty, and again at another time a hundred men with their wives and little children, were slain in one day, whilst they were condemned to various and varied punishments. We ourselves have observed, when on the spot, many crowded together in one day, some suffering decapitation, some the torments of flames ; so that the murderous weapon was completely blunted, and, having lost its edge, broke to pieces ; and the executioners themselves, wearied with slaughter, were obliged to relieve one another. Then also we were witnesses to the most admirable ardour of mind and the truly divine energy and alacrity of those that believed in the Christ of God ; for as soon as the sentence was pronounced against the first, others rushed forward from other parts to the tribunal before the judge, confessing they were Christians, most indifferent to the dreadful and multiform tortures that awaited them, but declaring themselves fully and in the most undaunted manner of the religion which acknowledges only one supreme God. They received, indeed, the final sentence of death with gladness and exultation, so far as even to sing and send up hymns of praise and thanksgiving until they breathed their last. Admirable, indeed, were these, but eminently wonderful were also those who, though they were distinguished for wealth and noble birth and great reputation, and excelled in philosophy and learning, still regarded all as but secondary to the true religion and faith in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

One of the most renowned martyrs in Egypt who suffered under Diocletian was Mennas or Mena, always called Mari Mena. He was born of a good family, in the city of Nikius, and his father was made governor of a province of Africa. Mena was himself an officer in the army when called upon to renounce Christianity. On his refusal he was beheaded, and his body was buried in the district of Mareotis. A church was built on the spot, in his honour, which was afterwards replaced by a larger one in the reign of Arcadius. It seems to have served as a resting-place for pilgrims and travellers on the desert road between Alexandria and the valley of Nitria.

The lives of vast numbers were spared because more workers were wanted in the porphyry quarries and in the emerald mines of Egypt, which were always worked by convict labour, and for many years entirely by Christians, whose religion was their only crime. It was quite enough, however, to condemn them to penal servitude for life whenever persecution broke out and more miners were wanted. Some also, and those principally bishops of the Church, were condemned to work for life in the Imperial camel and horse stables. But these seemed to have purchased their lives by some concession, since Eusebius speaks of them as not having governed their flocks in a lawful and becoming manner, and therefore having fallen under divers displeasure. The names of five Egyptian bishops are given as those who had suffered most excessive torture before their death. The ancient martyrologies give the number of those who suffered death during the nine years of persecution in Egypt as 144,000 ; and while we are free to assume great exaggeration on their part, the counter-estimate of Gibbon must be rejected as absolutely untrustworthy. No impartial student can fail to conclude that the slaughter was appalling in Egypt, to say nothing of those who apostatised or managed to conceal themselves. The circumstances which attended the conversion of Arrian, one of the most relentless of the persecutors, have been given in Neale ; but as he evidently had an incorrect version before him, we give the more ancient Egyptian account.

Arrian had among his soldiers two men, named Philemon and Apollonius, of whom the former was a singer and the other a flute-player. They were great friends, and keenly desired martyrdom sooner than serve any longer under so terrible an enemy to the faith ; but it seems that their musical gifts and perhaps other merits had hitherto caused Arrian to ignore their religion and leave them unmolested. Seeing that he valued Philemon the most, the two friends hit on the following device : Philemon took the flute and the garments of Apollonius, and, thus having disguised himself, intruded upon Arrian's presence and confessed himself a Christian. Arrian, believing him to be Apollonius, and evidently thinking that it would be necessary to make an example of the one to deter the other from following in his footsteps, immediately ordered him to be shot by the archers, which was done. As soon as he was dead, Apollonius came before the governor in the same way, who thus perceived that he had sacrificed that one of the two friends whom he desired to keep alive. In a fit of anger he condemned Apollonius at once to suffer the same death. While the sentence was being carried out, one of the arrows glanced aside and struck the governor in the eye. He endured the greatest suffering, but was cured by a Christian (the legend says that the means used was the blood of the martyred friends). Upon this he declared himself convinced of the power of Christ and the truth of Christianity, and gave evidence of his good faith by immediately liberating all those who were still awaiting torture and death in the prisons. The news was soon reported to Diocletian, and he sent for Arrian and put him to death.

Though the Governor of Alexandria seems to have been more humane in his interpretation of the edicts than Arrian, the persecution there was also carried on with great severity, and it is reported that Peter, as other Patriarchs had done before him, withdrew into hiding at first.

Diocletian, before his attack of madness, had promised to abdicate on May 1, 305; but on recovering his reason in the May of that year he refused to do so, and attempted to resume the reins of government. This Galerius would not brook, and with much violence forced Diocletian to make the formal abdication which he had promised. However,¹ the death of Constantine in 306 and disturbances of the empire occupied Galerius, so that the persecution in Egypt slackened for a brief space; and as the Easter of 307 drew near, Peter, besides his Paschal letter, busied himself with drawing up Canons of Repentance, or conditions on which those who had lapsed during the persecution might be received again into the Church. We give them in brief, and without the arguments and citations from Scripture used by Peter to support his decision in each case :—

¹ John of Nikius, writing in Egypt in the seventh century, says that when Diocletian lost his reason, he was banished to an island covered with forests, named Waros, situated in the west. Here, he says, were some believers who had escaped there from the persecution. These had compassion on the fallen Emperor, brought him food daily, and so nursed him that he regained his reason. Then he sent to the army and the senate of Rome, demanding that he should be set at liberty and restored to his throne; but they refused to receive him. On this he fell into a state of melancholia, and passed his time in weeping. His madness increased more and more, he became blind, and so—tended only by those he had condemned to slavery, torture, and death—his life wasted, and he died.

1. Those who at the commencement of the persecution had given way under extreme torture and had shown their repentance during the three years which had elapsed would be received at the coming Easter, after a strict fast of forty days.¹

2. Those who had endured only the 'trial of imprisonment,' and had given way before actual torture had been applied, must undergo another year's penance before being received into the Church again.

3. Those who endured nothing, but lapsed in sheer terror, must do penance for four years.

4. Not a canon, but a lamentation over the lapsed who had not yet sought readmission.

5. Those who had escaped by feigning epilepsy or other trick must do penance for six months more.

6. Slaves who had been compelled by their masters to face the trial instead of the latter, and had lapsed, must show 'works of repentance' for a year.

¹ This forty days' fast before Easter was not yet the rule of the Church, but a special penance. The use in primitive days of the Church was forty hours. Irenæus says, in writing on this subject to Victor and remonstrating with him on the hard and rigorous line the latter was disposed to draw, 'For not only is the dispute respecting the day [of Easter], but also respecting the manner of fasting. For some think that they ought to fast only one day, some two, some more days; some compute their days as consisting of forty hours night and day; and this diversity, existing among those that observe it, is not a matter that has just sprung up in our own times, but long ago among those before us, who perhaps, not having ruled with sufficient strictness, established the practice that arose from their simplicity and inexperience. And yet withal these maintained peace, and we have maintained peace with one another.'

7. Masters who had thus acted must do penance for three years.

8. Those who had lapsed and then made amends at once by coming forward again and enduring imprisonment and torture may be received into communion without probation or punishment.

9. Those who voluntarily exposed themselves, instead of waiting to be arrested, are not to be commended, but reminded that Christ and the Apostles did not so. And those of them who had lapsed under these conditions, being clergy, and had afterwards returned to the conflict, must nevertheless cease to officiate as clergy, though they may be received into communion.

10. Those who had denounced themselves for the sake of encouraging and ministering to others had done well, and should not be blamed.

11. Those who had openly purchased their immunity with money are not to be censured.

12. Those are not to be blamed who simply escaped by flight.

13. Those who had been compelled by sheer force to handle the sacrifices against their will, and those whom torture had rendered utterly insensible, were to be regarded as confessors; and, if clergy, allowed to return to their ministry.

Long after the separation between the Church of Egypt and the European Churches these Egyptian canons were ratified at the Council in Trullo (692); and thus the ruling of what is called an heretical Church was made part of the Canon Law of the Orthodox branches.

It seems most probable that it was during this momentary lull of the persecution that the schism of Meletius first attracted attention, but the different authorities vary in their conclusions by two or three years. Meletius was Bishop of Lycopolis (Assiut), and two quite different stories are given—the one by his own followers; the other by Athanasius, who wrote on the subject some fifty years later. Probably there are elements of truth in both accounts.

Athanasius states that Meletius had saved himself in the time of the persecution by sacrificing to idols. Peter afterwards convoked a Council at Alexandria, by which Meletius was convicted and deposed. Meletius, instead of submitting, separated from the Church, and took upon himself not only to ordain priests, but to consecrate bishops—it is said, as many as thirty, all of whom asserted their independence of Alexandria. They are also accused of introducing Judaical and ritualistic observances of an unseemly character. In Alexandria his principal friend and supporter was the afterwards celebrated Arius, a native of Libya, who had been ordained deacon by Peter.

The followers of Meletius, on the other hand, declared that the proceedings of Meletius were rendered necessary by the flight of Peter from his post and the imprisonment of so many northern bishops. The points admitted on both sides are—that Meletius did somehow escape imprisonment or any suffering for the faith, though no other bishop in the land seems to have done so; that Meletius did ordain priests and consecrate bishops for other dioceses besides his own, in spite of the written protest—from prison—of four of the bishops who were among the earliest martyrs; that after these bishops had been put to death he went to Alexandria, and took upon himself to assume the functions of Peter, who was still absent; that he took no notice of Peter's letter of remonstrance, and when on Peter's return Meletius was condemned by the synod, he openly disregarded the sentence and set himself up in opposition to Peter. He did, however, retire to his own country, and Arius was forgiven and received back by Peter.

The renewal of persecution put an end to the controversy for the time, but the country had by no means heard the last either of Meletius or Arius.

In the autumn of 308 Galerius, in conjunction with his nephew Maximin, issued a new and more stringent edict of persecution, and those governors in the different provinces who had been content for the last year to order the loss of an eye and reduction to slavery (generally in the Egyptian mines) for all Christians who refused to renounce their religion were stirred up to fresh zeal. There ensued a reign of terror, not unlike that of the French Revolution, which lasted two full years. We will not dwell upon the new catalogue of horrors; suffice it to say that they exceeded all that had gone before, and that a fresh terror was added by the brutal and unbridled lust of Maximin Daza in Egypt and Maxentius (son of the Emperor Maximian) in the West.

In 311 Galerius was attacked by a frightful disease, and in his agony, finding that neither any physician nor god in whom he trusted could help him, he tried as a forlorn hope to make peace with the God of the Christians, against whom he had pitted the whole strength of his life, and, as he now realised, in vain. The text of his edict of peace with the Christians is given in Eusebius, and is an extraordinary document. But his tardy submission called down no miracle in his favour. His recantation was published on the last day of April 311, and by the end of May it was known throughout the empire that Galerius was dead.

In spite of the edict of Galerius, however, to which the names of Constantine and Licinius were also appended, the persecution was not yet at an end. Maximin Daza continued his career almost unchecked, and some of the most illustrious of the Egyptian martyrs fell in this last year of the persecution. Among these was the Patriarch himself, who was beheaded suddenly and almost secretly, for fear lest the populace, by whom he was greatly beloved, should rise to rescue him from the clutches of the Government. This last calamity roused even Anthony in the Thebaid from his living death of twenty years. He came forth from his tomb, and made his painful way to Alexandria, to comfort the people thus suddenly deprived of their head; hoping also, so it is said, to receive there the crown of martyrdom, which he had escaped in the Thebaid. In this, however, he was disappointed. Constantine and Licinius had made common cause at last against the infamous Maximin, and his attention was attracted from the persecution of others by need of self-defence. In 312 he was finally defeated, and, after passing several days in a state of intoxication, ended his own life by taking poison.

Thus ended the most terrible ten years that the Christian Church as a whole has ever known. Every nation can tell sorrowful tales of persecution, as fierce even as that of which we have just given a brief outline; nor must we ever forget that it was a Christian king¹ who, some twelve centuries later, solemnly condemned the whole population of another Christian country—man, woman, and child—to death for their religion; and sent an army to carry out the sentence. But never since the accession of the first Christian emperor has there been so world-wide and pitiless a persecution as that from which the Egyptian Christians with pathetic significance still count their years¹—the Era of Martyrs.

¹ Philip II.

¹ The Era of Martyrs, or Coptic Era, dates not from 303, but from 284 A.D., the first year of Diocletian.

CHAPTER XIII

THE ARIAN CONTROVERSY

A.D. 312
A.M. 28

AFTER the death of Maximin, and nearly a year after the martyrdom of Peter, the Egyptians ventured to elect a new Patriarch; and their choice fell upon Achilles, who had formerly been head of the Catechetical School. Anthony now departed from the city, but, instead of returning to the Thebaid, he betook himself to the mountainous region between the Red Sea and the Nile; where, after his death, the monasteries of St. Anthony and St. Paul were built, and still exist on the same site. Here, in order to save his disciples the trouble of coming long distances to bring him food, he cultivated with his own hands sufficient of the waste ground to supply his wants, and also worked at the manufacture of mats. Altogether his life seems to have been a more wholesome one after this date, and, besides teaching the disciples who soon crowded round him, he never again lost his interest in the outer world, of which he had had so brief a glimpse; and wrote more than once to prefect or emperor, as he thought they needed guidance. He had no books, and knew no language but his own; but he seems to have thought much, and taught well. The Life which Athanasius wrote of him has been so much interpolated that many people deny that Athanasius can have had anything to do with it.

Some nineteenth-century critics have gone so far, indeed, as to declare that Anthony never existed, and that the Life was merely a romance. That it should be described as an historical novel, rather than as a biography, most students will admit; but while we deplore the atmosphere of superstition and the marvellous fables which so quickly and naturally gathered round the figure of the recluse, we must in all fairness acknowledge that there is no reasonable ground for denying either the man's existence or the main facts of his life.

Achillas only ruled in Alexandria about a year, and the chief incident recorded of his Patriarchate is that he received Arius, who had been a second time excommunicated by Peter and left under sentence at the latter's death, back into communion on his application, and moreover appointed him to the charge of the church of Baucalis, the oldest in the city, which was said to mark the burial-place of St. Mark. On the death of Achillas, Arius even put himself forward as a candidate for the Patriarchal throne; but the unanimous choice of both clergy and people fell on Alexander, the friend of Achillas.

Alexander was already an elderly man when he became Patriarch, and his favourite pupil Athanasius must have been nearly seventeen. The story therefore which Rufinus tells of the way in which Alexander's attention was first called to Athanasius cannot be true exactly as he gives it; but it is not at all impossible that something of the kind took place before Alexander's elevation to the archbishopric.

Alexander, it is said, was expecting some of the clergy to dine with him, and was sitting in a window which overlooked the shore beneath his house, idly watching some boys at play by the sea. Observing at last that the boys were evidently imitating Church ceremonies, and thinking that the play was going too far, he called them in from the beach, and had them brought before him in the presence of the other clergymen who had meantime arrived. The affair turned out more serious than he had expected, for on inquiry he found that one of the boys, Athanasius, had actually, with all the proper formula, baptized some of his playfellows who had never been baptized. The assembled clergymen, after consultation among themselves, decided that the baptism must be considered valid, and interested themselves to have Athanasius and one or two of the boys who had acted as his assistants trained for the priesthood.

Whether the story is true or not, there is no doubt that Athanasius was from his boyhood a favourite protégé of Alexander, and was appointed secretary to the latter when he became Patriarch. For about five years after Alexander's accession the Church enjoyed a long-needed peace throughout Egypt. Meletius, as we know from subsequent events, persisted in his schism; but Assiut was then many days' journey from Alexandria, and he seems at least to have remained quiet in his own diocese. The people settled down again in their homes, the churches were rebuilt, and though almost every family in the land must have mourned some dear friend or relation, and many of those who remained bore traces, in their scarred limbs and sightless eyes, of the terrible storm they had passed through, the land was even more Christian than before—so many of the heathen had been won over to the cause of Christ by the evidence which they had seen of its truth and power. Yet there was a difference, which was to show itself more and more, in the character of the Egyptians, as time went on. The best blood of the nation had been sacrificed—on the one hand, in the war for independence under Achilleus; on the other, in the struggle for the existence of Christianity during the last ten years. A very large number of those that were left to re-people the country had saved their lives by cunning, if not by cowardice; and those who, though maimed, were still alive among their own people, and not hopeless labourers in the distant mines, were inclined to be fiercely intolerant of any fancied wrong done to the faith for which they had sacrificed so much. Another decade of years had hardly passed before it became necessary for an unbaptized emperor, the last of the six who had divided the empire on the abdication of Diocletian, to interfere with a strong hand between the quarrelling bishops of the Churches.

The events which led to the Council of Nicea, and the proceedings of the Council itself, are so widely known, and have been already so well described in English by Canon Bright, Dean Stanley, and others, that it is unnecessary to dwell upon them at any length. It was about the year 319 when the increasing murmurs in Alexandria against the heretical teaching of Arius obliged Alexander to take some notice of it. Feeling keenly, as he evidently did, the scandal of dissensions in the Church, especially at such a time, he endeavoured by patient listening and sympathy to win the confidence of the heretical party, as Dionysius had done; but the attempt failed, and the two informal meetings which Alexander called for the discussion of the matter led to no result. Alexander then wrote a pastoral letter to Arius and his followers, exhorting them to forsake their impiety, but still without result. The point in question, as everyone knows, was the divinity of our Lord; and it must be acknowledged that never before or since has there been a controversy of so much importance in the Church. Even those most desirous of peace must have felt compelled to take sides in the matter. We are inclined to say, indeed, that though Arius made several attempts at different times to express his belief in words which would be accepted by the authorities of the Church, no one who has studied the subject can have any real doubt that he did, in fact, deny the divinity of our Lord. He had been preceded in this by other heretical sects, but never before had such denial been so readily received and so widely spread as now, in the reaction from the fierce strain of spiritual exaltation which had upheld men in the time of persecution.

In 320 Alexander summoned a Council, and Arius was excommunicated for the third time in his life. He left Alexandria and went to Palestine, where he made many influential friends. Eventually Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia, who had once been schoolfellow with Arius, strongly espoused his cause, and thus brought the matter at a later time under the notice of the Emperor Constantine, who was the connection and friend of Eusebius.

On his return from Nicomedia into Palestine Arius was permitted by Eusebius of Cæsarea and other bishops to hold religious meetings in the different dioceses. This roused Alexander to take fresh action against him, and he drew up an evangelical letter to the bishops of all the Churches, setting forth the reasons why he had felt compelled to excommunicate Arius, and must refuse to receive him back into communion while he persisted in his present course. For a short time the attention of the disputants was distracted by the terror of a fresh outbreak of persecution, which did indeed actually commence under Licinius, who put Donatus, Bishop of Thmuis in Egypt (Phileas, his predecessor in the bishopric, had suffered martyrdom some years before), to death, with two of his clergy. For this and other causes Constantine attacked Licinius, and defeated him in two pitched battles in July and September of the year 323. Constantine then proclaimed himself sole emperor of the world, and fixed his residence at Byzantium. To him Eusebius of Nicomedia now appealed in favour of Arius; and the Emperor found time, in the midst of all his Imperial cares and occupations, to write a letter, addressed jointly to Alexander and Arius, which is instinct with the spirit of true Christian charity and courtesy.

But, in spite of the admirable tone of the Emperor's letter, it must be acknowledged that he entirely failed in it to grasp the real significance of the dispute; and Hosius of Cordova, who brought the letter in person to Alexandria, duly reported this fact to his Imperial master on his return from Egypt. Constantine thereupon gave orders for the assemblage of all the bishops of all the Churches at Nicea, that the matter might be settled with due deliberation once for all. The famous Council was held accordingly in 325, and the earliest form of the Nicene Creed¹ was drawn up and signed by all but five of the assembled bishops. It ended with the following anathema, which has happily long since been dropped:—

¹ The creed, as agreed to at the Council of Nicea, ended with 'we believe in the Holy Ghost.' The remaining clauses, among them the Filioque, were added later.

But the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematises those who say that there was a time when the Son of God was not, and that He was not before He was begotten, and that He was made from that which did not exist; or who assert that He is of other substance or essence than the Father, or that He was created, or is susceptible of change.

The Council then anathematised Arius, and pronounced sentence of banishment both against him and the bishops who had refused to subscribe the Creed. The assembled bishops then turned their attention to the schism of Meletius, and the question of the right day on which to keep Easter. We give that paragraph of the epistle written by the Council to the Egyptians which refers to these matters:—

Acting with more clemency towards Meletius, although, strictly speaking, he was wholly undeserving of favour, the Council permitted him to remain in his own city, but decreed that he should exercise no authority either to ordain or nominate for ordination; and that he should appear in no other district or city on this pretence, but simply retain a nominal dignity. That those who had received appointments from him, after having been confirmed by a more legitimate ordination, should be admitted to communion on these conditions: that they should continue to hold their rank and ministry, but regard themselves as inferior in every respect to all those who had been previously ordained and established in each place and church by our most honoured fellow-minister Alexander. They shall have no authority to propose or nominate whom they please, or to do anything at all without the concurrence of some bishop of the Catholic Church who is one of Alexander's suffragans. . . . When it may happen that any of those holding preferments in the Church die, then let such as have been recently admitted into orders be preferred to the dignity of the deceased, provided that they should appear worthy, and that the people should elect them, the Bishop of Alexandria also ratifying their choice. This privilege is conceded to all the others indeed, but to Meletius personally we by no means grant the same licence, on account of his former disorderly conduct; and because of the rashness and levity of his character he is deprived of all authority and jurisdiction, as a man liable again to create similar disturbances. These are the things which specially affect Egypt and the Most Holy Church of the Alexandrians; and if any other canon or ordinance should be established, our lord and most honoured fellow-minister and brother Alexander, being present with us, will on his return to you enter into more minute details, inasmuch as he is not only a participator in whatever is transacted, but has the principal direction of it. We have also gratifying intelligence to communicate to you relative to unity of judgment on the most holy feast of Easter; for this point also has been happily settled through your prayers; so that all the brethren in the East who have heretofore kept this festival when the Jews did, will henceforth conform to the Romans and to us and to all who from the earliest time have observed our period of celebrating Easter.¹

Though the Arian controversy might seem to be thus settled, it was in truth but just begun. Alexander died a few months after his return to Egypt, and his place was filled by the young and impetuous Athanasius, who was regarded by Arius as his personal enemy. For the next ten years the matter took the form of a duel between these two eminent men; after the death of Arius it became a duel between the Emperor and the Pope of Alexandria.¹

¹ An attempt was made by a certain section of the Council of Nicea to impose celibacy on the clergy. The proposal was received with indignation, and rejected; the Egyptian Bishop Paphnutius, who was a monk, distinguishing himself by an earnest protest against such an interference with Christian liberty.

¹ The Council of Nicea passed also this canon: 'Whereas some bow the knee on Sunday and on the days of Pentecost, the holy Council, that everything may everywhere be uniform, decrees that prayers be offered to God in a standing posture.'

CHAPTER XIV

HERESY AND SCHISM

A.D. 326
A.M. 42

CONSTANTINE, believing that he had pacified both the empire and the Church, next turned his attention to the reform of Imperial law and the building of a new Imperial city. His law reforms, since they did not produce any special effect in Egypt, need not detain us; but the transfer of the Imperial power to Byzantium had an important influence on the Egyptian nation. It has already been pointed out that the Egyptians always detested the Roman rule, and regarded the Latins, with some show of reason, as a race of ignorant heathen, whose sole superiority was just that one thing which compelled obedience to them, their military genius. The last few reigns of admittedly barbarian emperors had roused this dislike to frenzy,¹ and instigated the hopeless struggle for freedom under Diocletian. But Constantine, though of Imperial descent, was a native of the country now called Servia, and had no love for Rome. His sympathies were Greek; and the twin cities on either side the Hellespont, Byzantium and Chalcedon, were both old Greek colonies.

¹ Under the Roman emperors an Egyptian was ashamed of himself if he could not show a back covered with stripes before he consented to pay taxes to his hated foreign master. In our own century they showed the same hopeless form of protest against the rule of the Turks as late as the year 1880.

Byzantium was the town he fixed upon as the nucleus of his new city, and by certain very curious enactments he indirectly insured that almost all the settlers who flocked to the new capital should be of Greek and Macedonian descent.¹ The annual tribute of corn sent from Egypt to the Imperial city was henceforth sent to Constantinople and not to Rome. Roughly speaking, we may say that but one word and one ruin remain in Egypt to attest the long-past domination of the once Roman empire. The one ruin of any importance is the Roman fortress of Babylon. Even this is not known to the natives as Roman; to them it is, and has been for many centuries, the chief Christian stronghold in Egypt. But the one word which remains is very curious, for it is neither more nor less than the Roman name, though the natives themselves are not aware of it. When Constantine linked the old and new capitals together by calling them Old and New Rome, no one seemed to follow his example, and Byzantium has always been called Constantinople—or Stamboul, as the pronunciation of alien lips has since made it. Yet throughout the Eastern Empire the name of Rome remained, and came to signify, not the Romans, but the Greeks or Byzantines. The ancient name of Hellenes passed entirely out of current speech. The Greek nation remained; Greek thought and Greek language once more resumed their sway over the Eastern world, and particularly over Egypt, but under the name of that pagan race which the Egyptians despised as barbarian, and feared as the greatest military power the world had ever seen—the name of Rōm. The Egyptian of to-day and for many centuries back translates the word Rōm, not as Rome, but as Greece.

¹ The new capital was solemnly consecrated on May 11, 330 A.D.

For him the Greek quarter is the Harat el Roum, and the Greek Patriarch is the Patriarch Roumi.¹

Not long after the Council of Nicea a terrible domestic tragedy overtook the Roman Emperor, and left him a changed man for the rest of his life. It is impossible to enter here into the vexed questions of the murder of Crispus and Fausta. It seems only too likely that Fausta did falsely accuse her stepson to his father in such a manner that the unfortunate young Cæsar was executed in a fit of frenzy by the Emperor, and that the growing remorse of Constantine found vent in such fearful passion, when he later discovered the truth, that he immediately put to death the accuser, though she had been his wife for many years, and her sons were now, since the murder of their half-brother, his heirs to the throne.

In all the accounts of the remaining years of Constantine's life we see traces of remorse and deterioration of character. He is said to have sought for consolation and absolution from the Church, and it seems not unlikely that the prolonged pilgrimages of Helena, the widespread church-building, and the postponement of the Emperor's baptism, were all parts of the penance by which he sought to atone for these dark pages in his life.

We may note, in passing, that none of the contemporary accounts relate any of the miracles which later writers mention as having taken place during Helena's researches in the Holy City. All agree that Constantine built a church (among others in Jerusalem) on the place where our Lord had been buried, and all speak of the spot as being well known to everyone; but it is not even certain that any cross was found there at all. To Helena is also attributed the foundation of many churches in Egypt, particularly those of the Red and White monasteries near Souhag. Many of them were, doubtless, built on the sites of older churches destroyed in the recent persecution.

¹ This confusion of Roman with Greek was not, of course, confined to Egypt. The same causes led to the same effect all over the Eastern Empire, and now over the Arab-speaking world.

About this time also the Church of Abyssinia was founded as an offshoot of the Egyptian Church, under whose spiritual authority it has ever since remained. Before this, Christianity had never taken root in that country, though the people claimed a far-off connection with the Jews, and practised many Jewish rites.¹ Athanasius was sitting in synod with some of his bishops when word was brought in that a stranger who had just arrived from Abyssinia desired an audience. The man was invited to enter, and told his story to the assembled prelates, giving his name as Frumentius.

Several years before, he told them, his guardian, a philosopher of Tyre, named Meropius, had set out on what we should now call a yachting expedition to India, taking with him his two young relations, Frumentius and a younger brother who was named Edesius. On their return voyage they had touched at a port of Abyssinia to obtain water, and here the natives, to revenge themselves for injuries committed by the crew of another ship, had fallen upon them and massacred all but the two boys, who were sold as slaves to the king. One was made the royal cup-bearer, and Frumentius private secretary to the king, who on his death-bed enfranchised them. His widow entreated them still to remain in the country and help her with the education of the young princes. By degrees almost the whole government of Abyssinia passed into their hands, and they used all their influence to promote Christianity in the land. Now the young king had come of age, Frumentius and his brother were on their way home; indeed, Edesius had already hurried on to Tyre, but Frumentius had turned aside to report what had been done to the Pope (for it was the Bishop of Alexandria, and not the Bishop of Rome, who was in the East regarded as the Pope), and entreat that a bishop might be sent to carry on the mission.¹

¹ There is a very curious Coptic legend, which gives in great detail the circumstances of the visit of the Queen of Sheba (Eastern Ethiopia or Abyssinia) to Solomon, and of the subsequent visit of her son by him to his father's Court. On this occasion he is said, with the king's secret connivance and with the help of four priests whom he bribed, to have stolen the sacred Ark, and carried it into Ethiopia. 'This,' ends the narrator, 'is the way in which the Ark was taken into the kingdom of Abyssinia, and it remained there till the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

Athanasius, after consultation with the bishops, urged Frumentius himself to return and undertake the work. He was shortly after consecrated, and sent back to Ethiopia, where he passed the rest of his life. He is revered by the Abyssinians under the name of Abu Salama, the Father of Peace.²

We also have a detailed account of a pastoral visitation made by Athanasius during this peaceful time as far as Assuan, in the course of which he paid a visit to Tabenna. Here Pachomius, a celebrated hermit, who is the author of the earliest 'Rule of Monastic Life,' had attached himself—an enthusiastic convert, who left the army to become a Christian—to an earlier hermit, named Palæmon, of great sanctity in that neighbourhood. The two had supported themselves by the manufacture of the shaggy tunics so much worn in Egypt, and in course of years a vast multitude of celibates had settled round them, who now came out in procession to meet the Patriarch, chanting psalms.

¹ The Egyptian legend before referred to states that St. Mark preached Christianity in Ethiopia as well as in Egypt. The narrative of Frumentius certainly implies that he had found traces of Christianity in the land.

² Rufinus states that he wrote this narrative, not from hearsay, but from the lips of Edesius himself, who was then a priest at Tyre.

But neither Meletius nor Arius were inclined to submit to the ruling of the Council of Nicea, and fresh dissensions soon made themselves felt in Egypt. The schismatic bishop and the heretical priest seem to have made common cause against their Patriarch, so that the names of Meletian and Arian were in Egypt indiscriminately applied to their followers. Taking advantage of the fact that Constantine was falling more and more under the influence of Arian priests, they induced him to write to Athanasius and desire that Arius might now be received back into the Church. This Athanasius refused, on the ground that Arius still persisted in his heresy. His refusal, on which the Arian party must have calculated, so irritated the Emperor against him that he was quite ready to listen to the charges which Eusebius of Nicomedia and his followers proceeded to formulate against Athanasius. These were that he had taken upon himself to impose a tax upon Egypt to provide surplices ('linen garments') for the clergy, and that he had supplied a conspirator with money. These two charges were easily disproved, and never seriously pressed against him; but the third, being that half-truth which is proverbially difficult to meet, gave him more trouble.

Some years before, a priest of Alexandria, named

Colluthus, had taken upon himself to separate from the Church—it is not certainly known on what ground—and to ordain laymen as priests. As he was only a priest himself, he was condemned at a Council of Alexandria, and those whom he had ordained were declared to be simple laymen. One of these men, named Ischyras, disregarded the decision of the Council; but, instead of attempting to officiate in the city, he withdrew to his native hamlet in the Mareotis. Here there was no church, and he used to gather a very small congregation in a room. It seems almost a pity that Athanasius, who became aware of these facts in the course of a visitation (about 329), should not have himself ordained this early Dissenting minister, and encouraged him to build a church.

But Athanasius, great as he was, had not the breadth of mind and sympathy which distinguished the Patriarch Dionysius. It must be mentioned, too, that some writers represent Ischyras as a man of bad character; and this, if true, entirely explains the conduct of Athanasius. He sent a priest named Macarius to summon Ischyras and to remonstrate with his father. Ischyras was ill in bed, but his father promised that he should abstain in future from his irregular proceedings. Ischyras on this joined the Meletians, and became a tool in their hands. The charge against Athanasius was that he, or Macarius by his orders, had violently wrecked the whole church, burnt the books, and broken the chalice. Athanasius proved that there was no church; that nothing had been destroyed; and that, so far from Ischyras having been found there at service, he had been ill in bed at the time of the visit of Macarius. At a later time Ischyras himself came forward, and in a written document signed by thirteen of the clergy of Alexandria and Mareotis confessed that he had sworn falsely. 'God is witness,' he stated, 'that I know nothing of your having done any of the things they state. No cup was broken, no holy table overturned. They goaded me by force into these assertions.' But, as Athanasius refused to grant him immediate absolution, Ischyras afterwards recanted this recantation.

Athanasius was next accused of sorcery—a most dangerous accusation in almost any age but our own since the fourth century. It was publicly stated that he had poisoned a Meletian bishop named Arsenius, and used his body for unholy purposes of witchcraft. It is an instance of the deterioration of national character since the persecution that such a story could be readily and widely believed. The hand of a mummy was shown as the dismembered hand of Arsenius. Athanasius finding, to his surprise, that his non-denial of the statement was regarded as suspicious, sent a deacon into the Thebaid to inquire into the matter.

The deacon soon discovered that the missing bishop was living in the monastery of Ptemencyrcis, but before he could reach the place Pinnes (the abbot) hastily sent Arsenius off to Tyre. However, the deacon made his way to the monastery, arrested Pinnes and a monk named Helias, who had accompanied Arsenius part of the way, and brought them before the governor of the district, where they confessed what they had done.¹

The deacon promptly went off to Tyre to look for ¹ Pinnes wrote a curious letter to John Arcaph, warning him that this accusation could no longer be preferred against Athanasius, as it was known through all Egypt that Arsenius was alive.

Arsenius, but for some time was unable to find him. At length one of the servants of the consular officer of the district came to tell him that, happening to overhear some one in a tavern say that Arsenius was hidden in one of the houses in the city, he had followed the speaker and could now guide the deacon to the hiding-place. Arsenius was discovered, and at first denied his own identity, but was recognised by Paul, the Bishop of Tyre. Arsenius thereupon wrote to Athanasius, whom he calls 'his blessed Pope,' expressing his sorrow for what he had done and entreating to be forgiven and received back into communion.

In spite of this complete vindication, Eusebius of Nicomedia persuaded the Emperor that the charges against Athanasius should be publicly investigated at a Church Council. One was, in fact, convened at Cæsarea by Eusebius the historian, who was bishop of that city; but Athanasius, though repeatedly cited to appear, took no notice of it. He continued to busy himself with the affairs of his own province, and no doubt hoped that the whole thing would blow over without any more folly or scandal.

In 335, however, another Council was summoned at Tyre, and now Athanasius received a positive command from the Emperor to attend, which he at once obeyed, but went in some state, attended by forty-eight of his bishops. He was received with such studied discourtesy by the assembled bishops, who were mostly Arians, that Potamon, one of his bishops, indignantly cried shame upon the bishop of the city, Eusebius.

'Do you sit there to judge Athanasius?' he asked. 'You and I were once in prison together for the faith. I lost an eye. How came you to get off scatheless?'

Eusebius rebuked the ancient confessor for his vehemence, and the trial went on, but the animus of the judges was plainly apparent. Athanasius was again accused of the murder of Arsenius.

‘Did anyone here know Arsenius?’ asked Athanasius.

Several answered that they had known him. Athanasius then brought forward a man whose head up to this moment had been muffled, and bade him look the Council in the face. It was Arsenius. Athanasius put back one side of his cloak, and showed that Arsenius’s right hand was whole and in its place. Then with great deliberation he exposed the other, and in the silence which followed remarked calmly: ‘You see, he has two hands. Where is the other which I cut off? God has created man with two hands only.’

A scene of uproar and confusion followed, during which Arcaph, the man chiefly responsible for the lying accusation, managed to make his escape, but not before he had instigated the cry that this was a fresh proof of the sorcery of Athanasius, and thereby directed such a storm of fury against the unfortunate Patriarch who had just proved his innocence that Count Dionysius, who had been sent by the Emperor to see fair play, with difficulty saved his life.

The case of Ischyras still remained, however, and six commissioners who were notoriously Arians, and therefore enemies to Athanasius, were sent to Egypt to inquire into the matter. Macarius was retained in prison at Tyre, and Athanasius resolved to appeal to the Emperor in person. In company with five of his bishops, he took the first ship that left Tyre for Constantinople, and suddenly appeared before the Emperor one day as he was out riding. At first Constantine did not recognise him, and, when Athanasius declared himself, refused to hear him, on the ground apparently that the matters in question were already under consideration of a Council. But Athanasius stood his ground.

‘ Either summon a lawful (i.e. ecumenical) Council, or give me an opportunity of meeting my accusers in your presence,’ he said. The Emperor at length consented, and wrote a letter summoning the Council to Constantinople. Many of them in alarm hastily returned to their dioceses, instead of obeying; but Eusebius of Nicomedia and other Arian bishops repaired to the Court, and, to the astonishment of Athanasius, did not even mention Arsenius or Ischyras, but preferred a perfectly new charge against him—that he was intending to stop the sailing of the corn ships for Constantinople, an act equivalent to a declaration of war against the Emperor.

Athanasius totally denied the charge, but it had been well chosen. The Emperor, already no doubt inclined to be jealous of his most powerful subject, cut short his defence, and ended the whole business by summarily banishing Athanasius to the Court of his eldest son, Constantine, at Treves. Here he remained two years and a half, in a country unlike anything that he had ever seen, and to his Egyptian eyes Northern Germany was ‘ like the ends of the earth.’ He had with him one or two of his Egyptian friends, and wrote constantly to his distracted flock; for the years of his banishment were by no means peaceful ones in Egypt. Arius, who at the Council of Dedication in Jerusalem had again explained away his former statement and been readmitted there into the Church, was sent back to Alexandria, but was the cause of so much disturbance in the divided city that he was afterwards recalled. The patriotic feeling of the Egyptians resented also the removal of their ancient memorials and stately obelisks to beautify Constantine's new city, and the pagan element of the population still more resented the transfer of the sacred Nilometer from the temple of Serapis to one of the Christian churches. The yearly festival of the rising of the Nile was henceforward celebrated by the Christian clergy instead of by the priests of the ancient religion. Anthony, who had recently left his cell at the entreaty of Athanasius to preach in Alexandria against the Arian heresy, wrote to the Emperor to intercede for Athanasius, but in vain. Finally, Eusebius of Nicomedia persuaded the Emperor to allow Arius to be publicly received into the Church at Constantinople, on a particular Sunday, with a sort of triumphal procession from the Imperial palace to the Church of the Apostles. Alexander, the Bishop of Constantinople, protested in vain, and all arrangements were made for the ceremony, which was destined never to take place; for, on the Saturday before that Sunday, Arius with a crowd of his adherents left the Imperial palace and proceeded through all the principal streets of the city, anticipating his triumph of the morrow, and attracting the notice of the people wherever he went. As he approached the Forum of Constantine he was seized with a violent illness, which reads like an attack of cholera in its most aggravated form. He retired to the back of the Forum, and the crowd waited for him with growing misgiving. Before long the rumour of his sudden death ran from lip to lip, and was confirmed by the one or two horror-struck witnesses of the ghastly scene which had taken place.

So died Arius—the forerunner of those who call themselves no longer Arians, but Unitarians—a man of good moral character, and yet one who, owing to the circumstances of the time, was able to do more lasting harm to the cause of Christianity than any wicked man could have done. His followers also have the unenviable distinction of being the first Christian persecutors.

In 337 Constantine completed and dedicated the great Church of the Holy Apostles, in which he intended to be buried. Almost immediately afterwards his health gave way, and, having received baptism from Eusebius of Nicomedia, he died on Whit-Sunday of the same year. Before his death he had created no fewer than five Cæsars under him—his three sons and his two nephews. To Constantine, his eldest son, he had committed the care of Britain, Spain, and Gaul; to Constantius, Asia, Syria, and Egypt; to Constans, Italy and Africa; to Dalmatius, Illyricum; to Hanniballian, Armenia and Pontus.¹

Immediately on the death of his father, Constantius, the second son, hurried to Constantinople, and he cannot be acquitted of complicity in the events that followed. The armies declared that they would have none but the sons of Constantine to reign over them, and shortly afterwards there was a general massacre of the descendants of Constantius the First and his second wife Theodora. Dalmatius and Hanniballian, with five other nephews of Constantine, were killed, besides two of his half-brothers, his unpopular minister Ablavius, and one or two others. The only two members of the Imperial family saved alive, besides the sons of the Emperor, were the two sons of his half-brother Julius Constantius—Gallus, who was then supposed to be dying ; and the baby Julian, who was saved by a Christian bishop.

¹ Strictly speaking, Hanniballian was given the title of king, and not of Cæsar.

The three brothers then met at Sirmium, and re-divided the empire. Constantine II. took the West, Constans the central provinces, and Constantius II. became Emperor of Egypt and the East.

Constantine II. at once invited Athanasius to return to his see ; and after another meeting of the three Emperors at Viminacium, to which Athanasius accompanied Constantine, the Egyptian Patriarch arrived at Alexandria in November 338, and was received with great national demonstrations of joy and thanksgiving. He was not long left in peace, however. Besides other charges which he was immediately able to disprove, the Arian bishops outside Egypt represented to Constantius, who was himself an Arian and had forced Eusebius of Nicomedia¹ on the reluctant people of Constantinople as their Patriarch, that Athanasius had offended against all ecclesiastical principles by returning to his see without the formal permission of another General Council of the Church. They therefore represented that the see of Alexandria was canonically vacant, and intrigued to secure the election of a man called Pistus, who was one of the priests excommunicated by the Patriarch Alexander with Arius for heresy. They seem to have thought that by inducing the Bishop of Rome, to whom Pistus was a stranger, to interfere, they would strengthen their cause ; and accordingly three priests were sent as their envoys to Rome.

¹ Eusebius had been twice translated—from Beyrout to Nicomedia, and from Nicomedia to Constantinople—though translation was regarded as uncanonical at that time.

Pope Julius, however, very properly wrote for information to Athanasius, who sent his own legates, charged with such evidence concerning Pistus that the attempt to consecrate him Patriarch of Alexandria was at once dropped, even by his own friends. The legates also brought with them a synodal epistle from the Church of Egypt, signed by nearly one hundred Egyptian bishops, in which they set forth the innocence of Athanasius, and declared that the real aim of the Eusebians was to establish the Arian heresy in Egypt. Julius of Rome proposed that a Council should be called to settle the question, and this proposal was apparently adopted by both parties. But early in 340 Constantine II., who had been the protector of Athanasius, was killed in a skirmish; and almost immediately afterwards the Church of Alexandria was electrified by the announcement, in a formal edict of the Prefect Philagrius, that not Pistus but a man named Gregory was coming from the Court of Constantius to be installed as Patriarch of Alexandria in the room of Athanasius.

Gregory was a native of Cappadocia, but he had been educated in the Alexandrian college, and had received kindness from Athanasius. He had not himself been excommunicated for Arianism, but his secretary Ammon had been, like Pistus, deposed on that ground by Alexander. His appointment was the signal for popular riots in Alexandria. A great meeting, among many others, being held to protest against this treatment of Athanasius, in the church of St. Quirinus,¹ Philagrius, who was a countryman and friend of Gregory, encouraged a mob of the lowest rabble of the heathen populace (some say he headed them himself) to attack the church. The mob swarmed into the most holy places, burned the church books, drove out the congregation with brutal insult, and pillaged the church stores. Some of the monks were slain in defending the property of the church.

¹ This saint was probably Quirinus, Bishop of Siscia, in Illyricum, who was one of the martyrs under Diocletian.

Athanasius was then living in the precincts of the church of St. Theonas ; but knowing that he was specially aimed at, and fearing danger to the church from his presence there, he withdrew from the city, and left Gregory four days later to make his entry into the city unopposed. This all happened during the season of Lent, and the unfortunate Alexandrians suffered actual persecution at the hands of the intruding bishop. The clergy of Alexandria were forbidden to baptize or visit the sick, and on Good Friday itself a fresh outrage took place. As Gregory made his public entry into the church he was hooted and insulted by the indignant populace. Gregory appealed to his friend the prefect, who at his desire seized and scourged no fewer than thirty-four of those present, among whom were some men of rank, but the majority of whom were defenceless women. Another indictment was drawn up, signed only by heathens and Arians, accusing Athanasius of capital crimes. That unfortunate Patriarch decided to go to Rome, in the hopes that the promised Church Council would shortly be held there. Julius received him with much kindness, and sent off two priests with the invitations to the Council, which he fixed for the December in that year. Meanwhile he courteously entreated Athanasius to remain with him, and the latter, probably feeling that his presence in Alexandria under the circumstances could do no good and might do harm, readily consented, and strove to turn away his thoughts as much as possible from the evil which he could not avert. He says of himself at this time : ' When I had laid my case before the Church, for this was my one subject of anxiety, I spent my time in the Church services.' Two Egyptians had accompanied him, Ammonius (a monk from Nitria) and Isidore ; but it is to be feared that this sojourn in the far-famed city was rather wasted on the former, since it is recorded of him that he showed no interest in any Roman buildings except the church of SS. Peter and Paul.¹ This sojourn of 'Pope Athanasius' in Rome had a lasting effect on the Latin Church. His accounts of the monastic system in Egypt were eagerly listened to, and an enormous impetus was given to the practice of celibacy in the West. Indeed, Gibbon states that ' Athanasius introduced into Rome the knowledge and practice of the monastic life ;' but it is difficult to imagine that this is literally true, and that there were no monks in Rome before the coming of Athanasius. In this manner Athanasius waited ' the Lord's leisure ' for eighteen months.

¹ This Ammonius was the eldest of the Tall Brothers, of whom we hear so much under Theophilus.

CHAPTER · XV

GREGORY AND GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA

A.D. 340 ABOUT the same time as the Emperor Constantine II.
 A.M. 56 (probably a few months earlier), died one of the most celebrated men of his age, to whose labours we owe almost all that we know of the first three centuries of the Christian Church—Eusebius of Cæsarea, the historian. He had been at first inclined to take the side of Arius in the unhappy controversy which we have briefly sketched, but had given his assent to the decision of the Council of Nicea, and had faithfully abided by it. He was the most trusted friend of Constantine the Great, whom he idolised, and had been employed by him of late years in literary labours. It is particularly noted that the Alexandrian book-writers made for the Emperor, by the order of Eusebius, fifty copies of the Scriptures for use in the principal churches which Constantine had rebuilt and dedicated. Not one of these precious copies has survived to our day, so far as we know, though there is always the hope that some Egyptian tomb or long-forgotten hiding-place may one day restore to us one of these early texts.

The pagan authors of Egypt were not idle during this time. We still possess some of the works of Alypius¹ and Iamblicus, who were the principal teachers of the Neo-

¹ Only one work—on music—remains by this author.

Platonic philosophy in Alexandria. Achilles Tatius wrote a book on astronomy, that ever-favourite science of the Egyptians, besides a romance of doubtful character. He subsequently became a Christian, and, it is said, was made a bishop. Another writer on the kindred science of astrology was Hephæstion of Thebes, who wrote a treatise to explain the influences of the several signs of the zodiac on mankind. His division of the zodiac is the same as that on the ceiling of the temple of Dendera.

Meanwhile Gregory continued his evil doings in Alexandria. He persecuted the aunt of Athanasius, and, when she died, endeavoured to deprive her of Christian burial. He is accused of seizing 'the doles of widows.'¹ When he left Alexandria, on a visitation throughout Egypt, matters grew even worse. Those bishops who refused to acknowledge his authority were treated with the utmost cruelty. Potammon, who has been mentioned as the friend of Athanasius at Tyre, who was also one of the three hundred and eighteen at Nicea, and had been mutilated in the persecution of Diocletian, was now, in his old age, so cruelly scourged by a man calling himself a Christian bishop that he died a few days after, and is reckoned among the martyrs. St. Anthony wrote from his mountain cell to remonstrate with Gregory, but his letter was treated with insult.

December passed, and still no Council assembled at Rome. At length, in January, the two priests sent by Julius returned with a letter from the Arian bishops, so offensive that the Bishop of Rome, in the true spirit of Christian charity, forbore to show it, and still waited, in the hope that some of the bishops at least would come. Instead of this, the Arian party took advantage of a great festival for the approaching dedication of a new cathedral in Antioch to hold a Council there. Ninety-seven bishops came, and, besides some formal business, re-affirmed the condemnation and degradation of Athanasius. On the other hand, in the November of the same year, Julius called a Council of over fifty bishops at Rome, by which Athanasius, after formal investigation of all the charges against him, was declared innocent. Neither Council took any notice of the proceedings of the other. Athanasius still remained in Rome, not wishing to create fresh scandal by returning to Alexandria while Gregory was there. At length, in 343, he received the welcome news that the Emperor Constans had resolved to summon a true Council of the East and West. He had an interview with Constans at Milan, and then went to meet the venerable Hosius of Cordova. The Council met at Sardica at the end of 343, and, after much wrangling, the Arian bishops withdrew, refusing even to state their case. The principal canon passed on this occasion was the memorable one which provided for a reference in certain circumstances to the Roman see, which thus laid the foundation of the priority which Rome afterwards claimed over all other sees—a claim never allowed by the Patriarchates (afterwards the Churches) of Constantinople and Alexandria.

¹ The same accusation is brought against Athanasius, so that it is worth little.

Constantius, irritated at the failure of his own party in the Church, so far from accepting the decision of the Council, only advised fresh severities in Egypt. The Alexandrian magistrates received orders to behead Athanasius if he ventured to return to his see; five of his clergy were banished, and many fled into the desert to escape the persecution of the Arian party. At length, in 344, the discovery of a vile plot on the part of the Arian Patriarch of Antioch against an inoffensive priest gave Constantius a revulsion of feeling against them, and he made overtures to Athanasius. In February 345 Gregory died in Alexandria, and the way was now made open for Athanasius; but, distrustful of Constantius, he hesitated longer than we should have expected. It was not till October in 346 that Athanasius at length returned to his native country. Gregory of Nazianzen has left a wonderful account of his reception by the whole populace—the many-coloured crowd pouring out of the city to meet him, climbing every convenient edifice to get a glimpse of him, the air fragrant with incense, and at night the city illuminated in his honour. His Paschal letter for 347 begins with a thanksgiving for having been brought back from distant lands, and ends with information concerning bishops whom he had recently consecrated.

Three years of peace for Athanasius and Egypt followed. He found much to be done in his distracted province. Besides the new bishops whom it was his first care to consecrate, it was apparently about this time that he appointed Didymus to the headship of the Catechetical School. This remarkable man had lost his sight from disease (probably acute ophthalmia) when he was about four, and in consequence was not taught as a child even the ordinary rudiments of learning. But his desire for knowledge was so keen that neither his great misfortune nor his neglected education could daunt him. He cultivated his memory till it became a marvellous faculty. He had the letters of the alphabet engraved on wooden tablets, and taught himself to read by feeling them. Socrates tells us that in this way he taught himself grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, logic, arithmetic, and music; and this so thoroughly that he was able to hold his own in discussions with those who had learnt the same sciences from ordinary books. Already his fame was so great that the hermit Anthony had sought him out on his recent visit to Alexandria, and is reported to have addressed him in the following words: 'Didymus, let not the loss of your bodily eyes distress you; for although you are deprived of such organs as confer a faculty of perception common to mosquitoes and flies, you should rather rejoice that you have eyes such as angels see with, by which the Deity Himself is discerned and His light comprehended.' Socrates further notes that Didymus, even before his appointment to the charge of the college, was regarded as the great bulwark of the true faith and the most powerful antagonist of the Arians. He wrote many books, of which four are still in existence. Already it was becoming a recognised opinion in the Church that the great Origen was a dangerous teacher, little better than a heretic—another instance of the sad change in the general temper of the Church since the great persecution—and Didymus published a commentary on Origen's book 'Of Principles,' showing that the objections were shallow, and that those who denounced him 'were destitute of sufficient penetration to comprehend the profound wisdom of that extraordinary man.' This book, however, is not one of those that remain to us. Pupils again thronged to Alexandria from all parts of the civilised world, and many years later Rufinus and Jerome, both of them then in middle age, came to sit at the feet of the 'blind seer' of Alexandria.

This season of rest did not last long. In February 350

Constans was killed during the revolt of Magnentius, and Constantius was left sole emperor. Athanasius had good reason to fear the action of the latter; but it was not till May 353 that he thought it advisable, his calumniators being again hard at work, to send an embassy of five bishops and three priests to justify himself before the Emperor. One of these bishops was Serapion of Thmuis,¹ an important city in the Delta. This is the same man whom some authorities make one of the presidents of the Catechetical School, either before or after Peter; but, if so, he must have been extraordinarily old when he died. Still, it is not impossible that very young men took temporary charge of the school in times of persecution, as we know that Origen did. Serapion was a man of learning, an author, and a constant friend and correspondent of Athanasius. But this embassy had little or no effect. Constantius first tried by stratagem to entice the powerful Patriarch into Europe again, and, failing in that, convened a Council at Arles, the decisions of which were inimical to Athanasius. Indeed, no less than ten Church Councils were held in the reign of Constantius, not counting the Synods of Rimini and Selucia, all chiefly concerned with unbecoming disputes between the Athanasian and the Arian parties. Constantius considered himself the Head of the Church in spiritual as well as temporal matters, and arrogated to himself an authority over the Popes and bishops of the empire which his greater father never attempted to exercise. The pagan historian Ammianus Marcellinus says of this emperor :—

¹ It must not be forgotten that there were two cities of this name in Egypt, and some indications would lead us to suppose that both were bishoprics at one time.

The Christian religion is plain and simple, but Constantius confounded it with senile superstition. He roused many differences by curious inquiries, instead of reconciling them by his authority; and when these had spread in all directions, he propagated them by verbal disputes. He utterly ruined the postal service by allowing the use of the horses to troops of bishops, who were constantly galloping hither and thither to the various synods, as they call them, in the endeavour to enforce uniformity for their own opinions.

During the Lent of 354 the Alexandria churches became so overcrowded that the people suffered great inconvenience. Athanasius was therefore entreated by the citizens to hold the Easter services in the great church of the Cæsareum, which was a barely finished building, and as yet undedicated. Athanasius hesitated, well knowing that, if he consented, it would give his enemies a fresh handle against him; for the church of the Cæsareum occupied the site of the palace called the Cæsareum, the old palace of the Roman emperors, and was still the private property of the Emperor, since it had not yet been formally handed over to the Church. It would be therefore a manifest act of discourtesy to his sovereign to appropriate the church before it was given; moreover, to hold the Easter services in an undedicated building was an ecclesiastical irregularity. In the end Athanasius allowed himself to be over-persuaded, against his better judgment; the church was used, and the offence was given. In 355 Athanasius was again condemned by a Council at Milan after some stormy scenes between four bishops, who stood up for Athanasius,¹ and the Emperor, who was furious to find that his authority to punish a bishop by his personal decree was denied. The bishops bluntly told him that they were not there to avenge his private wrongs. 'As a bishop,' they said, 'Athanasius must be judged by bishops, not by the Emperor. Do not confuse the canons with Imperial decrees.'

¹ From the sees of Vercellæ, Calaris, Milan, and Naples. Liberius of Rome and Hosius of Cordova were not either at Arles or at Milan.

'Canons!' exclaimed the indignant Emperor. 'What I wish, that is a canon!'

In August of the same year one of the Imperial notaries came to Alexandria, and tried unofficially to get Athanasius out of the city, without success. In January 356, Syrianus, a Byzantine general, and another notary named Hilarius, arrived with a summons to Athanasius, but still without any written authority. Athanasius, supported by the whole body of clergy and laity, refused to surrender himself without the written warrant of the Emperor, and Syrianus swore by the life of the Emperor, in the presence of the Prefect of Egypt and the Provost of Alexandria, that he would take no further steps against Athanasius until the warrant arrived.

Three weeks afterward, while the Patriarch, in the church of St. Theonas, was assisting at one of those midnight services which have always been a conspicuous feature in the Egyptian Church, alarm was given that soldiers were approaching, headed by Syrianus, Hilarius, and Gorgonius, the head of the police force. Athanasius at once addressed the congregation in the hope of preventing panic flight, or active resistance.

'I sat down,' he wrote afterwards, 'on my throne,¹ and desired the deacon to read the Psalm [136th], and the people to respond "For His mercy endureth for ever," and then all to depart home.'

¹ The bishop's throne was always behind the altar, and facing the people, in the Egyptian Church; it is generally a recess in the wall, like the kiblah of a mosque, with stone seat raised high enough for its occupant to be seen by the congregation.

In the darkness outside the soldiers battered at the doors¹ while the deacon read through the poem of thanksgiving, which must have fallen so strangely on the ears of the expectant congregation. Then, even as the response went up 'For His mercy endureth for ever,' the doors were forced, and the Byzantine soldiery poured in with a fierce yell of exultation, their naked swords flashing in the light of the church lamps. They rushed up the church towards the Patriarch, who stood up and called to the people to escape while they could. Some, however, tried to bar the passage of the soldiers, and were slain and trampled upon as the fierce struggle went on up the nave. The clergy urged Athanasius to escape, but he refused, knowing well that so long as he was in sight his intending murderers would make for him, and let alone all those who did not attempt to interfere with them.

I said I would not do so (he writes) until they had all got away safe. So I stood up, and called for prayer, and desired all to go out before me. . . . And when the greater part were gone, the monks who were there and certain of the clergy came up and carried me away.

By this time the frightful crush had reached to such a pitch that Athanasius fainted as he was borne out, and in the dim light they dragged him out unobserved of the yelling soldiers, who were still pressing up to the now empty throne in the sanctuary. Athanasius was hurried into concealment before his enemies perceived that he had vanished, 'no one knew whither, in the darkness of the night.'

¹ Almost all Egyptian churches are also strongholds; they have never been free from the necessity.

For six years the persecuted Patriarch remained in hiding, passing from one place to another as the officers of the Emperor sought for him throughout the country. His adventures and his hairbreadth escapes read like those of a young hero of romance; but Athanasius never forgot the Patriarch in the fugitive. He ate the hard unleavened bread of the country, and drank water from the Nile; he sat on a rush mat, and thought himself happy when he could do this in the light of day, among the simple hermits of Nitria or the Thebaid, instead of hiding for his life in a dark cistern, or in some forsaken Egyptian tomb. Every cave and glen was known to the monks, and there was no laura, monastery, or village that did not think itself honoured by the presence of this dangerous guest. But nothing shows the greatness of the man so clearly as the use that, in spite of this perpetual atmosphere of unrest and hardship, he made of these six years. He never lost touch with his church for a day. Though invisible, except to his guardians for the time being, he never ceased to correspond with his bishops, despatching letters and orders which were received as loyally as if he were actually ruling from the Alexandrian throne. He carried on an enormous correspondence, consoling the faithful, advising the perplexed; and, besides all this, he utilised this period of comparative inaction for literary labour of a most substantial kind. He was sixty years old, he had no reasonable prospect of ever returning to safety and civilisation, he heard only grievous news from the outer world, yet he seems always to have remained cheerful; and it is certain that during this time he wrote the Apology¹ to Constantius, the Apology for his flight, the Letter to the Monks, the Letter to Serapion (his friend the Bishop of Thmuis), and his great work, the Orations against the Arians.

¹ It is hardly necessary to point out that the word 'apology' is used in its technical sense, not in its popular modern one. These were elaborate treatises, not merely letters of self-defence and excuse.

At first he had contemplated an appeal in person to the Emperor Constantius, but was convinced of the futility of this course. Almost immediately after the attempt to murder Athanasius in the church of St. Theonas tidings came to Alexandria that another Arian bishop, also a native of Cappadocia, was coming to assume the government of the Church of Egypt in his room. This man's name was George;¹ and it is said that, before his admission to the priesthood, he had been a fraudulent contractor at Constantinople. He was, however, a man of learning. As before, Lent was chosen for the arrival of the usurper, and persecution commenced almost immediately afterwards. Athanasius gives the names of seventeen bishops and two priests who were sent into exile, and treated so harshly by those in charge of them that some died on their way and some soon after they arrived at their destination. Altogether, he says that more than thirty Egyptian bishops were got rid of. Speaking of what George did in Alexandria, Athanasius says :

When Easter week was past, the virgins were cast into prison, the bishops led in chains by the military, and the dwellings even of orphans and widows forcibly entered and pillaged. Christians were interred by night, houses were marked, and the relatives of the clergy were endangered on their account. Even these outrages were dreadful, but the persecutors soon proceeded to such as were still more so ; for in the week after the Holy Pentecost the people, having fasted, went forth to a cemetery to pray, because all were averse to communion with George. That brutal persecutor, being informed of this, instigated against them Sebastian, an officer who was a Manichean. At the head of a body of troops armed with drawn swords, bows, and darts, he marched out to attack the people, although it was the Lord's Day. Finding but few at prayers, as the most part had retired because of the lateness of the hour, he performed such exploits as might be expected from savage barbarians. Having kindled a fire, he set the virgins near it, in order to compel them to say that they were of the Arian faith ; but seeing they were not to be overcome, and that they despised the fire, he then stripped them, and so beat them on the face that for a long time afterwards they could scarcely be recognised. Seizing also about forty men, he flogged them in an extraordinary manner, for he so lacerated their backs with rods fresh cut from the palm-trees, which still had their thorns on, that some were obliged to procure surgical aid in order to have the thorns extracted from their flesh, while others, unable to bear the agony, died under its infliction. All the survivors, with one virgin, he banished to the Great Oasis. The bodies of the dead were not at first suffered to be claimed by their relatives, but, being denied the rites of sepulture, were concealed as the authors of these barbarities thought fit, that the evidences of their cruelty might not appear. Such was the blindness with which those madmen acted ; for while the friends of the deceased rejoiced on account of their confession, but mourned because of their bodies being uninterred, the impious inhumanity of these acts became more distinctly conspicuous.

¹ The similarity of name between Gregory and George (Gregorius, Georgius), and the fact that they were both of Cappadocia, has led to a good deal of confusion between them. The narrative in the text was written after very careful study of all the available authorities.

As the years passed on, each brought some fresh tidings of sorrow to the fugitive Patriarch. In 357 his venerable friend, Hosius of Cordova, worn out with constant persecution, and grown almost imbecile with age, signed an Arian creed. The light of his intellect flamed up again before his death, and he at once recanted what he had done; but it must have been a sore blow to Athanasius, especially as it was followed in 358 by the desertion of Liberius of Rome. In 358, 359, and 360, Arian Councils were held, on which Athanasius commented—with patience, forbearance, and tact—in his Letter on the Councils of Ariminum and Selucia. Next came news of the death of the hermit Anthony, always the firm friend and supporter of Athanasius. And in 361 came tidings which at first must have seemed worst of all. Once more a pagan was at the head of the civilised world. Constantius was dead, and the throne had fallen to Julian the Apostate.

Julian had never been a Christian, though he had been educated in that faith. The blame for his apostacy lies far less with him than with those who were responsible for the distracted and un-Christian state of the Church. It was a Christian emperor, his own cousin, who had begun his reign with a general massacre of all their common relations, and it was no fault of his that Julian had survived to reign after him. Julian, though made Cæsar in 355, at the age of twenty-four, and Augustus by a popular demonstration of the soldiery (not acknowledged by Constantius) in 360, had been allowed little real power, and had been for most of his life a sort of State prisoner. It was an open secret that for some years he had renounced Christianity, and just before his cousin's death he had thrown off the mask and professed himself openly, with private lustrations and public sacrifices, a pagan. His favourite city was Paris, which now appears for the first time in history. He was a widower and childless. Julian succeeded to the empire in November, and was at first absorbed in needful arrangements in Constantinople. On Christmas Eve there was a fierce riot in Alexandria, directed by the now exultant pagans against the three most unpopular men in the place—George, Diodorus, and Dracontius. For some time the feeling on the part of the pagan populace had been growing against these three men. Diodorus was a Christian of wealth and station in Alexandria and a Count of the Roman Empire, so that he was probably of Greek extraction, though he seems to have been a native of Egypt. He was carrying on the still unfinished works of the great church of the Cæsareum, but he had wounded the feeling of the Egyptians by cutting off (presumably using his authority to enforce it on the Alexandrian students) the long lock of hair hanging down at the side, which in the early ages of the Egyptian Empire had been the mark of a king's son or daughter; under the Ptolemies, the mark of high rank; and now worn by all who were proud of their true Egyptian descent. Dracontius was the prefect of the Alexandrian mint, and had given great offence by the removal of a pagan altar which he found in the building. Against the Patriarch George the charges were of a far more serious nature. Besides the deliberate oppression of all the orthodox Christians, he had alienated all parties by his greed and tyranny. He had exasperated the Alexandrians by suggesting to the Emperor that a house tax should be imposed on the whole city; he had secured for himself the monopoly of the nitre and salt works; he had procured the banishment of Zeno, a celebrated pagan physician in Alexandria; he brought Artemius,¹ the Prefect of Egypt, with an armed force into the very stronghold of paganism, the great temple of Serapis, which he plundered of its statues and ornaments; he even attempted to secure to himself the monopoly of what we should now call the undertaker's trade, 'so that it was not safe even to bury a corpse without employing those who let out biers under his direction.' Already in August 358 the Alexandrian populace had made an attack on the church of St. Dionysius, in the precincts of which George was living, and, though the Imperial soldiery were quickly summoned to his aid, it was only after hard fighting that they succeeded in rescuing him. In the October of the same year he was obliged to leave the city, as his life was no longer safe there, and he did not return until after the Councils of Rimini and Selucia,¹ probably in November 359. Ammianus, the pagan historian, records his threat that he would make many a man suffer for his exile. Another year passed. George was at the height of his power, and took occasion deliberately to insult the pagan community in the following manner. There was a place in the city, long abandoned to neglect and filth, which had once been a pagan temple, where human sacrifices had been offered to Mithras. Constantius had granted the useless site to the Alexandrian Church, and George proposed to build a church upon it; but, to do this, it was necessary to clear away the rubbish. In the course of the work an adytum of great depth was discovered, in which skulls and many other remains revealed the disgraceful nature of the heathenish rites which had been perpetrated there. George saw in this an opportunity for a great demonstration against the pagans. He organised a solemn procession of Christians, which went about the city, publicly exposing the skulls and heathen symbols which had been found. The tumult grew as the riotous classes of the city poured out into the streets to see what was going on; the better classes of pagans, wounded to the quick, made no effort to restrain them, and the situation was critical enough already, when suddenly word was brought that a ship had arrived with tidings of the death of the Emperor Constantius and the accession of Julian the Apostate. The news must have run through the excited city like fire, and the smouldering passion of the pagan population broke out instantly. They flung themselves upon the Christian procession. 'Away with George!' went up in a unanimous shout; he was seized, with Diodorus and Dracontius, and probably would have been murdered on the spot, if some of the more law-abiding citizens had not interfered, and the wretched man was thrown with his companions into prison. But their fate was only delayed for a time. The news of Julian's accession arrived on or about November 30, 361; and for a week or two the Patriarch George, with the two other men, against whom no crimes are recorded, remained in prison, since apparently the accession of a new emperor increased the delays of the law. But the growing strength of pagan feeling could no longer be restrained, and on Christmas Eve it broke out into open riot. The prison was forced by a howling mob, the three men dragged out, beaten with sticks, kicked, and, as Julian himself describes it, 'the people actually tore a man in pieces, as if they had been dogs.' The mangled body of George was flung upon the back of a camel, the two other corpses were dragged along with ropes, and so carried about the city in hideous mockery of the former procession. At last they burnt the bodies on the sea-shore, and cast the ashes into the sea—the extremity of insult that an Egyptian could offer to the dead.

¹ For this and other high-handed proceedings Artemius was headed by Julian.

¹ By a majority at the latter he, with several other bishops, was deposed from his see, but the sentence took no effect.

So died that George of Alexandria whom Gibbon tried, some fourteen centuries later, to identify with St. George of England, the Great Martyr of the East. We have shown in an earlier chapter that this identification is not only improbable, but impossible. Nevertheless, it seems probable that this later George was afterwards honoured by the Arians, and churches dedicated to him.

CHAPTER XVI

THE RETURN AND DEATH OF ATHANASIUS

A.D. 361
A.M. 77 ON hearing of the murder of George, Julian wrote a very curious letter to the pagan community of Alexandria, ostensibly to blame them for the crime they had committed, but ending with the following clause, instead of imposing any punishment upon them :—

It is fortunate for you, ye Alexandrians, that such an atrocity has been perpetrated in our reign, who by reason of our reverence for the gods, and on account of our grandfather and uncle whose name we bear, and who governed Egypt and your city, still retain a fraternal affection for you. Assuredly that power which will not suffer itself to be disrespected, and such a government as is possessed of a vigorous and healthy constitution, could not connive at such unbridled licentiousness in its subjects, but would unsparingly purge out the dangerous distemper by the application of sufficiently strong remedies. We shall, however, in your case, for the reasons already assigned, restrict ourselves to the more mild and gentle medicine of remonstrance and exhortation ; to the which mode of treatment we are persuaded ye will the more readily submit, inasmuch as we understand ye are not only Greeks by original descent, but still preserve in your memory and character the traces of the glory of your ancestors. Let this be published to our citizens of Alexandria.

There can be no doubt that Julian's was an ascetic and deeply religious temperament, and that his zeal for the older faith would have led him to open persecution of the Christians, if he had not clearly perceived that any such attempt would unite all the different Christian parties against him, and that such a combination would be now strong enough to cost him his life and his crown. He contented himself therefore with issuing a series of oppressive edicts, principally relating to education, which sorely crippled the work of the Church; and struck a blow at the more powerful Arian party by a decree allowing all bishops exiled by Constantius to return to their sees, and commanding that their confiscated property should be restored to them. Thus the first effect of the accession of a pagan emperor was to restore Athanasius, among others, to his place and power. It was in February 362 that Athanasius returned, and with him the Western Bishops of Vercellæ and Calaris, who had been banished into the Thebaid. Lucifer of Calaris hurried on to Antioch, but Eusebius of Vercellæ remained in Alexandria to take part in a Council which Athanasius at once summoned. Only twenty bishops apparently remained to attend this Council of the great number which Athanasius had under him in the early days of his Patriarchate. At this Council it was agreed to re-admit all to communion who were ready to accept the Nicene faith, without stirring up old animosities by any further discussion. But the Patriarch was not long left in peace. Julian soon recognised that Athanasius was not a foe to be despised, and that the pagan religion had no chance to make way against the faith of Christ in Egypt while Athanasius remained in Alexandria.¹ Julian's anger rose to its height when he heard that very soon after his return Athanasius had dared to receive and baptize some Greek ladies as converts from paganism. He sent peremptory orders that Athanasius should leave Alexandria at once, as the Imperial amnesty had not been intended to apply to him.

¹ Julian writes to the Prefect of Alexandria: 'Though you neglect to write to me on any other subject, at least it is your duty to inform me of your conduct towards Athanasius, the enemy of the gods. My

This order reached Athanasius in October 362. He consoled his weeping friends, and then hastily embarked to go up the Nile. Before he had gone very far intimation was in some manner conveyed to him that he was pursued by Government agents, who were close behind, though out of sight owing to a bend in the river. With great presence of mind Athanasius ordered his boat to be turned, and went quietly to meet the Government boat, the men in which shouted as they passed to know if they had seen Athanasius. 'He is not far off,' answered the Patriarch, and in another moment the boat was out of sight. Athanasius pressed on to Chæru, where he landed and made his way by land to Memphis, whence he wrote his Festal letter, and then once more took refuge in the Thebaid. Near Hermopolis he was met by Théodore, abbot of the monastery of Tabennesi,¹ who came out to meet him with a torchlight triumphal procession, as of a returning conqueror instead of an exiled Patriarch. Athanasius stayed some time in Hermopolis and Antioe, preaching and intentions have been long since communicated to you. I swear, by the great Serapis, that unless on the calends of December Athanasius has departed from Alexandria—nay, from Egypt—the officers of your Government shall pay a fine of 100 pounds of gold. I am slow to condemn, but I am still slower to forgive.'

¹ The monastery of Ta-ben-isi (the city of Isis; or, as the Greeks called it, Aphroditopolis) was probably that now known as the White Monastery—Deyr el Abieth.

openly performing his duties, as if on an ordinary visitation tour; but at midsummer he received fresh warning that he was in danger, and Theodore came again with another abbot to entreat him to conceal himself in Tabenna. He embarked in a covered boat with the two monks; but the wind was against them, and it became necessary to tow the boat with painful slowness. Athanasius was for some time absorbed in prayer, and did not observe the faces of his two companions. At length he turned to them and began 'If I am killed'—but broke off as a curious smile passed between the two monks, who thereupon informed him that even while he prayed they had received a supernatural intimation that Julian was no more. Julian was, in fact, slain on the field of battle on June 26, 363. It is not certainly known how he was killed, but at the time the pagan historians did not scruple to assert that he had been treacherously slain by one of his Christian soldiers, who, being a fanatic, had persuaded himself that he was called upon to slay the enemy of the Lord. But there is no evidence in support of this statement. Callistus, one of his body-guard, declared that he had been killed by a demon; and the Christians declared that he had died by the visitation of God. It is remarkable that several people in different parts of the empire are said to have received supernatural intimation of his death at the moment of its occurrence. We have mentioned the vision of Theodore in the boat, which put an end to the hasty flight of Athanasius; and of Didymus, the blind professor of Alexandria, a similar instance is recorded. In deep distress at the state of the Church and the triumph of the pagans, the old man had passed a whole day in fasting and prayer, and towards midnight he fell asleep in his chair. At one o'clock he was roused by hearing a voice say distinctly, 'Julian is dead; rise, eat, and send tidings to Athanasius.' Didymus carefully noted the day and hour, and found that Julian had indeed died at that moment from his wounds.

The best-known vision on the subject, however, and the most commonly told in Egypt, is that of Basil, afterwards Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia. Before Julian's apostasy Basil, who was then a cultivated and deeply religious layman, had been a personal friend of his, and on the accession of the former to the throne he sent to Basil to come and reside at Court. Basil was about to accept the invitation, when he became aware of the Emperor's public declaration of his apostasy, and at once refused. Julian, stung to the quick, retaliated by a persecution of Cæsarea, where Basil had recently been ordained a priest; and wrote a letter to Basil to demand a thousand pounds in gold towards the expenses of his Persian expedition, threatening in the event of the money not being forthcoming to raze the city of Cæsarea to the ground. Basil was overcome by despair and perplexity at this demand; but in the night he had a dream. In his dream he saw the heavens opened, and heard Jesus Christ command His servant Mercurius to go forth and kill Julian, the enemy of His anointed. Mercurius, clad in shining armour, disappeared twice. Returning the third time, he said: 'I have killed the Emperor Julian, as Thou hast commanded me, O Lord, and he is dead.' Basil awoke in terror, and went to the church, where the priests and the faithful were gathered for the prayer of the night. To them he recounted his dream, and they entreated him to keep silence until the event should be certain; but, on the contrary, he published his dream everywhere. And afterwards came the news that it was true, and the people rejoiced.¹ In all the Egyptian pictures of St. Mercurius he is represented holding two swords crossed above his head, with the crowned and prostrate figure of Julian underneath his horse's hoofs.

On the death of Julian, the chief of the imperial body-guard was hastily elected in his stead by the soldiers in camp. Jovian was, like many of the 'Roman' emperors, a Servian by nationality, and of good family. He was a Christian of the orthodox faith, and his short reign was one of peace for the Church. The greater part of the army returned at once to their former faith, and all over the empire the public rejoicing and speedy desertion of the pagan temples showed how superficial the heathen reaction had been. Jovian issued an edict² in which he proclaimed perfect liberty of conscience to all his subjects, forbidding only the practice of magic. He wrote to Athanasius a letter of warm sympathy and admiration, and begged him to draw up a statement of the Catholic faith. This Athanasius did in the form of a synodal letter, and then sailed for Antioch, where he met with an enthusiastic reception.

Meanwhile the Arians in Alexandria were not idle. One of their number, Lucius, who had been ordained priest by George before his death, was persuaded to go to the new emperor to seek that appointment at his hands which they knew it was hopeless to expect to obtain by regular methods in Alexandria. The little band of Arians presented themselves with their petition before Jovian at one of the gates of Antioch as he rode out. On being asked their business, they said they were Christians from Alexandria, and wanted a bishop. The Emperor told them that he had already written the order for Athanasius to return. They answered that Athanasius had been for years a condemned and exiled man, and that it was not his return which they desired. Here a soldier interrupted them by telling the Emperor that these men were only 'the refuse of that unhallowed George,' and Jovian rode on without paying any further attention to their petition. They persisted, however, in their efforts to obtain a hearing against Athanasius, and followed the Emperor about till he swore at the sailors who had not taken the opportunity of throwing Lucius into the sea on his voyage from Alexandria.

¹ I have given the story as told by John of Nikius, who supposes, however, that Basil was at this time Bishop of Cæsarea.

² See oration of Themistius, in 364.

Athanasius returned to Alexandria in February 364, and a few days later the Egyptians were struck with consternation on hearing that Jovian, from whom they hoped so much, was dead. He had ordered a brazier of charcoal to be brought in to a bitterly cold room where he intended to sleep, and in the morning he was found dead in his bed.

His immediate successor was Valentinian I., but, as far as Egypt was concerned, Valens, to whom his brother assigned the government of the East. Valens was, in so far as he was a Christian at all, an Arian, and therefore, as history almost justifies us in saying, a persecutor.

In 365 he issued an order for the expulsion of all the Catholic bishops who had been recalled by Julian. When the news reached Alexandria, in May, there was so strong a demonstration in favour of Athanasius that the prefect did not venture then to carry out the order.

In October Athanasius was living in the precincts of St. Dionysius's Church, whence he hastily took his flight on receiving a warning that the prefect intended to take action against him. That same night the Imperial troops broke into the building, and searched it even to the roof; but in vain.

Socrates says that Athanasius concealed himself for four months 'in his father's tomb.' Finding, however, that Egypt refused to be pacified, the Emperor yielded the point for the time, and Athanasius was allowed to return to his government. For nearly two years Egypt remained at peace in the exercise of the Christian religion under their own bishop. During this time, however, a pagan riot in Alexandria is recorded on July 1, 366, in the course of which the great church of the Cæsareum, which had only been finished in 361, was burnt.

In 367 Lucius, having obtained an irregular consecration out of Egypt, made a sort of piratical raid on Alexandria, with some hope of obtaining the coveted Patriarchate by force, and evidently with the sanction of the Emperor. He went straight to the house of his mother, who still lived; but, the news of his arrival becoming known, the house was surrounded by a threatening crowd, and, when the prefect sent officers to order him to leave the country, they reported that to insist on his leaving the house would insure his being murdered by the infuriated mob, which seems to have been largely composed of pagans. The prefect then sent a strong guard to bring him out through the shouts and execrations of the populace, and the next day he was put on board a ship, and sent out of the country to save his life.

In 368 Athanasius began to rebuild the Cæsareum, and the next year laid the foundations of another church, which was called after his name. About this time the people of two towns in Pentapolis, desiring to have a bishop of their own, persuaded the aged bishop of the diocese to which they belonged to consecrate a young layman named Siderius. Athanasius gently rebuked the irregularity, but rectified it himself; and afterwards, finding Siderius worthy, promoted him to a more important see. Later, Athanasius excommunicated a cruel and licentious governor in Libya, and sent circular letters to the heads of the different Churches saying that he had done so, and giving his reasons. The last five years of his life were spent in the peaceful performance of his duties and active correspondence with the bishops of other Churches, especially with Basil of Cæsarea in Cappadocia. Most of these were concerning different heresies, and more particularly those of Apollinaris and of Marcellus of Ancyra.

In 373 the long and laborious life of the great Patriarch came to an end. He passed away peacefully, after nominating Peter as his successor, having governed the Church of Egypt for forty-six years.

CHAPTER XVII

THE SUICIDE OF THE EGYPTIAN NATION

A.D. 373
A.M. 89

WE have pointed out in a former chapter the melancholy results of the war of independence, and of the terrible persecution with which the fourth century opened, on the character of the Egyptian nation. We have now to record what it is hardly too strong a figure of speech to call the suicide of the nation. It is true that a fraction—we are thankful to note, an increasing fraction—remains with us even to this day in the land of Egypt. There is something very touching in the way that the Copts—as, owing to the inability of the Arab to pronounce the word Egyptian, they are now called—never speak of their community as a Church, but always as ‘the Nation.’ But as the war of independence had decimated the brave and patriotic among the Egyptians, as the Era of Martyrs had swept away in fiery chariots of torture the best and most purely religious spirits which were left to her, so, later, the Arian triumph filled her noblest and most intellectual souls with despair of this present world and a conviction that, since Anti-Christ—for so Arius seemed to many of them—had come, the end of the world must be near. This led them to rush by thousands into monasteries and desert cells, leaving only those who cared not whether Christ were God or man, whether Egypt were bound or free, so long as they might till their land or ply their trades in peace.

It is not, of course, intended for one moment to imply that all those who between the years 320 and 390 covered the land with monasteries or honeycombed the barren fields with cells were actuated by the highest motives, or were the best men to be found in Egypt. There were always a faithful few, like the great Athanasius himself, and many others whose names are now lost, who remained true to their posts and to the natural duties of life. But what does need to be pointed out is the fact that both of those who became monks and nuns, and of those again who, like Athanasius, without deserting their duty, yet thought it good for the present distress to refrain from marriage, it was only the best and purest who kept their vows inviolate and left no children to fight for their country or maintain the glory of their ancient name. The importance of this fact can hardly be over-estimated in tracing the course of Egyptian history. It should be remembered, too, that the process had been going on, though slowly, for a long time; indeed, that at first it had been rather checked than otherwise by the introduction of Christianity. For some centuries before that time a certain proportion of the pagan Egyptians had become monks, though—understanding that physical qualities were often hereditary, while not realising that the same laws applied to intellectual and moral characteristics—their monks were often, it seems, chosen from the deformed and helpless. Also cleanliness at least was strictly required of the ancient Egyptian monks. They washed three times a day—before the prayers of sunrise, noon, and sunset. They fasted constantly from animal food, and gave their lives to study. But when, in the second century, the Christian Egyptian began to follow the customs of his forefathers in his new religion, he too often aimed at reducing his despised body below the level of a beast. Ammon, the founder of the Nitrian settlement, thought it wrong for a religious man to see himself unclothed; and even Athanasius is said to have considered bathing an immodest custom! A condition of body which would disgrace the lowest street-boy in England was by these mistaken celibates counted to them for righteousness. In proportion as the Egyptian loved personal cleanliness—and it is in evidence that he generally did—it became a luxury which he must sternly deny himself. Some of them even denied themselves study, though for some centuries—till all the inherited intellect of the nation had been killed out of it by the monastic system—many of the monasteries were retreats of learning, or at least of diligence in copying the manuscripts of the earlier generations.

The causes which led a large number of the worst as well as the best among the Egyptians to embrace vows, which the latter kept and the former broke, with equally disastrous consequences to the nation at large, were complicated and numerous. The law of Constantine which in 320 freed celibates and childless persons from taxation must have given a great impetus to selfish and money-loving people to refrain from marriage—for foundlings, by another law, could be reared at the expense of the State. Also all monks were exempt during the reign of Constantine from military service. But that which contributed more than anything else to the suicide of the Egyptian nation was a profound and national despair.

They had sacrificed their lives and their treasures year after year in the struggle for freedom under Achilleus, and in vain. The iron grip of the detested Roman was closer upon them than ever. Later, though hopeless for their country, they had risen to the call and poured out their blood like water for their faith; and in vain. For so it must have seemed to them when, after some ten brief years of peace and slow recovery, the Arian heresy triumphed in high places, and the Church of Egypt was persecuted and oppressed by Christians who knew not Christ. Nor had they any hope that the evil days might be only an interlude, for all men knew that the heir to the throne was a pagan embittered against all forms of Christianity. Little wonder if they thought, as men have been apt to think in all ages of storm and perplexity, that the end of the world was at hand. So the worsed souls among them grew restless, saying, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' And these multiplied, and the land became filled with their descendants,¹ while the purer souls fled from this evil world, so soon to be destroyed, and waited, instant in prayer and daily self-martyrdom, for the coming of the Lord.

For the folly and faithlessness shown alike by good and bad in that fourth century Egypt has suffered ever since. The extent to which the population became monks and nuns could hardly be believed if it were not attested by contemporary writers, who travelled to Egypt to see this strange thing for themselves. In the same year in which Athanasius died, a little group of Italians who had been living together a semi-monastic life at Aquileia broke up their society and travelled in different directions. The two best-known of these young men are Rufinus and Jerome, who had been friends from boyhood. Well known to them all, and apparently the queen of their little society, was a young married lady named Melania, who was of Spanish extraction. Although she was only twenty-two, she had already three children, when great misfortunes overtook her. Her husband and two of her children died, probably swept away by some infectious disease. The poor lady seems to have regarded this as a judgment on her happy married life, and from that time she not only lived a life of ascetic self-denial herself, but preached a sort of crusade against marriage. Finding that Rufinus, who was then about seven-and-twenty, intended to go and study monastic life in Egypt, she left her only remaining son under guardianship in Italy, and came with Rufinus to Alexandria. Here she remained, while Rufinus with two or three other men travelled up the Nile, visiting all the places of interest, and particularly all the monasteries and hermits.

¹ The morals of the non-monastic classes became so bad, however, that the population decreased in consequence of their debauchery; while riches were so much more gained by fraud than honest industry that it was taken for granted a rich man must have been either a rogue or the heir to a rogue.

At Oxyrhynchus, where formerly the fish had been worshipped, he found the whole population of the town under monastic vows. Most of the males had apparently withdrawn from the city into more secluded monasteries and cells, but the bishop told Rufinus that there were ten thousand monks and twenty thousand nuns in the city. The great temples in which the pagan gods had been worshipped were now monasteries, and there were twelve churches in the town besides. In the Arsinoite nome they also found the whole population under monastic vows; but these all worked in the fields, and sent up the produce of their common land regularly to Alexandria. This was also the case round the cities of Memphis and Babylon.

At Tabennesi three thousand silent monks lived under the government of Ammon, who had succeeded Theodorus as abbot, and had been consecrated bishop by Athanasius. He had been oppressed and banished by George of Cappadocia. Apollonius, the head of the monastery near Hermopolis, which contained 500 monks, had in like manner been made a bishop by Athanasius and persecuted by George of Cappadocia. He had been a monk since he was fifteen, but must have been of good blood, for, so far from neglecting his education, he became one of the most cultivated men of his day, and was able not only to give Rufinus much information about the present state of Christianity in Egypt, but to explain to him the old religion and ceremonies of the ancient Egyptians, and the true significance in former times of the 'sacred' animals. His monks were never allowed to neglect the ordinary decencies of life; 'their garments were as clean as their hearts were pure.' When Rufinus and his friends left this favoured monastery, the courteous Superior sent with them three interpreters as guides. The friends were taken to see several monasteries in towns of which they could not remember the names, as well as a great many of the most celebrated solitaries in their cells.

One of these was high up on the barren mountains behind the town of Antinous, approached only by a path so rugged and narrow that no one not familiar with the place could hope to discover it. In this awful and desolate solitude lived Elias alone in a great cavern; and here he had lived alone, so the travellers were told, for more than seventy years. He was now, they were assured, 110 years of age, and his ancient limbs trembled with palsy. No one in the neighbourhood could remember when Elias had not been living in that cavern, and he was said to have effected many cures. His diet, they were told, was three ounces of bread daily, and three olives in the evening. The young men gazed awestruck at the silent figure, and then made their toilsome way down again to the haunts of men. They visited also the cell of Theon, a monk who was renowned as being learned, not only in Greek and Egyptian, but in Latin.

But the most celebrated of all these solitaries was John of Lycopolis (Assiut), who lived in a cell at the top of a steep rock, and whose wisdom was so highly respected that he was consulted on matters of policy both by the Roman general stationed at Assouan, and later by the Emperor Theodosius. He acted also as the almoner for the district. The whole population, by agreement among themselves, brought him the tenth of their produce, which he distributed to the poor. The plan was found to work so well that it spread all over Egypt, and from Egypt to the rest of Christendom. Indeed, Selden traces the origin of Christian tithes to the monk of Lycopolis. At a later date the tithes were divided into three portions—one of which was devoted to the support of the clergy, one to the fabric of the church, and one to the poor. To this day, in the Egyptian cathedral, three alms-dishes are carried round the church, during service, by three men following one another, who offer each his plate to every worshipper, as each is expected to make the threefold offering—one for the clergy, one for the church expenses, and one for the poor.

There were three kinds of monks in Egypt—Cænobites, who lived in monasteries together ; the Anchorites, who lived in solitary cells ; and the Remoboths, who dwelt by two or three together in cities.

Having finished their long pilgrimage up the Nile, Rufinus and his friends next made their way to Nitria. Here they found more than fifty monasteries, containing altogether about five thousand monks, who, like the monks of Hermopolis, were mostly superior to the common run. Ammon, their first founder, had died about 345, and was succeeded in the government by Macarius. There were two great Egyptian saints of this name, who were contemporary, and were called, to distinguish them, Macarius of Alexandria, and Macarius of Egypt. Even so, it is very difficult to know what acts to attribute to one, and which to the other, to say nothing of the fact that there were several more of the name. The Macarius who plays a prominent part in the life of Athanasius, as one of his priests and constant companions, should not probably be identified with either of the Saints Macarius. Saint Macarius of Egypt had been the companion of Anthony, and both he and Macarius of Alexandria lived in Nitria and in Scetis, which is a day's journey from Nitria, though generally confounded with it. It seems most probable also that Macarius of Egypt was the same as the Macarius Magnus of the fourth century, whose writings in answer to pagan attacks on Christianity were almost forgotten till Nicephorus in the eighth century, with great expense and trouble, procured a copy. The internal evidence of the writings themselves points to this identification, and there is nothing to render it improbable. Here, in Nitria, also were the four monks known as the Tall Brothers, the eldest of whom, Ammonius, had accompanied Athanasius when he went for eighteen months to Rome. These four seem to have been brothers in blood as well as in religion, and to have been famous for their great stature as well as for their inconsiderate zeal. Two parties were already growing up in this great colony of monks—the more ignorant among them insisting on an anthropomorphic view of God, the others clinging to the spiritual and mystical views of Origen. At the time of the visit of Rufinus they were still living in peace and harmony, and he intended to remain some time among them; but the clouds of religious and political trouble were again gathering over the unhappy land of Egypt.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE LAST ARIAN BISHOP OF ALEXANDRIA

A.D. 373 THE death of Athanasius was the signal for fresh attempts A.M. 89 on the part of the Arians and the pagans to overthrow the Church of Egypt. The same scenes were repeated which had marked the intrusion of George of Cappadocia.
 The Emperor Valens was an Arian, and was indignant that the Egyptians had presumed to elect their own Patriarch.
 Once more the church of Theonas, which seems to have been the Patriarchal church, with residence attached, was stormed during service by the pagan prefect Palladius at the head of a troop of soldiers. Once more the pagan and Jewish rabble took advantage of the opportunity to profane the altars and insult the Christians. Peter, as Athanasius had done, escaped and went into hiding. He wrote an encyclical letter, which is still preserved, giving an account of the recent events. A messenger who had just arrived from the Roman Pope, Damasus, with letters of greeting to the new Pope of Alexandria, was seized and sent a prisoner to the mines. Peter eventually escaped to Rome, and remained in exile there five years.¹

Meanwhile Lucius made his triumphant entry into

¹ The same scandalous struggles between rival parties of Christians were going on both in Rome and Constantinople. Damasus had made good his own election by force.

Alexandria, escorted by the principal pagans of the city, and inaugurated his rule by a fresh persecution of the Egyptian Church. He directed his fury particularly against the monasteries and the monks, and we are told that he went in person with the Imperial troops to Nitria to wage war on all those who refused to deny the God-head of the Son.¹ But finding that the monks defended themselves with great courage, and were more likely to prevail in battle than to deny their faith, Lucius recommended the military chief of the expedition to send the abbots of Nitria and Scetis—Macarius of Alexandria and Macarius of Egypt—into exile; so that, deprived of their heads, the monks might be more easily overcome. The two Saints Macarius therefore were sent up the Nile to Philæ, which was still an entirely pagan island, with a celebrated idol temple upon it, whose priest was revered by the surrounding inhabitants almost as a god. The arrival of the exiled monks caused great excitement and alarm in the island. The priest's daughter, in particular, behaved like one distraught, and rushed down to the shore where the holy men were landing, crying out: 'Why are you come here to cast us out? We had trusted to be safe from you in this unknown spot—here we abode in peace—here we hurt none! But if you claim this island also, take it; we cannot resist you.'

With these words the girl fell to the ground in a fit.

¹ Gibbon says that this armed expedition, 3,000 strong, against the monks of Nitria was to compel the young and able-bodied among them to serve in the army. It may be so, but his only authority appears to be two French historians, who quote the Theodosian code to show that the monks were liable to military service. All contemporary writers agree that it was an attempt to force the Arian doctrine on the great religious stronghold of Egypt.

Then the two abbots, one of whom was a renowned physician, soothed her and cured her, and in the end they converted the whole island. When Lucius heard this, he gave private orders for the release of the abbots.

Eleven bishops were sent into exile by Lucius, who was supported all through by the Imperial power. One of these bishops was Melas, the Bishop of Rhinocolura,¹ a frontier town. When the military party sent to take him reached his church, towards evening, they found a young man engaged in preparing the lamps for service. They asked for the bishop, and Melas—for it was he—answered that he was at hand, and should shortly be told of their arrival. Meanwhile he took them into his own house, set supper before them, and waited upon them himself. When they had finished he told them who he was, and, touched by his behaviour, they offered to let him escape, but he preferred to share in the misfortunes of his brethren.

Rufinus was among those who were seized at Nitria, imprisoned, and finally banished from the country. Melania, who had been living all this time in Alexandria (about six months), went to Diocæsarea, in Palestine, with a large body of banished bishops, priests, and hermits. Here she waited for some time, receiving with the greatest kindness all the Egyptian exiles who made their way to her, and supporting them at her own expense. At length Rufinus managed to join her, but as soon as possible he went back to Egypt, and remained there for six years, chiefly in the society of the monks.

One of the most celebrated hermits of that time was Moses, who lived in a cell in the desert between Egypt and Palestine, and was revered for his great sanctity

¹ The present el-'Arish.

by all the wandering tribes of Bedouin—or Saracens, as they were then called.¹

At this time the Saracens were ruled by a Queen Mavia, whose husband had once been an ally of the Romans. Since his death the tribes had plunged into war again, and had ravaged all the countries of the East. Valens, who was already so much harassed by the Goths in Europe that the persecution in Egypt had been allowed to drop, could not hold the frontier against them, and sent to ask for terms of peace. The chief condition made by Queen Mavia, though she does not seem to have been before this a Christian, was that Moses should be given to her as bishop of her nation. Valens consented with delighted alacrity, and gave immediate directions that Moses should be seized and brought, whether he would or no, to Alexandria to be consecrated. Moses came quietly enough; but when he perceived that he was to be consecrated by Lucius, he flatly refused.

‘I count myself, indeed, unworthy of the sacred office,’ he said; ‘but if the exigencies of the State require me to bear it, it shall not be by Lucius laying his hand upon me, for it has been filled with blood.’

Lucius in vain urged that Moses had been sent to him, not to reproach him, but to be instructed by him in the principles of religion. The sturdy old hermit rejoined that this was no question of religious dogma, but simply that he refused to be consecrated by a persecutor like Lucius; and he was proceeding to give instances of cruelty which his ‘own eyes’ had beheld, when Lucius hastily dismissed him. Eventually his guard took him to the mountains in search of some of the exiled bishops, by whom he was consecrated. Thus about the same time the Christian religion became widely spread among the Saracens and in the Soudan, which by the reign of Justinian had become entirely Christian.

¹ ‘Saracens’ was the general name given to all the Arabian tribes living between the coast of the Red Sea and the Euphrates.

In the spring of 378, finding that Valens was now occupied with the Goths, and that Lucius had lost all real power in Egypt, Peter ventured to return from Rome, and the people with one accord rose against Lucius and expelled him from the city. Lucius appealed to Valens, who was not at all in a condition to support him, and who was killed in battle in the same year.

His successor in the East was Theodosius, a Spaniard, and son of that elder Theodosius who, after rendering signal service to the empire as one of its bravest generals, fell a victim to the superstition of Valens. The practice of 'spiritualism' and table-rapping was widely prevalent in the empire at that time, and at a séance which had been carefully got up, by some of his partisans, in favour of a man named Theodorus, the table, on being asked to give the first four letters of the name of the man who should succeed Valens in the empire, rapped out the Greek letters Θ-ε-ο-δ. On this coming to the Emperor's ears, he promptly put Theodorus to death, and sought pretexts for murdering any other prominent person whose name might happen to begin with Θ-ε-ο-δ. Among these was the brave Theodosius; and his son, who bore the same name, thought it prudent to hide himself on the family estates in Spain.

On the death of Valens, Gratian, who conjointly with an infant brother had already succeeded to his father Valentinian in 375, found the Byzantine empire also on his hands. He was not yet twenty, and very wisely sent for Theodosius, who was about thirteen years his elder, and appointed him Emperor of the East. Both Gratian and Theodosius were of the orthodox faith, and in February 380 Theodosius published a solemn declaration of faith to the people of Constantinople, where the state of religious affairs was even worse than at Alexandria or Rome. In the previous year Peter of Alexandria had been asked to interfere, in the hope of rendering the state of affairs a little less intolerable and disgraceful ; and ever since his return from Rome he had been occupied with the affairs of Constantinople.

Gregory of Nazianzen is one of the few great and lovable souls which shine out from the dark days of the latter half of the fourth century ; and though he has nothing to do with the history of Egypt, his connection with the Pope of Alexandria renders some brief mention of him necessary. He was the son of the Bishop (also Gregory) of Nazianzen in Cappadocia, and was educated at Athens in the same college with Julian the Apostate and Basil of Cæsarea. His desire was to be a monk, but he could not desert his aged parents, so he lived the strict life of an ascetic under their roof, and became, as it were, his father's steward. Against his will his father compelled him to receive ordination in his thirty-sixth year, since as a layman he could not be of nearly so much use to the bishop. Later, in 372, his father and Basil of Cæsarea determined to make him Bishop of Sasima, a little town of Cappadocia, which was claimed by the prelate of Tyana as being already in his diocese. For this and other reasons Gregory the younger refused, and though he was consecrated bishop he never would take up the see. He still acted as his father's assistant till, in 374, the elder Gregory died, at the great age of one hundred years. His wife, who, like all his family, was perfectly devoted to him, followed him shortly after, being called away from earth as she knelt at the Lord's table. Gregory's brother and sister were already dead, and he was alone in the world. He remained for two years doing the work of the see, till a successor should be appointed ; but finding that so long as he remained in charge no one would believe his earnest desire to be relieved from the burden, he suddenly disappeared, and for the next three years remained in strict retirement in a monastery at Seleucia.

In 379 he was urgently petitioned by all the orthodox Christians of Constantinople, backed by the signatures of several bishops and by the formal approval of the Pope of Alexandria, to go to the Imperial city and do what he could to help them. Besides the Arians, Constantinople was distracted by the disputes of no less than six different religious parties, all condemned as heretical, of which the only important sects were the Manicheans and the Novatians. Gregory responded to the appeal, and, establishing himself in a private house, took up the long-neglected work of teaching personal holiness and the danger of empty theological discussions. A church was built for him, called the Church of the Resurrection ; and here he lived for more than a year, hard at work.

At this time Constantinople was visited by Maximus, an Alexandrian adventurer with a curious history. He was at once a baptized Christian and a Cynic philosopher ; he claimed to be a confessor for the orthodox faith, and his enemies said that he had indeed been scourged and banished, but it was for his misdeeds. He must have been clever, for he managed to obtain the most extraordinary influence over both Peter in Alexandria and Gregory in Constantinople. He is described as a handsome fellow, with long yellow curls floating far over his shoulders. He professed the most unbounded admiration for Gregory, who returned with sincere affection his hypocritical professions ; and all the time Maximus was intriguing with the Pope of Alexandria—who had the same blind confidence in him—to oust Gregory from his position and to obtain for himself the Primacy of Constantinople.

He represented to Peter that he had made a serious mistake in sanctioning the informal appointment of Gregory to Constantinople, that his translation from Sasima (which he had never accepted) was uncanonical, that his manners were rustic, and that the polished society of the capital was getting weary of him. Peter actually listened to these charges, and was prevailed upon to send some bishops to Constantinople with orders to consecrate Maximus in the room of Gregory.

Gregory was ill at the time ; but even so, he was too well-beloved for Maximus to assert himself openly. He repaired with the Alexandrian envoys to the church by night, and there they began the ceremony of consecration. But the wonderful curls of Maximus had to be cut off before he could receive the tonsure (which, not so many years before, Athanasius had preached against in his charge as the mark of a pagan, and not of a Christian priest), and before this process was half accomplished the sun rose, and the city woke up to the consciousness of what was being done. The mob rushed in, and drove the intruders from the church. The hair-cutting was finished in a flute-player's shop ; and then Maximus, not daring to remain in Constantinople, fled to the new Emperor Theodosius at Thessalonica to entreat his support. Theodosius refused to recognise him, and he then returned to Alexandria, and called upon Peter to use his authority in his favour. But Peter, whose eyes had been opened at last to the real character of his protégé, refused to listen to him, and the prefect banished him from Alexandria. Very soon after this—in February 380—Peter died.

Theodosius made his formal entry into Constantinople in November 380, and in May 381 he summoned a General Council in a fresh endeavour to give peace to the Church, and particularly to settle the vexed question of the Patriarchate of Constantinople. Gregory was again elected, but amid so much dissension that he retired, before the sittings of the Council were ended, in the hope to promote peace; and finally went back to the same informal charge of Nazianzen until 383, when a new bishop, at his own earnest request, was appointed, and he retired to spend the last six months of his life in literary labour. Good and learned as he was, it is to be feared that during these later years his influence, like that of Ambrose in the West and Theophilus in Egypt, encouraged instead of restraining the growing disposition of Theodosius towards intolerance. Peter of Alexandria had been succeeded by his brother Timothy, surnamed 'the Poor,' because he had given up all his worldly possessions. He came to the Council of Constantinople, and took part in the deliberations which led to the resignation of Gregory, and in the expansion of the Nicene Creed into the form in which we now possess it, always excepting the Filioque clause, which has never been sanctioned by any General Council.

But when the Council proceeded to the delicate task of assigning a recognised precedence to the different Patriarchal sees, all harmony was at an end. For the first two centuries the five sees of the first rank had been Alexandria, Rome, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Cæsarea; and of these, Alexandria was generally reckoned the first.¹ Rome had always shown some jealousy of the precedence of Alexandria, and the gentler Popes of the latter city had generally been ready to yield the point. But the real leadership, and the encyclical letter which yearly fixed the date of Easter, came from Alexandria. When Constantine became a Christian, his new Imperial city at once took rank with the earlier Patriarchates. At the Council of Nicea the first blow was given to the prestige of Alexandria by the adoption of the Western date for the celebration of Easter. Ever since that time the ecclesiastical power of Rome had been increasing, while Alexandria and Constantinople had been weakened by constant troubles. Rome owed much to the fact that the Arian emperors did not consider her of so much importance as Alexandria, and turned their strength against the Egyptian Pope. At the Council of Sardica, in 343 (not acknowledged as ecumenical), Rome had succeeded in getting a canon passed which provided for an appeal to the Pope of Rome as a referee in certain disputed cases; and she now, at the Council of Constantinople, determined to insist on a formal recognition of her claim, not to supremacy—for that was never allowed—but to priority. Gratian and his father had both been strong in the West, and claimed superiority over the Eastern Empire; so that the moment was exceptionally favourable to the pretensions of Rome. Theodosius owed his crown to the favour of the Western Emperor, and could not afford to dispute the claim; but he was anxious at least that his own Imperial city should rank second. A canon was therefore passed at this Council, which gave Rome the primacy, Constantinople the second place, and degraded Alexandria to the third rank among the Papal sees. Timothy of Alexandria was out-voted, whereupon he indignantly left the Council, and returned with his bishops to Egypt. Here he passed the rest of his life in quiet performance of his duties, writing biographies of several Egyptian saints, and issuing, among other things, a series of instructions to his bishops and clergy for their guidance in difficult cases. One of these directs a priest to take upon himself the responsibility of refusing to perform an uncanonical marriage—e.g. with a deceased wife's sister; another says that, unless it is clearly shown that a suicide was of unsound mind, the prayers are not to be said for him; another, in answer to a question, declares that 'those who may have thoughtlessly broken their fast before communicating are not to refrain from the sacrament in consequence, since, if Satan finds so easy a way of preventing men from its reception, it will greatly strengthen his hands.'

¹ By a canon of Nicea Jerusalem (Elia) was ranked second. The real question of supremacy, however, lay between Alexandria and Rome.

Tradition assigns the building of several churches in Alexandria to this Patriarch. The Egyptians have a St. Timothy in their calendar, but Neale thinks it impossible that this can be the Patriarch, since the Egyptian saint was unquestionably married. Still, as the early Alexandrian Patriarchs were not infrequently married, this fact proves nothing for or against the identification.

CHAPTER XIX

THE FALL OF SERAPIS

A.D. 385
A.M. 101 ON the death of Timothy the Poor, Theophilus was elected to the Patriarchal throne. He had been secretary to Athanasius, and John of Nikius¹ gives us the following details of his youth: 'Now they tell us of Theophilus,' he says, 'that he was born of Christian parents at Memphis.' He was left an orphan in infancy, together with a little sister. Their nurse was an Ethiopic slave who had belonged to their parents. One night, at break of day, she took the two children with her into the temple of the false gods Artemis and Apollo, intending to worship after the manner of the pagans. But when the children entered the temple the idols fell to the earth and were broken.² Then the slave, fearing the vengeance of the pagan priests, took flight and brought the children to Nikius. But having reason to fear that the people of Nikius would deliver them up to the idolatrous priests, she took the children and came to Alexandria. Led by an impulse of the Divine Spirit, she one day took them into church, that she might understand better what were the practices of the Christians. As they entered and took up a position near the pulpit they attracted the attention of Athanasius the Patriarch, who gave an order that these three persons were to be retained until the conclusion of the service. Afterward they brought the children and the slave before him, and he reproached the latter for having taken the children of Christian parents into a heathen temple—pointing out to her that the gods without understanding, so far from being able to help her, had been broken before the children. ‘From this time forward,’ he added, ‘these children shall belong to me.’

¹ Page 436.

² John's account is vague, but probably the children in a fit of mischief threw down and smashed the statues.

The astonished slave, seeing that her secret was known, and not daring to deny what she had done, threw herself at his feet, and begged that she might receive the baptism of the Christians, which Athanasius gladly accorded to all three. He placed the little girl in a convent, where she remained until her marriage. She was given in marriage to a man of Mohalla, a town in the north of Egypt, ‘formerly called Didotseyä’ (the place of Dido). Here was born St. Cyril, ‘that sublime star who by the grace of God became Patriarch after Theophilus, his maternal uncle.’

With regard to Theophilus, after his baptism they gave him the tonsure, and received him into the number of the readers. ‘He grew up in the fear of God, learned in the Holy Scriptures, and obeying their rules. He was elevated to the rank of deacon, then to priest’s orders, and finally was elected to the Patriarchal throne, when he illuminated the whole city with the light of his faith. He succeeded in rooting out the worship of idols from every town in Egypt, so that no one was left to adore the works of sculpture, according as it had been foretold of him by St. Athanasius.’

No one certainly can question the zeal of Theophilus, but from all we know of him he seems to have been deficient both in wisdom and humility. It might have been better for him perhaps if he had not been treated with such entire confidence and entrusted with almost unlimited power by the Emperor Theodosius. During the earlier years of his rule, however, we have but little to deplore in his actions.

The first imperial duty imposed upon him was to settle the question of Easter, which had again fallen into confusion—so much so, that in the year 387 there was a discrepancy of five weeks between the Alexandrian and the Roman reckoning. Accordingly the Patriarch drew up a Paschal cycle of 418 years, and made a table of the days on which Easter should fall for 100 years from the year 380. The prologue to this table of Easters is still extant, and in it Theophilus asserts that our Saviour was crucified on the 15th, not the 14th of Nisan; and gives the rule that, if the fourteenth moon falls on a Sunday, Easter must be deferred for a week. The story of his having sent a priest named Isidore, at the time of the struggle between Theodosius and Maximus, with letters of congratulation which he was to deliver to the successful party, rests on doubtful evidence, and need not be believed, though at the same time it cannot be definitely pronounced untrue.

About the year 389 Theophilus obtained from the Emperor a grant of the site of a deserted temple to Bacchus in Alexandria, on which he proposed to build a church. In clearing the ground for the foundations various crypts were discovered, in which were certain figures connected with the abominable Phallic rites. As in the former case, when George had disturbed the temple of Mithra, Theophilus gave great offence by the way in which he treated these relics, and the streets of Alexandria were again the scene of perpetual riots between the Christians and the pagans. The latter were now losing ground daily, and were becoming reckless and desperate. In the reign of Constantine the pagan religion had been treated better than, considering the events of the previous twelve years, they had any reason to expect. He had certainly abolished the heathen sacrifices, particularly those celebrated at night, as being inseparably connected with immorality and crime. Constantius went further, and punished infringement of this law with death and confiscation of goods. But both these emperors had too much feeling for art and reverence for the works of antiquity to permit any wanton destruction of temples or statues. The temples were indeed closed, and no sacrifice permitted to be offered in them, but they were preserved as public monuments, and caretakers were appointed, at the public expense, who showed visitors over them. When Julian visited the site of ancient Troy, he not only found the temples still preserved, but the caretaker was the bishop himself!

In the reign of Theodosius all this was changed. The spirit of intolerance and persecution which had been brought into the Church by the Arians was too often shared now by the orthodox Christians. The monks were the worst sinners in this respect. Deteriorating yearly more and more, they were now everywhere, but particularly in Egypt, an irregular, barefooted army, animated by much the same spirit and characterised by much the same ignorance as Cromwell's Puritan followers. They were even more dangerous, for they were without natural ties, and they obeyed no man except their own abbots. They began to destroy the pagan statues and temples all over the empire, in the teeth of Imperial edicts to the contrary; and when Theodosius proposed to interfere with a strong hand to put down this wanton destruction, he was, we regret to say, effectually frightened from his purpose by Ambrose of Milan. He did in 393 issue an edict to protect the Jewish synagogues; but the far more beautiful heathen temples were left to their fate. The vestal college at Rome and the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus were saved, in spite of Ambrose, during the lifetime of Theodosius, but destroyed in the reign of his son. In Egypt, however, the greatest act of destruction was carried out with deliberate solemnity, by order of Theodosius himself, on the request of Theophilus. The great temple of Serapis, which was one of the architectural glories of Alexandria, was levelled to the ground.

If the intolerance of Theophilus had been a primary cause of all the troubles, it must be yet admitted that the pagans themselves brought about their own downfall in the end. In the course of the riots between the two parties several Christians were killed; and the pagan community, hastily electing Olympius, the chief priest of Serapis, as their leader, retired into the precincts of the great temple, and fortified themselves against the rest of the city. The buildings served excellently as a fortress. The temple was raised on a terrace of enormous height; it was square in form, with a central court; its massive walls were of excellent masonry and overlaid with plates of copper; underneath was a network of secret passages and communications, and round about were the buildings for the use of the priests, attendants, and guests, and for the accommodation of the great library, which rivalled that of the museum. Here all the principal pagans and their fighting men defied the Emperor and the Patriarch alike, and constituted a serious menace to the public peace. Not content with assuming a defensive position, they made sallies into the town and carried off Christians, whom they tortured before their altars to compel them to sacrifice.

Naturally this state of things could not be permitted to continue. Evagrius, the prefect, rode down himself with his soldiers to parley with the rebels, representing to them the madness of their attempt to defy the whole Roman power, and the punishment which must inevitably ensue. But on the conclusion of his speech Olympius harangued his followers on the other side, exhorting them to suffer any extremity sooner than abandon the gods of their ancestors. The Egyptians, with heroic courage worthy of a better cause, refused to listen to any terms proposed by the Roman governor.

As the place was absolutely inaccessible except by actual siege and storm, the prefect left them in quiet possession while he wrote to the Emperor for instructions. Theodosius replied that the Christians who had perished were to be regarded as martyrs, and their murderers must therefore be freely forgiven. At the same time he decreed that all the temples in Alexandria, as being the cause of this outbreak, should be demolished.

When it became known that the decree of the Emperor had arrived, and was to be read in public, an immense crowd, pagan as well as Christian, assembled to hear it. At the close of the reading the Christians gave a shout of exultation, while the pagans fled in consternation. That evening, under cover of the dark, Olympius and his followers left the great temple to its fate, and sought refuge in concealment. It is said that in the dead of night a Christian passing by, and finding the place empty and deserted, had the curiosity to wander through the doomed buildings. As he approached the shrine he heard from within the closed doors, 'no person being there,' the chant of Hallelujah break the solemn stillness of the night.

The next day the population of Alexandria was early astir, and the excitement increased every moment. At length the procession appeared, the Patriarch and the prefect riding side by side in state, followed by the chanting priests and sternly silent soldiers, with the weapons of destruction in their hands. People had been reminding each other of an ancient prophecy which foretold that when the idol should be destroyed, the earth would perish, the heavens fall in, and chaos return. Many even of the Christians were superstitious enough to dread the results of the work they had in hand. Almost in silence the procession went up the great flight of one hundred steps which led to the temple, on the top of which the youthful Origen had stood alone, in instant danger of his life, to witness for that Crucified One whose servant now came in pomp of Papal power and backed by the soldiers of the world-wide empire to cast down the representative of the ancient religion. Most of the Christians who thronged in after their Pope and prefect, with mingled feelings of terror and exultation, had never even seen the great god, who, coming already old to Egypt, had ruled the land from his mysterious shrine for six hundred years. For a moment they gazed in awed silence, and the hopes of those pagans who had mingled in the crowd began to rise. Probably among them was the father of the hapless Hypatia, afterwards the forlorn hope and the martyr of the dying religion. Nay, Hypatia herself—since, however beautiful, she was not in reality a young woman at the time of her death—may have gazed with mingled wrath and scorn on that strange scene, and remembered long afterwards the insolent triumph, the fanatical violence, of those who worshipped the Son of the carpenter.

There, with its hands stretching from wall to wall, was the huge seated statue of Serapis, constructed of various metals, now dusky with age, and inlaid with various precious stones. The image was that of an old man with a bushel on his head, the emblem of productiveness and plenty. By his side was a figure with the heads of a lion, a dog, and a wolf. On one of his arms was a serpent, the emblem of eternity. The successor of Athanasius gazed with feelings which can well be imagined on this visible concentration of the power of Egyptian idolatry, no doubt the symbol to many Alexandrians of the principle of life and of the powers that ruled the under-world. It was a supreme moment. At last, he would feel, the hour and the man were come ; the Church had her foot on the neck of her foe.¹

Vague mutterings began to make themselves heard in the crowd. The Pope felt that further delay would be dangerous. He turned to one of the axe-bearing soldiers, and commanded him to strike. The soldier lifted up his axe and struck, while a cry of terror broke from the watching crowd. Another blow, and the shout of fear was changed to inextinguishable laughter as the head of the god rolled on the ground, and out of his hollow trunk leapt a colony of frightened mice, scattering in all directions. Fear was flung to the winds, and the work of destruction went merrily on. Every statue in the temple was broken, and the foundations levelled with the ground, though the surrounding buildings were left standing, and used afterwards as the Patriarchal residence, or, as we should call it in England, the archbishop's palace.¹

¹ This description of the statue is copied from Canon Bright's History of the Church, 315-431.

The principal pagans who had been concerned in the late outrages against the Christians hastily made their escape from Alexandria. Not one of them was touched by the Christians in their hour of triumph, though Helladius, the priest of Jupiter, openly boasted that he had sacrificed nine victims with his own hand at the shrine of the heathen gods. Concerning the temple of Serapis, Socrates afterwards wrote :—

When the temple of Serapis was torn down and laid bare, there were found in it, engraven on stones, certain characters, which they called hieroglyphics, having the form of crosses. Both the Christians and pagans, on seeing them, thought they had reference to their respective religions ; for the Christians, who affirm that the cross is the sign of Christ's saving passion, claimed this character as peculiarly theirs, but the pagans alleged that it might appertain to Christ and Serapis in common, 'for,' said they, 'it symbolises one thing to Christians and another to heathens.' While this point was disputed amongst them some of the heathen converts to Christianity who were conversant with these hieroglyphic characters interpreted that in the form of a cross to signify 'the life to come.' This the Christians exultingly laid hold of as decidedly favourable to their religion. But after other hieroglyphics had been deciphered containing a prediction that when (the character in the form of a cross, representing) the life to come should appear, the temple of Serapis would be destroyed, a very great number of the pagans embraced Christianity, and, confessing their sins, were baptized.

¹ John of Nikius says that the church which was built on the site of the temple of Serapis was called after Honorius, the son of the Emperor, but that it was the same which was called in his day (seventh century) the Church of St. Cosmos and St. Damian.

The storm of iconoclastic fury swept over the whole of Egypt, and more mischief was done in the fourth century to the antiquities of the country than at any previous time since the Persian conquest, or at any subsequent time until the Mohammedans began that piecemeal destruction of temples and rifling of dead men's tombs for treasure which has been continued to the present day, and to which a fresh impetus has been given by ignorant and careless tourists. In Canopus and Alexandria every temple was razed to the ground, all metal images melted into pots and other things needed for the use of the Church, and all stone images broken to pieces except one ape-headed figure which Theophilus set up in a public place, that all men might see what sort of gods their forefathers had worshipped. This gave particular offence to Ammonius, one of the most learned of the pagan professors, since he complained, not without reason, that the ancient religion was thereby grossly misrepresented. In other parts of Egypt the temples were left standing, or only partly demolished; but the statues of the gods, many of which must have been beautiful works of art, if we may judge by the one or two fortunately carried away to Rome before this time, were almost all destroyed. The story of Pœmen and his brothers gives an instance in point.

Pœmen and Anuph were the two best-known of a family of six—or, as some say, seven—brothers, who all became monks together about this time, some of them being very young. They had been driven, in the first place, from their homes by an invasion of the Blemmyes, and we are led to suppose that their father was killed and their property ruined. The brothers escaped with their lives, and wandered about for some time in a desolate condition. Finally, they took refuge in a deserted temple; but Anuph, who seems to have been the elder, was much concerned at their constant complaints of their hard lot. He had found, lying on the ground in the temple, a beautiful statue of the god which had been worshipped there; and he chose this as good material for an object-lesson to his brothers. He bade his brothers keep silence for a week, and not even to ask for any explanation of his actions. Then every morning, in their presence, he deliberately smashed the statue with stones, and then knelt to it and prayed for pardon. At the end of a week they clamoured for an explanation, and he then replied that as the statue, however insulted, had never complained of man's treatment, so ought man to submit without a word to the dispensation of God!

Years afterwards their aged mother discovered that her sons were living as monks in Nitria, and sought them; but already that terrible life had killed the human nature in Pœmen, and he refused even to see her. His sister's son was under sentence of death, and the governor of the province offered to release him, if Pœmen, whose reputation for sanctity was great, would intercede for him; but Pœmen listened to his sister's entreaties unmoved. 'If the youth has deserved death,' he said, 'let him suffer it. If not, let the governor release him.'

Since the time of the early Ptolemies a peculiarly sacred Nile gauge had been kept in the temple of Serapis. In the reign of Constantine it had been taken thence, and placed in the great church of the Cæsareum, but had been restored to the Serapeum by Julian the Apostate. Now it was solemnly carried back to the church, and the pagans prophesied that the god would avenge himself by withholding the annual inundation. It was, in fact, delayed; and the lower classes, pagan and Christian alike, believed that the god was indeed punishing them. The anxiety and discontent increased day by day, and the temper of the people became so dangerous that the prefect wrote to ask if it would not be as well to yield to popular prejudice and avert the rising storm by giving back the Nile gauge to the custody of the heathen priests. Theodosius answered shortly and sternly, 'If the Nile will not rise except by means of enchantments or sacrifices, let Egypt remain unwatered.'

Hardly had the decision been given, when the scene changed. The Nile began to rise with such rapidity that now a flood was feared; but this danger also was averted, and the Christians were comforted and strengthened.

CHAPTER XX

THE TALL BROTHERS

A.D. 395
A.M. 111

IN 394 Theophilus went to attend another Council, called to settle more of the unhappy disputes between various bishops, at Constantinople. At this time he assisted at the consecration of a grand church built in honour of St. Peter and St. Paul, which the prefect had erected in a suburb of Chalcedon, called the Oak. It must have been in this year also that Arsenius, the celebrated tutor of the two young Augusti, one of the most learned and best-bred men of his time, resigned his position and became a hermit in Egypt. Very probably he accompanied Theophilus on his return to Egypt.

In 395 Theodosius died, and the empire was divided between his two sons—Arcadius in the East, and Honorius in the West. In 398 Theophilus was again at Constantinople to consecrate John Chrysostom as Patriarch of that see. We are told that he did so very unwillingly, as the recent elevation of Constantinople in honorary rank above Alexandria was as distasteful to him as it had been to his predecessor Timothy; and he had hoped to put in a nominee of his own, instead of so celebrated a man as Chrysostom.¹

¹ It is said that the Prime Minister sent for Theophilus, and gave him his choice between consecrating Chrysostom or standing an inquiry into certain of his own high-handed proceedings.

Up to this time Theophilus had lived on good terms with the monastic army of Egypt, particularly with the camp of Nitria, the nearest great settlement of the kind to Alexandria. They had helped him in the destruction of the temples, and he praised their zeal and promoted many of them to bishoprics as vacancies occurred. Dioscurus, one of the Tall Brothers, was made Bishop of Hermopolis Parva; and Eusebius and Euthymius, the two younger, he persuaded to leave Nitria and become stewards of the Alexandrian Church. In 399, after a long correspondence between Theophilus and Jerome, in which the former tried to bring about a reconciliation between Jerome and John, Bishop of Jerusalem, who had formerly been a monk of Nitria, Jerome said to the Pope of Alexandria, 'You do not know what it is to encounter enmity; you are accustomed to be met by the spontaneous affection of monks, who are loyal to you because you are not their tyrant.'¹

Many instances are recorded in contemporary writers showing the Patriarch's preference for monks, and he followed the precedent which had unfortunately been set by Athanasius in choosing his bishops from among the monks instead of from among the married clergy. Considering all things, it is not wonderful that the ignorance and arrogance of the monastic population became more marked every year. When the gentle and high-born courtier Arsenius presented himself as a poor stranger before the Abbot John in the desert of Scetis, and begged to be received among them, they went to their meal and left him standing while they sat.¹ One of them tossed him a biscuit, as if he were a dog, and he knelt down to eat it. 'He will make a monk,' said the abbot, and he was allowed to remain amongst them till he had learnt the monastic rules, when he took up a cell by himself in the Mokattam Hills, and lived as a hermit for forty years. Arcadius, his old pupil, would have promoted him to great honour in his self-chosen exile, and proposed to grant him 'the tribute of all Egypt' for the relief of the poor and for the monasteries. Arsenius replied that one who was dead to the world could have no concern with the distribution of money. But he did not altogether lay aside his native shrewdness nor his kindness of heart. His strict observance of monastic rule made him often appear rude and churlish in the anecdotes related of him; but we are told that he took a monk of persistently thievish habits into his own cell to live with him, in the hope of reclaiming him. A book called the Exhortation to Monks, which is ascribed to him, shows a keen appreciation of the peculiar temptations of the monastic life, and gives much practical counsel on the subject.

¹ Jerome, who was now the head of a monastery in Bethlehem, seems to have had a singular aptitude for quarrelling. He was already on bad terms with his old friend Rufinus, who had been living with Melania on the Mount of Olives since he left Egypt till 397, when he returned to Rome. Jerome had before quarrelled with Theophilus about an Egyptian bishop, whom the latter had synodically deposed, and whom Jerome had received with honour.

When Theophilus came to see him, Arsenius said he had but one request to make of him, and that was that he should go away; and he was positively brutal to a well-born Roman lady—probably an old friend—who came all the way to Nitria to see him. When the poor lady complained to Theophilus, the Pope reminded her that she was 'a woman,' and therefore could expect nothing else from a saint.

¹ This studied discourtesy to an applicant afterwards became part of the monastic rule in the West.

The arrogance of the monks might have been borne with, but their increasing ignorance seemed to Theophilus a greater danger; and in his Paschal letter for 399 he found fault with them, in no measured terms, for their material and debased conceptions of God—pointing out that God was a Spirit and not a mere glorified man with parts and passions like their own.

He brought such a storm of monastic wrath upon his head as he had little expected. A whole army of them left Nitria at once, and, hurrying through the desert, stormed the Patriarch in his palace with wild cries and threats of instant death, if he did not take back his words.

Theophilus, helpless and astonished, shrank before the sea of angry faces which surrounded him. 'In seeing you, I see God's face,' he is reported to have cried. This was not enough; the mob of monks clamoured that he should anathematise Origen, from whom they considered that he had derived his heresy, and would not disperse till the Patriarch had promised to do so. The Tall Brothers, disgusted with their Pope's conduct, left him and returned to Nitria; but the dispute was by no means settled, and other reasons, it is to be feared, inclined Theophilus to conciliate and make use of the anthropomorphic monks besides his fear of their violence.¹

¹ The monks did not all take their Pope's letter of remonstrance in this way. One of the ignorant monks who had always worshipped God as a deified man was an old man named Serapion, who was held in great respect in Scetis. He was convinced, after long and patient argument by the abbot of Scetis and a learned deacon from Cappadocia, who happened to be visiting Scetis at this time, that the passages of Scripture which he had taken literally were meant to be interpreted in a spiritual sense. The poor old man found it after this almost impossible to pray, and, bursting into tears, he exclaimed: 'They have taken away my God, and I know not what to worship.'

Isidore, the treasurer of the Alexandrian Church, who had for many years been one of his closest friends, was just now on bad terms with the Patriarch, and, as he sided warmly with the party who had adopted the Origenistic (or spiritual) view of God, Theophilus seems to have thought that by siding with the anthropomorphic monks, whom he had before condemned, he would be more easily able to get rid of Isidore. Many different accounts are given of the origin of the quarrel, but the most probable seems to be that it was a dispute about money.

All offerings given by the faithful to the Church were in Alexandria supposed to be at the disposal of the Patriarch, just as in other sees it was the bishop who administered with other officials the public funds of the Church. But Theophilus had a passion for building, and spent almost all that came to him in raising magnificent churches. A rich Alexandrian lady wished to spend one thousand pieces of gold in clothes for poor women, but, being afraid that if the Patriarch heard of it he would require her to give him the money towards the erection of a new church instead, she made the hospitaller swear to her that he would manage the affair himself for her, and say nothing about the money to the Patriarch. Spies brought the matter to the ears of Theophilus, who said nothing about it for some time, but, on fresh occasion of offence arising, taxed Isidore with his failure in duty, and, as some say, raked up older charges against him which were absolutely unfounded. Isidore defended himself in the matter of the clothes, bluntly telling the Pope—for Theophilus seemed always to have used this form of his title—that it was better to spend money on curing the bodies of the sick, which were more properly God's temples, than on building walls.

In the beginning of the next year Theophilus held a Council, in which, according to his promise, he condemned 'Origenism ;'¹ and in his Paschal letter for 401 he makes a deliberate attack on Origen, exposing all his errors, or what he considered his errors, and condemning him generally as a heretic. In the same year, Isidore having taken refuge among the monks in Nitria, Theophilus wrote to the bishops of the neighbouring dioceses, ordering them to send into banishment the principal monks and sympathisers with Origen. A deputation of the monks, headed by Ammonius, the eldest of the Tall Brothers, came to Alexandria to remonstrate with the Pope, and to urge that they ought not to be treated as heretics because they were opposed to the degrading literalism of the anthropomorphic party. On a former occasion Theophilus had yielded to the violent threats of the mob on the other side, and his conduct to this temperate and orderly deputation seems to have been equally blamable. It is said that he actually struck Ammonius on the mouth, calling him a heretic because he refused to anathematise Origen. Five of the Nitrian monks, who are described as 'men unworthy even to be doorkeepers,' thought to curry favour with the Pope by bringing accusations against three of their chier brethren, who were accordingly excommunicated.

The deputation went sadly back to Nitria, but Theophilus did not leave them in peace. No doubt he really thought that the increasing and irresponsible power of the monastic communities was becoming a serious danger to Egypt; and this was true. But nothing can justify his behaviour all through this unhappy period of his Patriarchate.

¹ Anastasius, Pope of Rome, also pronounced against Origen at this time, but acknowledged afterwards that he did not know who Origen was, or what language he had used.

The settlement at Nitria had subsided into its usual occupations, many of the monks, we are told, being weavers and confectioners as well as physicians and students;¹ services went on peacefully in 'the great church with the three palm-trees beside it,' and no further controversy seems to have been expected. But Theophilus had appealed to the Imperial prefect to support his authority, and one night the stillness of the desert community was rudely broken by the advancing tramp of Byzantine soldiers.

The alarm was hastily given that the Pope and the army were coming to arrest all the followers of Origen, and a wild scene followed. Three of the Brothers were hastily concealed in a well; Dioscorus, the fourth, took shelter in the church, but was dragged out by 'Ethiopians flushed with wine.' The soldiers, very likely in spite of Theophilus, seem to have regarded the community as a city to be taken by storm. Cells were plundered and set on fire, and it is said by an eye-witness that one boy was burned to death in the night attack.

The dawn of day, and, let us hope, the exertions of Theophilus and the better-disposed monks, at length put an end to the horrors of the scene. The soldiery were restrained, the monks called upon to listen peaceably instead of fighting, and Theophilus says that he called a sort of assembly. Here, 'in the presence of many Fathers who came together from nearly the whole of Egypt, some of Origen's treatises were read.' He then relates at much length many of the mystical speculations of Origen (which should not be considered as part of his creed), and pointed out the heresies contained in them to the monks.

¹ There was a large secular town connected with the natron works.

The adherents of Origen (he says) were therefore condemned, but they took possession of the church of Nitria, and closed it against the bishops and abbots, holding in their hands clubs wrapped in palm leaves. The orthodox majority prevented further outrage, and the service was at last duly performed.

The four Brothers took refuge in Palestine, and for a short time lived in peace on the slopes of Mount Gilboa, pursuing the Egyptian trade of 'affass'-making.¹ But others of the refugees followed them; their numbers attracted attention, and, as they were known to have been condemned and banished by their own Pope, the faithful in Palestine looked coldly upon them. Some of the bishops, indeed, showed them kindness, but promptly received letters of rebuke and warning not to repeat an offence which could only be overlooked on the score of ignorance of the circumstances. At length the banished monks, now about fifty in number, determined to appeal to Chrysostom of Constantinople.

It was towards the close of 401 when this group of elderly and travel-worn monks were shown into the presence of the Byzantine Patriarch. He was moved even to tears by the sight of their condition, and asked what he could do for them. They begged his help against the injustice of their Pope.

If out of regard to him you will not act (ended their spokesman), we shall be obliged to appeal to the Emperor. But we beg you to induce Theophilus to let us live in our own country, for we have not offended against him or against the law of our Saviour.

¹ Affass or ḏaffas, an industry like basket-making. The material used is the ribs of palm leaves.

Chrysostom promised to do his best on condition that they should not appeal to the civil power nor make trouble in the town. 'Until I have written to my brother Theophilus,' he concluded, 'keep silence about your affairs.'

He showed them every kindness, and lodged them in the precincts of the church of the Anastasis. Meanwhile he took counsel with some Alexandrian clergy who had been sent to the Imperial Court on other business, and asked their opinion on the matter. They admitted that the Nitrian monks had been hardly treated, but evidently thought their appeal to the Byzantine Patriarch was not likely to do them any good. They advised him not to admit the monks at once to communion, 'lest you annoy the Pope,' but to show them kindness in other ways.

Chrysostom took their advice, and wrote to Theophilus, endeavouring to make peace. But Theophilus, on hearing that the Tall Brothers had gone to Constantinople, sent the same kind of letters that he had already written to Palestine against them, with a fresh accusation added. He declared that the monks were guilty of sorcery¹ as well as of heresy; and this terrible accusation turned all the Byzantine populace against the Brothers, so that they were hooted in the streets. Most of the monks were themselves alarmed, knowing well what the consequences might be of such a charge, and sent intercessors to Theophilus; but the four Brothers and their more intimate friends appear to have treated the charge with contempt, and presented a formal complaint against their Pope to Chrysostom.

¹ It is quite possible that this additional charge was made in good faith. Ignorance was spreading so rapidly in the once civilised Egyptian nation that anyone who still knew and practised some forms of science was liable at any time to be accused of magic and sorcery; nor was learning in any better condition in the rest of the empire.

Chrysostom wrote again to Theophilus, regretting that they had taken this step, and saying that he had tried to induce them to leave Constantinople. Theophilus replied in an extremely angry letter :—

If (he said) you do not know the Nicene canons, which forbid a bishop to judge cases that arise beyond his own bounds, be so good as to inform yourself, and keep clear of indictments against me. If I am to be tried, it shall be by Egyptian bishops, and not by you, who live at a distance of seventy-five days' journey.

Chrysostom kept this letter to himself, and again endeavoured to persuade the Tall Brothers and their friends to let the matter drop. Instead of this, they appealed personally to Eudoxia, and entreated her to order a formal hearing of the case. Her influence over her husband Arcadius was very great, and on this appeal she persuaded him to order Theophilus to be summoned to Constantinople, that the whole matter might be examined into by Chrysostom. This was a rash proceeding, for Theophilus, as Pope of Alexandria, was almost equal in power to Arcadius himself in Egypt, since the whole Egyptian nation regarded their own Patriarch as a king, and cared little for their distant emperors. Theophilus did not openly refuse to obey the summons, but he delayed so long that the case was proceeded with in his absence. The charges against the Nitrian monks were examined, and pronounced baseless. The five monks whom Theophilus had sent to accuse them were thrown into prison, where some of them died. Theophilus had meanwhile written to Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, to go to Constantinople with the decree of a provincial synod which had recently condemned 'the Origenist heresy,' and present it for Chrysostom's signature. Chrysostom refused, saying the matter was one for the decision of a General Council.

In 403 Theophilus set forth on his journey to Constantinople, giving out as he went that he was going 'to depose John'¹ for his recent action. He went with a splendid retinue of Egyptian and Abyssinian bishops, and all the pomp of a monarch. When, in the warm brightness of a June day, his ship cast anchor in the beautiful waters of the Bosphorus, he was greeted with ringing cheers by the crews of the Egyptian corn fleet; but no procession of Byzantine clergy came to meet him. He landed, not at Constantinople, but at Chalcedon, where the bishop, Cyrenius, was an Egyptian and received him warmly. He then, with magnificent audacity, summoned Chrysostom to appear before the Council and defend himself against a long list of charges which his enemies were only too ready to furnish. Most of them were openly frivolous and vexatious, but the two on which Theophilus chiefly relied were well chosen. Chrysostom was accused of having called the Empress Jezebel and of uttering treasonable words against her. It cannot be denied that he had referred to her as Jezebel in a public sermon. He was also accused of invading the jurisdiction of other prelates—a half-truth which was, as usual, worse than a lie. Incidentally, and while waiting for Chrysostom, who steadily refused to submit himself to their jurisdiction, ¹ Chrysostom, as doubtless every reader knows, was only the nickname of the Byzantine Patriarch. There had been an earlier Chrysostom (golden-mouthed) in Alexandria, who was a celebrated pagan philosopher.

Theophilus took up the almost forgotten question of the Nitrian Brothers. Dioscorus had recently died, and Ammonius was brought in a dying condition to Chalcedon. On seeing him thus, Theophilus burst into tears, and the reconciliation seems to have been effected in five minutes of personal intercourse. Meanwhile the Empress, who was furiously angry with Chrysostom for his insult to herself, had a message sent from the Imperial Court, during the twelfth sitting of the synod of Chalcedon, desiring them to come to a decision without further delay.

Chrysostom was forthwith deposed by the synod, and sentence of banishment immediately afterwards passed against him by the Court. But Theophilus had not reckoned on the personal popularity of the Byzantine Patriarch. For two or three days it was impossible to arrest him, as a great crowd collected, and, relieving each other, kept watch in a determined but orderly manner before his residence and the doors of the great church, so that to arrest him would have plunged the city into the horrors of civil war. Indeed, it was only the exhortations poured forth from the pulpit by Chrysostom himself which prevented an insurrection. On the third day, at the hour of noon, when the vigilance of his voluntary guard had relaxed, Chrysostom slipped out unperceived by a side door, and surrendered himself quietly to the Imperial officers. By them he was hurried on board a ship, and despatched to Bithynia.

On the next day Theophilus entered the city in procession, and went to the cathedral in order to carry out the installation of a successor to Chrysostom; but his preacher, by a bitter invective against John, aroused all the people to fresh indignation. Loud outcries arose; the church had to be cleared by main force and a liberal use of sticks. A wild mob surged through the streets, crying out 'Give us back our bishop!' Perhaps even yet Theophilus, supported by the Empress, would have conquered, but that night an earthquake shook the town and roused the terrified Empress from sleep. She called upon her husband to restore Chrysostom, since the Heavens had declared themselves on his side, and Arcadius was nothing loth. Theophilus, hearing what had happened, and seeing that the popular feeling was likely to be directed against him, hastily left the city and returned to Alexandria. Very soon afterwards a Council of about sixty bishops reassembled, which annulled the whole proceedings of the former one, and declared that Chrysostom was still Bishop of Constantinople. Theophilus wrote to inform Pope Innocent of Rome that he had deposed the Bishop of Constantinople, and Innocent, not unnaturally, wrote to ask on what grounds, assuring his brother Theophilus that for his part he was still in communion with both John and himself.

In the end, however, the Pope of Alexandria prevailed in this most unseemly strife. He did not go again to Constantinople, alleging that he was too much occupied with the duties of his own province to do so ; but he sent agents, and took part through them in the proceedings which finally drove Chrysostom from his see by command of the Emperor and Empress. They sent a troop of soldiers, who attacked the cathedral during the midnight service on Easter eve, when no less than 3,000 catechumens are said to have been present for baptism. These were thrust out from the baptisteries at the point of the sword, and the whole congregation driven out of the cathedral. With great courage some of the clergy reassembled their catechumens in regular order in the streets outside, and marched them to the Baths of Constantine. Here they hastily blessed the water, and began to finish the work of baptizing the candidates, when the soldiers, hearing what had happened, came and drove them also from thence. The final banishment of Chrysostom took place two months later, in June, 404. He died in exile in the autumn of 407.

CHAPTER XXI

SYNESIUS OF CYRENE

A.D. 365
A.M. 181

TOWARDS the close of his Patriarchate, Theophilus was brought into close relations with Synesius of Cyrene, a remarkable man who is chiefly known to English readers by the incidental notices in Kingsley's 'Hypatia.' He was born about the year 365 at Cyrene, being indeed a descendant of one of the old Greek colonists of that city, and owning considerable estates in the province of Pentapolis. He had spent some of his earlier years in the army, but while still a young man resigned his commission, and devoted himself to the study of philosophy.

The once celebrated schools of Cyrene existed no longer, and Synesius, like everybody else, went to Alexandria. But the pagan schools were here, though still existent, at a low ebb. Hypatia had indeed begun to teach, and her great beauty and wonderful talent made a lifelong impression on the rough soldier, who even after his conversion to Christianity remained always her loyal friend and admirer. She had not yet, however, achieved that wonderful revival of pagan philosophy in its most attractive form which later she opposed to the rapidly deteriorating Christianity of Alexandria; and Synesius, who thought much of his Greek descent, could not be content without a visit to the schools of Athens.

I shall at least get one advantage by going there (he said in answer to the remonstrances of one of his friends). I shall no longer have to look with reverence on those persons who have no advantage over us in the knowledge of Plato and Aristotle, yet, because they have seen the Academy and the Lyceum, treat us as if they were demi-gods and we but demi-asses.

His disillusionment was rapid and complete. Athens, he declared, was like an animal of which only the skin remained to show what it once had been. Its chief distinction was the manufacture of honey, and Synesius declared that the most eminent professors in Athens attracted pupils, not by the excellence of their teaching, but by presents of honey from Hymettus.

After studying for some time in Alexandria and Athens, Synesius returned to Egypt and settled down on his estates in Pentapolis. He had a brother, Evoptius, to whom he was devotedly attached, and with whom he corresponded frequently. Many of his letters have been preserved, and give a pleasant picture of the life of a country gentleman in Egypt in the latter end of the fourth century :¹—

We are wakened in the morning by the neighing of horses, the roaring of bulls, the bleating of sheep and goats. . . . Our meetings are extremely social ; we help one another in agriculture, in flocks, in shepherds, and in hunting, of which the country affords a great variety. . . . We feed upon barley meal, which is pleasant to eat and pleasant to drink, such as Hecamede mixed for Nestor. After severe labour this drink is a protection against the effect of the summer heat. We have also wheaten bread and excellent fruits, and honeycomb and the milk of goats, for it is not customary with us to milk cows. Our best supply for the table comes from the chase. . . . Our music (he adds with gentle irony) is pre-eminently national. We have a small rustic pipe of masculine tone, not unworthy of being used in training the boys of Plato's republic; for it does not admit of any modulations, neither will it harmonise with every voice. The singers adapt themselves to the simplicity of the music. Then we have capital songs—no effeminate subjects, but the praises of the dog who does not fear the hyenas and dashes at the wolf's throat; of the ewe which bears twins, of the fig-tree, and of the vine. But nothing is so common in our songs as thanksgivings and prayers for blessings on the men, the plants, and the herbs. About the king¹ and the king's friends there is naturally hardly a word. There is a king; that, I may say, they know well. We are reminded of that every year by the taxgatherers. But who he is, that is not so clear. Some among us think that Agamemnon, son of Atreus, who was so distinguished at Troy, is still reigning—for this has been transmitted to us in our childhood as a name for a king. And the good herdsman speaks of his friend Ulysses, a bald-headed man, but clever in finding his way out of difficulties. . . . They often ask me about ships and sails, and the sea. Though they may accept what I tell them about ships, they steadily refuse to believe that any food fit for men can come out of the sea. That, they think, is the special prerogative of Mother Earth. Once, when they would not believe what I told them about fishes, I took a jar, opened it with a stone, and showed them some preserved fish from Egypt. But the men said these were poisonous serpents, jumped up and ran away, believing the bones would be as poisonous as the teeth. One very old man who was considered the cleverest among them said he certainly could not believe that anything good to eat could come out of salt water, when good tanks of drinkable water only produced frogs and leeches, which no madman even would think of eating.

¹ The translation of these letters, and one or two passages of this chapter shown by inverted commas, are taken from the very able article on Synesius, in Smith's Dictionary of Christian Biography, by the late Rev. T. Holcombe.

¹ The emperor. In the Coptic stories and histories he is always called the king.

These labourers were mostly slaves—or, rather, serfs—whose grandfathers had belonged to the ancestors of Synesius; natives of the country, who lived on the estate in patriarchal fashion, much as if they had been the children of the owner.

In the year 397 Synesius was asked to undertake the management of some affairs connected with his native city, which obliged him to go to Court. He remained in Constantinople three years; for it was some time, in the distracted state of affairs there, before he could get any attention paid to his business. But by the influence of a friend at Court (Aurelian), the country squire—or rustic philosopher, as he was called—was appointed to pronounce an oration before Arcadius and his Court. Synesius, who had been profoundly disgusted with the state of affairs in Constantinople, had the audacity to take for his subject ‘The Nature and Duties of the Kingly Office;’ and if he really delivered the speech as it has come down to us, it shows that Arcadius cannot have been without magnanimity, for Synesius was listened to patiently, and his fierce denunciation of the Byzantine conception of royalty did him no harm. In one passage he says:—

The fear that if you are often seen, you will be reduced to the level of mere men, makes you State prisoners. You see nothing, you hear nothing, which can give you any practical wisdom. Your only pleasures are the most sensual pleasures of the body. Your life is the life of a sea anemone.

Synesius published while he was in Constantinople a curious political pamphlet, in which, under the transparent veil of an Egyptian myth, he describes the intrigues of Gainas against Aurelian and the empire. In the end, however, Aurelian was able to obtain for Synesius the boon which he had asked for his native city, and the latter returned thankfully to his country life, having considerably enlarged the number of his correspondents.

Not long after his return began that series of inroads from the nomad tribes of the Libyan hills which reduced the province of Pentapolis almost to a desert. There were no troops to oppose them in Cyrene, and the natives of the country were almost all serfs to the descendants of Greek colonists, and had entirely lost their fighting instincts. Only the Christian inhabitants, with their priests and deacons, rose to the defence of their native land, and this seems first to have attracted Synesius to Christianity, of which, indeed, he had seen little reason to judge favourably in Constantinople.

Blessings on the priests of the Auxiditæ (he writes), who, when the soldiers hid themselves in the caves, called the people together, and after divine service took the offensive against the enemy. Now Myrsinitis is a long deep ravine, thickly wooded; but as the barbarians had hitherto met with no opposition they were not alarmed at the badness of the ground. They encountered a hero, however, in the Deacon Faustus. Though unarmed, he attacked a man who was fully armed, and struck him a blow with a stone on the head; not throwing the stone, but rushing on the man and striking him like a boxer. Then he took the arms of the fallen man and killed several others. For my part I should like to give triumphal crowns to all who took part in the fray, and make a public proclamation in their honour; for they are the first who have done a gallant deed, and have shown that these invaders are not corybantes or demons such as wait on Rhea, but men who can be killed and wounded like ourselves.

But the heroic resistance of a few unarmed Christians could not do much to stem the increasing force of the barbarian invasions. Later Synesius writes:—

They have burnt the barns and devastated the land, and carried off the women as slaves. The males they never spare. Formerly they used to take young boys alive; now, I suppose, they feel they are too few in number to leave many guards with the booty and still have men enough to resist attacks. Yet none of us are indignant. We sit at home, hoping in vain for the soldiers. Shall we not cease our folly? Shall we not march against these men in behalf of our children, our wives, our country? For my part I have dictated this letter almost on horseback, for I have levied a troop among our neighbours. When we begin our march and it is known that I have a force of young men with us, I hope that many will join me.

The supply of arms was the chief difficulty. Also, on hearing of his proceedings, the brother of Synesius wrote to him in great alarm, pointing out that he was laying himself open to a charge of treason in thus taking upon himself to levy troops in the country.

You are a pleasant person (wrote Synesius in reply), hindering us from taking up arms when the enemy are at hand, plundering everywhere and every day slaughtering whole villages, and where there are no soldiers to defend us—at least, none to be seen. Will you say after this that it is not lawful for private persons to bear arms, and that they may be put to death; that the State may be angry with anyone who attempts to save himself? I would gladly die at once if my country could regain her former aspect.

Later, he writes to Hypatia:—

Even if, as Homer says, 'The dead forget in Hades,' yet even there will I remember the beloved Hypatia. I am surrounded by the misfortunes of my country, and mourn for her each day, as I see the enemy in arms and men slaughtered like sheep. The air I breathe is tainted by putrefying corpses, and I expect as bad a fate myself, for who can be hopeful when the very sky is darkened by clouds of carnivorous birds? Still I cling to my country. How can I do otherwise—I who am a Libyan, born in the country, and who have before my eyes the honoured tombs of my ancestors? For your sake alone I think I would leave my country and change my abode, if I am ever again free from anxiety.

At length the hardly hoped-for time came. The desert tribes were driven back, and Pentapolis breathed freely. Synesius gladly redeemed his promise, and went to visit the beautiful philosopher in Alexandria. But here a strange thing happened to him. He fell in love with a Christian lady, and persuaded her to marry him. Nay, Theophilus himself performed the ceremony—glad, no doubt, to establish relations in such a manner with one of Hypatia's most intimate friends and valued pupils; for Hypatia seems to have been as much the rival at this time of Pope Theophilus as she was afterwards of his successor Cyril.

Synesius did not then become a Christian and he never swerved from his loyal devotion to Hypatia. It seems not impossible that his wife was one of her Christian friends. But in the next four years the process of conversion was gradually taking place in a heart and mind well qualified to receive the best form of Christianity.

His marriage took place in 403, and he remained nearly two years in Alexandria. Before he left he had nearly completed a treatise on dreams, and another on the points of difference between his views and those generally prevalent at that time among Christians. Synesius attached a curious importance to dreams, and declared that his own had always been to him a source of guidance. The other treatise was written to defend himself against the criticisms of both pagan philosophers and Christian monks; for the increasing tendency to exalt the ascetic and celibate life as the most perfect expression of Christianity seems to have held Synesius back more than anything else from his final acceptance of the Christian religion. Both these treatises were sent to Hypatia for criticism, and seem to have been regarded as satisfactory by her. Yet the sequel shows that at some time during the three years which followed his return to his home in Pentapolis he must have become a Christian. His baptism is supposed to have taken place about five years after his marriage.

Synesius was a poet as well as an author, and the change of his religious views first becomes evident in his poems and hymns. He was not long, however, allowed to enjoy his domestic happiness or his peaceful pursuits. On his return to Pentapolis in 404 he found a new and still more incapable governor, under whose rule the barbaric inroads soon assumed once more the proportions of a regular invasion. Again the letters of Synesius to his friends in Alexandria are full of accounts of burnt harvests, stolen flocks, and every village living in a state of preparation for attack.

Synesius was called upon to undertake the defence of Ptolemais, now the capital of Pentapolis, for the governor had basely deserted his post. The following are extracts from his letters:—

When Cerealis (the governor) saw the danger, he embarked his money, and is now at anchor in the bay. He sends us orders by a boat that we are to keep within the walls, and not attack these invincible men ; otherwise, he protests, he is not to blame for the consequences. Besides we are to set four watches at night ; as if our hopes depended on our not going to sleep.

I have no time for letters. I am occupied in devising a machine which shall hurl large stones a considerable distance from the walls.

At break of day I ride out as far as possible to gain tidings of these brigands ; I will not call them enemies, but robbers and murderers, since they do nothing but plunder and kill the helpless. At night with a body of young men I make circuits round the hills, that the women may sleep without fear. I have some soldiers with me, of the company of the Balagratae, who before Cerealis was governor were mounted archers, but he has sold their horses. Still, they do for me without horses, for we need archers to guard the wells and river, as we have no water within the walls. I want a few men who do not belie the name of men. If I get them, with the help of God I am confident of success. But if I must die, there is this benefit in philosophy, that I should not shrink from leaving this little bag of flesh. But that I shall shed no tear at the thought of my wife and child, that I cannot pledge myself to do.

The efforts of Synesius were at length crowned with success. Cerealis was got rid of, a really capable governor was sent, the invaders were beaten back, and Synesius returned to his country home, and to his philosophic and scientific studies. In these he had but little sympathy from the other country gentlemen of Pentapolis.

I never hear in Libya the sound of philosophy except the echo of my own voice. Yet, if no one else is my witness, assuredly God is, for the mind of man is the seed of God ; and I think the stars look down with favour on me as the only scientific observer of their movements visible to them in this vast continent.

Synesius had vainly urged the enrolment of a national militia in Pentapolis ; but it was no part of the Byzantine policy to allow its unwilling subjects in Egypt the use of arms. Another of his proposals was that the appointment of their governor should rest with the Governor of Egypt, instead of with the Court of Byzantium. Experience had shown him that the appointments of the latter were almost invariably bad. Probably the post of governor in a remote province of Egypt, subject to perpetual invasion from savage tribes, attracted no one but men whose one idea was to make as much money as they could in a short tenure of office. Synesius declares that one governor of Pentapolis had made his fortune by keeping a house of ill-fame, and enumerates several other cases scarcely less disgraceful. Complaints to Constantinople bore no fruit, and could rarely be made at all, owing to the infrequency and difficulty of communication with that distant city, whereas almost all the great families of Pentapolis had friends and relations in Alexandria, and they were in constant communication with their capital.

No notice whatever was taken of these communications by the Court, and not very long afterwards a series of disgraceful intrigues ended in the recall of the military governor who had enforced peace, and the appointment of a man whose bad character was well known in the province. A storm of popular indignation swept over the country and manifested itself in an unexpected way.

Ever since the time of Constantine, the real government of Egypt had been passing slowly but steadily from the hands of the Emperor and his governors to those of the Patriarch and his bishops.¹ The Roman rule was always detested, and of late years it was hardly even feared. So long as they paid their yearly taxes—even this only after they had made their futile protest by submitting to the lash of the taxgatherer—and sent the yearly tribute of corn to Constantinople, the Court did not trouble itself about Egypt, though always jealous of the Pope and his increasing temporal as well as spiritual power. But the transference of power from prefect to Pope was going on all over the kingdom in the same way from local governor to local bishop. The governor knew nothing about the country, and cared less; his relations with it were purely mercenary. The bishop was always an Egyptian, generally a native of his own diocese; his people looked to him for everything, and yielded a willing obedience to his authority. Those who were monks, promoted by Athanasius and Theophilus, were not, of course, so much in touch with the people; but even these had generally been the pride of the district for their sanctity and for those fragments of forgotten Egyptian science which rendered them such wonder-workers in the eyes of the common people. It not infrequently happened, especially when the Byzantine official was more than usually grasping and incompetent, that the people of a district spontaneously fixed on the man they desired to rule over them, and entreated the Patriarch to consecrate him as their bishop. Sometimes the see was not even vacant, but the diocese was so large that certain towns on the outskirts made up their minds to have a bishop of their own, chose their man, and persuaded both bishop and Patriarch to consent to the creation of a new see for him, or appoint him as suffragan.

¹ Egypt under the Byzantine emperors was at first divided into six provinces, each under an Imperial prefect, who took his orders from Constantinople, and had no superior in Egypt. The taxgatherers were also under orders from Constantinople, and not responsible to the prefect. Later the country was divided into eight governments, viz. the Upper Thebaid, with eleven cities; the Lower Thebaid, with ten cities (including the Great Oasis and part of the Heptanomis); Upper Libya or Cyrene; Lower Libya or Pareatonium; Arcadia (after Arcadius); Egyptiaca—the western half of the Delta; Augustamica I., or the Eastern Delta; Augustamica II., from Bubastis to the Red Sea.

This was the way in which the people of Pentapolis met the appointment of Andronicus as their governor. The see of Ptolemais, which exercised a kind of Metropolitan jurisdiction over the other sees of Pentapolis, was vacant, and the inhabitants immediately elected Synesius to be their bishop and rule over them. No doubts seem to have been felt about the view which the Pope might take of their request to him to consecrate Synesius. Indeed, Theophilus was evidently a great deal more willing to accede to their wishes than Synesius himself. He wrote a long letter, ostensibly to his brother, who was then living in Alexandria, but intended to be shown to Theophilus. In this, after warmly expressing his sense of the honour which the citizens of Ptolemais had done him, and his own sincere conviction that he was not fit to be a bishop, he goes on to particularise some of the reasons which influence him to decline :—

I now divide my time (he writes) between amusements and study. When I am engaged in study, especially religious studies, I keep entirely to myself ; in my amusements I am thoroughly sociable. But the bishop must be godly, and therefore, like God, have nothing to do with amusements ; and a thousand eyes watch to see that he observes this duty. In religious matters, on the other hand, he cannot seclude himself, but must be thoroughly sociable, as he is both a teacher and preacher of the law. Single-handed he has to do the work of everybody or bear the blame of everybody. Surely, then, it needs a man of the strongest character to support such a burden of cares without allowing the mind to be overwhelmed, or the divine particle in the soul to be quenched, when he is distracted by such an infinite variety of employments.

Besides these considerations Synesius had two far stronger reasons for holding back, concerning which he would admit no compromise. It has been pointed out that in the last forty years it had become more and more the fashion to choose monks for bishops, and to regard a married clergyman as self-barred from promotion. Synesius enters his manly protest against this state of things in straightforward and emphatic words:—

God and the law and the sacred hand of Theophilus (he writes) gave me my wife. I therefore declare openly to all, and testify that I will not separate entirely from her, or visit her secretly like an adulterer. The one course would be contrary to piety, the other to law. I shall wish and pray to have a large number of virtuous children.

The other difficulty concerned his religious opinions. He had not long been a Christian, and his whole training had been in pagan philosophy. His opinions on many points were still in a transition state, and though he could honestly promise to keep silence on abstruse theological questions to his people ('for what has the multitude to do with philosophy? The truth of divine mysteries is not a thing to be talked about'), he desired that there should be no misunderstanding between himself and the Patriarch.

If I am called to the episcopate, I do not think it right to pretend to hold opinions which I do not hold. I call God and man as witness to this. Truth is the property of God, before whom I wish to be entirely blameless. Though I am fond of amusement—from my childhood I have been accused of being mad after arms and horses—still I will consent to give them up, though I shall regret to see my darling dogs no longer allowed to hunt, and my bows moth-eaten. Still I will submit to this, if it be God's will. And though I hate all cares and troubles, I will endure these petty matters of business as rendering my appointed service to God, grievous as it will be. But I will have no deceit about dogmas, nor shall there be variance between my thoughts and my tongue. . . . It shall never be said of me that I got myself consecrated without my opinions being known. But let Father Theophilus, dearly beloved by God, decide for me, with full knowledge of the circumstances of the case, and let him tell me his opinion clearly. Then he will either leave me in private life to philosophise quietly by myself, or else he will have no opening left for afterwards judging me and removing me from the episcopal body.

Theophilus appears to have acted with more wisdom and charity than we should have expected from him, after his conduct in the matter of the monks and Chrysostom. The great Pope, with all his faults, was statesman enough to see the importance of enlisting Synesius under his banner, and set himself to remove his scruples; which, however much they might clash with the prevailing opinion of the time, were by no means inconsistent with Holy Scripture. With regard to his wife, Theophilus yielded altogether—the more readily, perhaps, that the last ten years must have shown him the growing dangers of monasticism. Before the question was finally settled Synesius paid a visit to Alexandria to consult Theophilus in person, and popular feeling ran so high on the subject in Pentapolis that Synesius felt that if he refused their request he could not return to live amongst them again.

At length the matter was arranged, and Synesius was consecrated Bishop of Ptolemais in the year 410. The following extract is from the letter which he wrote on the occasion to the priests of the diocese of Ptolemais:—

Since God has laid upon me, not what I sought, but what He willed, I pray that He who has assigned me this life will guide me through the life He has assigned me. How shall I, who have spent my youth in philosophical leisure and contemplation—I who have only meddled with the cares of life so far as was necessary for me to discharge my duties as a private citizen—how shall I be able to bear the continued pressure of anxiety? how shall I, while devoting myself to a multitude of affairs, still turn my thoughts to those intellectual beauties which are only enjoyed in happy leisure, without which life is no life to me and such as I am? But to God, they say, all things are possible—even the impossible. Do you, then, lift up your hands in prayer for me to God, and exhort the people in the city, and those who frequent the churches in the villages and the country, to pray both in public and private for me. If I am not abandoned by God, I shall realise that the episcopacy is not a descent from philosophy, but an ascent to a higher form of it.

The three years of his episcopate were the most troubled of his life. On his return from consecration he found Ptolemais like 'a city taken by storm.' It seems difficult to believe that the list of atrocities recorded against Andronicus could have been perpetrated with impunity on the inhabitants of even so distant an Imperial province as this outlying borderland of Egypt. There was no excuse of rebellion or difference of religious belief to excuse his persecution. Citizens were tortured and imprisoned with the sole and avowed object of extorting money for the private purse of the governor.

‘Nothing was to be heard in the public places but the groans of men, the screams of women, and the cries of boys.’ The bishop’s palace was immediately beset by crowds demanding redress and protection; Synesius remonstrated with the governor, to no purpose. While he tried by every possible means to restrain Andronicus without openly resisting the Imperial officer, the people murmured that Synesius, in whom they had trusted, had forsaken them. His own child died, his prayers seemed to remain unheard; in his despair Synesius seems even to have thought of suicide. He had already written the strongest protests to Constantinople, but the sufferings of the people forbade him to wait any longer for the answer.

He called a solemn meeting in the cathedral, and publicly excommunicated Andronicus. After setting forth in his sermon the crimes of the latter which compelled him to do so, he ended as follows:—

Therefore the Church of Ptolemais communicates this decree to her sisters throughout the world :

Let no temple of God be open to Andronicus and his family, to Thoas and his family.¹ Let every sacred building and precinct be closed against them. The devil has no part in Paradise; if he enters by stealth, he must be driven out. I therefore exhort all men, whether private individuals or rulers, neither to dwell under the same roof nor to sit at the same table with them; especially I exhort the bishops neither to speak to them while living nor bury them while dead. But if anyone despises our Church as the Church of a small city, and receives those whom she casts out on the ground that it is not necessary to obey such a poor Church, let him know that he has divided the Church, which Christ wishes to be one. Such a person, whether a Levite, a presbyter, or a bishop, will be treated by us like Andronicus. We will neither take him by the hand, nor eat at the same table with him ; far shall it be from us to share the ineffable mystery with those who take part with Andronicus and Thoas.

¹ Thoas had been the willing instrument of Andronicus in his most atrocious crimes.

On hearing this sentence, and before it could be sent off to the other bishops of Pentapolis, Andronicus hastened to profess penitence and promise amendment, if only Synesius would revoke it. Synesius did not trust the man, but he consented to suspend the publication of the sentence for a time, whereupon Andronicus, evidently believing that he had 'got round the bishop,' resumed his evil practices.

Synesius at once put the sentence of excommunication in force ; and it was so effectual that a little later we find Synesius writing to Theophilus to recommend the disgraced outcast to his charity.

Having thus freed his people from their tyrant, Synesius went on a visitation tour throughout the province. In the course of his journey he came to Palæbisca and Hydrax, two villages on the extreme edge of the Libyan desert, which had, it will be remembered, elected a young and active bishop of their own to defend them in the reign of Valens, and persuaded Athanasius to consecrate him. A small see had been created for him out of the diocese to which they properly belonged ; but the bishop of this smaller diocese was now dead, and Theophilus had asked Synesius to go that way and preside over the election and consecration of his successor.

But the occupant of the parent see of Erython happened at this time to be a man beloved by the whole district, and the two towns declared that they wanted no bishop of their own now; their one desire was to remain under Paul of Erython. When Synesius called them together, and desired them to nominate their successor, a most curious scene followed:—

The people threw themselves upon the ground as suppliants, invoking the mercy of Theophilus, as if he were present and could hear their cries. All was confusion. No arguments could be listened to. Nothing was heard but the groaning of the men, the screams of the women, the weeping of the children. In vain Synesius had the most disorderly removed. The men were bad enough; but the women, 'always most difficult to deal with,' holding their infants in their outstretched arms, and closing their eyes that they might not see the bishop's seat unoccupied by their beloved ruler, continued weeping, till Synesius himself was inclined to weep in sympathy with them. He dismissed the people, and ordered them to reassemble on the fourth day. As the same scene was then repeated, he ultimately consented to send an account of all that had happened to Theophilus, leaving him to decide whether any further steps should be taken.

'The next case which was brought before Synesius may perhaps explain what were the episcopal qualities which the people so much admired in the most religious Paulus. Like Siderius of happy memory, he was obviously an active man, one who could help his friends and injure his enemies.

'Near the village of Hydrax, on the summit of a precipitous hill, stood the ruins of an old castle. Part of its walls had been thrown down by an earthquake, but they could be so easily repaired, and the position was naturally so strong, that it was a place of great importance to the neighbouring villages in such troubled times. In those days of war and devastation it was a great advantage to the people to have a fortress close at hand, to which they could retire with their cattle, and from which they could easily repel the attacks of the barbarians. Unfortunately for the people of Hydrax, the hill was the property of Dioscorus, bishop of the neighbouring town of Dardanus. Failing to obtain it by any other means, Paulus broke into the place by force, a table was brought and set up as an altar in a small outbuilding at the extremity of the hill, and then Paulus consecrated the building as a church. If this consecration held good, the building by law ceased to be private property, and as it was in the diocese of Erython it would remain in the hands of Paulus. Moreover, as it could only be reached by a path which traversed the whole crest of the hill, the rest of the property would become almost valueless to any other owner. The question had been referred to the bishop (Metropolitan?) of the province, who strongly disapproved of what had been done, but hesitated to declare the act of consecration void. Synesius had no such scruples. He urged that the mere fact of celebrating the divine rites in a place could not make that place for ever sacred; otherwise all castles in time of war would become churches.'

Besides (he said) I distinguish between religion and superstition, a vice which wears the mask of virtue and is considered by philosophy the third form of atheism. I consider that nothing is holy or sacred which is not done in conformity with justice and piety. It is not the Christian belief that the divine presence must necessarily follow certain mystic rites and words, as if they had a magical power of attracting it, which might be the case with an earth spirit. The divine presence comes to those souls which are free from passion and devoted to God. Where wrath and anger and the spirit of contention rule, how can the Holy Spirit enter?—for were He already dwelling there, He would depart when these vices came.

Paulus at once yielded to the decision of Synesius, with such sorrow and repentance that all hearts were melted. Dioscorus, not to be outdone in generosity, offered to do anything in his power to effect an amicable settlement. Eventually Paulus bought the hill and castle in dispute from Dioscorus, and all parties were content.

Not long afterwards the general who had recently and successfully been operating against the barbarian tribes was recalled to make way for a wholly incompetent successor, and the devastating inroads began again.

I have read of a country (writes Synesius) where only the women and children were left, the sign of its desolation. Things are still worse with us. There is no booty the Ansurians so much value as women and children—the women to bear fresh children to them, the children to swell their ranks. These children will return one day to their native land, but they will return as enemies. The young man will devastate the fields which he cultivated as a boy by his father's side. Yet if we had had good generals, it would have been easy enough to take vengeance on this sacrilegious and contemptuous enemy. What holy places have the barbarians spared? Have they not devastated the very tombs upon the plain of Barca? Have they not burned and ruined the churches of Ampolis? Have they not defiled the holy tables, and used them for their feasts? Have not the sacred vessels of our public worship been carried off to be used for the worship of demons? It is useless to speak of the forts they have demolished, the cattle they have seized in the caves of the mountains, the goods they have carried off. Pentapolis is ruined, is extinguished, has perished. I have no longer a country to fly to. Alas for Cyrene! where the public records trace my descent from Hercules. Alas for the tombs where I shall not be laid! the tombs of the Dorians. Alas for Pentapolis! of which I am the last bishop. But the calamity is too near me. I can say no more; tears check my tongue. I am overwhelmed at the thought of abandoning the house and the services of God. I must sail away to some island; but when I am summoned to the ship, I shall pray them to leave me a little longer here. First I shall go to God's temple. I shall embrace the altar, I shall wet with my tears the precious pavement. I will not leave until I have kissed the well-known door, the well-known seat (throne?). How often shall I call on God for help! How often shall I turn! How often clasp the altar-screen! I would I could refresh my eyes with sleep, unbroken by the trumpet's sound! How long am I to be stationed on the battlements? How long am I to mount guard upon the wall? I am weary of setting the watches, guarding and being guarded in turn. I, who used to spend whole nights in observing the movements of the stars, am worn out by looking night after night for the movements of the enemy. Our time for sleep is measured by the water-clock, and often it is broken by the alarm-bell; and if I do doze a little, what frightful dreams I have! In my dreams I fly, I am taken prisoner, I am wounded, I am fettered, I am sold as a slave. How often have I started from my sleep with joy because I escape from my tyrant! How often have I awoke panting, bathed in perspiration! for the end of my sleep was the end of my flight from the soldier who pursued me. . . . If the islands are free from such troubles as these, I will certainly set sail when the storm is abated. But I fear the calamity will overtake us before we can escape. The day for the assault draws near. When the peril of the city is extreme, then will be especially the time for the bishop to hasten to God's temple. I will stay in my country, in my church. I will place before me the sacred vessels of holy water. I will cling to the sacred pillars which raise the holy table from the ground. There will I remain while living, there will I lie when dead. I am God's minister, appointed to present the offerings (Korbân ?) to Him ; it is perhaps His will that I should present the offering of my life. Surely God will not look with indifference on His altar stained for the first time with blood, the blood of His bishop.

Within the year Synesius lost his little son, and never recovered from this last blow. His wife and two other children had died earlier.

As for me (he writes in his last letter to Hypatia), my bodily sickness comes from sickness of the mind. The recollection of the children who are gone is slowly killing me. Would to God I could either cease to live, or cease to think of my children's graves !

Synesius has been well described as 'a soldier, a statesman, an orator, a poet, a sophist, a philosopher, a bishop ; and in all these characters had acted as a man who deserved to be admired and, still more, to be loved.'

About the same time, probably within a year, died Theophilus, one of the most powerful Popes that Egypt has ever known. He consolidated the Egyptian nation under the name of 'the Church,' and his two successors were men of the same calibre, and carried on the same policy until they had made their country independent in all but name. It was only by an accusation of heresy that the Imperial Government was able to break a power which the Emperor had good cause to dread.

Theophilus added several 'canons,' one of which relates to the ordination of the clergy, and provides that the candidates are to be 'selected by the clergy, examined by the bishop, and ordained publicly, with the express assent of the clergy, and after the bishop has asked whether the laity also can testify to them.'

The last days of Theophilus were in strange contrast to his turbulent career, for we are told that he fell 'into a lethargic state,' in which he passed away on October 15, 412.

CHAPTER XXII

SHENOUDA OF AKHMIN, AND OTHERS

A.D. 412
A.M. 128

WHILE Synesius fought and prayed on the north-western frontier of Egypt, another remarkable man, better known and far more admired in his own day, but fallen into more complete oblivion now, was fasting and praying in the south. Shenouda¹ was born in a little village which is said still to exist a mile or two north-west of the well-known town of Akhmin.² His father was a wealthy farmer, owning large flocks of sheep, and as a boy Shenouda was employed to assist one of the shepherds. But he used to spend whole nights in prayer, and eventually the shepherd recommended his employer to take the boy away from outdoor labour. He was sent to the neighbouring monastery, of which his maternal uncle was the head, and brought up by him as a monk—the only career, indeed, open to an Egyptian of brains and ambition in those days. Yet, though he became one of the most famous saints of his day, and ruled an ever-growing community of monks, we have no such record of labour for the good of others in the life of the saint Shenouda as we have in that of the married philosopher and fighting bishop Synesius. As in the case of all the famous hermits, it is difficult to disentangle the real life of the man from the mists of fable that surround him. Probably the life of training that they led did really develop in these hermit saints abnormal powers to some extent; but it is difficult to believe that Shenouda, at any rate, did not deliberately use his natural gifts to impress his simple monks, and that he was not infrequently guilty of 'pious frauds.' Still, he dispensed justice in an autocratic fashion through all the surrounding districts, and no one ever seems to have dreamt of disputing his decision.

¹ The name Shenouda has been, incorrectly perhaps, identified with the Latin Sanutius. It is said to mean 'the Son of God' in Egyptian. In 1833 Mr. Curzon visited the monastery of St. Shenouda, and writes in his book: 'Who the great Abu Shenoud had the honour to be, and what he had done to be canonised, I could meet with no one to tell me. He was, I believe, a Mohammedan saint (!), and this Coptic monastery had been in some sort placed under the shadow of his protection, in the hope of saving it from the persecutions of the faithful.'

² Panopolis in Greek, and probably Khemmis in the ancient Egyptian Empire.

On one occasion a man came to confess to him that he had followed a traveller, and killed him, because he carried a purse which his assailant believed to be full of gold, and in which, he naïvely adds, 'I only found a single piece.' He asked what penance he should do, that his sin might be forgiven.

Shenouda desired him to go at once to the town of Akhmin, where the 'duke' of the province was about to judge some housebreakers, and to mingle himself with the prisoners. 'If they ask whether you were one of them,' coolly directed the saint, 'say, "Yes." Then you will be put to death with them, and so God will receive you into eternal life.' And immediately the man went as he was bidden, and was condemned and executed with the thieves.

He was constantly appealed to by people who had been robbed, and generally seems to have detected the thieves and compelled restitution.

Great people came from far-distant towns to consult him, and were received with the greatest mystery. The brethren were generally given to understand that it was Elijah, or Ezekiel, or some other of the Prophets who sought an interview with their holy Father, and who must not on any account be spoken to by anyone else.

A Roman general, who was on his way to defend the southern frontier against a fresh inroad of the Blemmyes, turned aside to the monastery of Anba Shenouda to ask his blessing and counsel.¹ But Anba Shenouda had withdrawn alone into the desert for solitary meditation and prayer, to avert a threatened calamity (it was feared that the Nile would not rise that year), and the Father had given strict orders that no one was to disturb him on any pretext whatever. So the monks told the Roman general that they dare not disturb the holy Father till his week was fulfilled, and the general, declaring that he should not leave the monastery, encamped in the neighbourhood with his soldiers. But after three days of this, during which it is implied that the whole force had to be fed at the cost of the monastery, the monks could stand it no longer, and sent off Visa, Shenouda's favourite scribe, to entreat their Father to come to their rescue. Shenouda was very humanly angry at being disobeyed, but on calm reflection decided that the matter was sufficiently urgent to excuse his followers. He had a long interview with the general, and to advice and information of genuine importance he added, at the earnest request of the general, one of his own girdles, to wear when he was fighting against the barbarians. It is recorded that when the hour of battle actually arrived, the general forgot all about the girdle; and it was not till his troops had been driven back two days following, that he remembered to gird himself with it, so that on the third day he obtained an easy victory!

¹ This incident did not happen till 450, when Shenouda was nearly a century old.

Shenouda was a great foe to paganism, which still lingered in isolated districts in that part of Egypt, and would go with a troop of monks to destroy the houses of a pagan village and spoil their goods on any complaint against them by the Christians whom he had taken under his protection. One complaint was that the Christian serfs of some wealthy pagan wine-growers were cheated out of their wages, and obliged to pay an enormous price for wine which had gone bad and could not otherwise be disposed of. Shenouda promptly called out his troops of monks, and destroyed entirely the houses and goods of the offenders.

A very rich man named Peter came one day from one of the neighbouring towns to ask Shenouda's blessing, and to offer gifts. Shenouda met him with stern rebuke, because he had married his niece, the daughter of his sister. In vain the man pleaded established custom. 'Her goods and inheritance were mixed up with mine,' he said; 'I was obliged therefore to marry her, lest they should pass into another family.'

'Have you never heard the words of the Evangelist?' answered Shenouda sternly: "'For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?'"

'Oh, my Father,' said the trembling citizen, 'is there no repentance possible for me?'¹ And the prophet answered 'Yes.' Then the man arose and went quickly to his home, and returned with 500 pieces, which he offered to Shenouda, entreating him to bestow it in alms for the good of his soul.

¹ The sect of the Novatians, and sterner individuals even in the Church, declared that no repentance could save those who had fallen into deadly sin after baptism.

'I cannot take it,' answered Shenouda; 'but if you will, go to the laura of Father Aflou, and ask him to find you some one who will take it in trust.' So Peter hastened to the place indicated, and found there Father Paul, the head of the laura of Bouet (in the moudirieh of Beni Souef), who received it with much pleasure. After this, Peter went back to his wife and said to her, 'Are you aware, my sister, that we have been living in continual sin without knowing it?' Then he resigned all his property to his wife, and became himself one of Shenouda's monks.¹

Not far from Shenouda there was still living another celebrated man, though he was now very old—St. John of Lycopolis, as he is called now; 'John the Carpenter,' as he is described in the old manuscripts, from his trade before he became a monk. He also was revered far and near, and had given counsel to emperors. Shenouda is described as going to visit him on his solitary mountain above Assiout; but he died about 394, being then ninety years old. Palladius also, the historian of the fourth-century monasticism, was living and travelling in the Thebaid for some years at this time. In 399 his health failed, and he was sent down to consult the Alexandrian physicians. By their advice he left Egypt for Palestine, and was afterwards consecrated Bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia. He attached himself warmly to Chrysostom, and when that prelate was sent into exile in 404 he was, with other bishops who clung to Chrysostom, imprisoned, ill-treated, and finally, about 405, exiled to Assuan or Syene, ¹ There are still ten churches dedicated to Anba Shenouda in the Thebaid and one in the Roman fortress of Babylon.

when he must again have passed through Akhmin and Assiout. On the death of the Patriarch Theophilus, he was allowed to leave Assuan, but not to return to his see ; and he spent about four years in the neighbourhood of Antinopolis in the Thebaid. Here he began his history, which was finished about the year 420. Shenouda long outlived both John and Palladius,¹ and became an intimate friend and adviser of the Patriarch Cyril.²

Another celebrated character in quite a different district of Egypt was Isidore of Pelusium, which, as everyone knows, was the chief military stronghold on the north-east frontier.

His surroundings were very different from the simple peasantry and devoted monks who in the Thebaid worshipped Shenouda almost as if he were a god. He lived a hermit life in a rich and fashionable town, and spent most of his time in rebukes and denunciation of worldliness in high places. The enormous power which had fallen into the hands of the bishops, in consequence of the weakness or wickedness of most of the Byzantine officials, was naturally a very great temptation, to which many succumbed. The process of deterioration on the part of the Egyptian nation was steadily going on. If a man were courageous, religious, ambitious, and patriotic, there was but one course open to him—to become a monk, that he might afterwards become an abbot or bishop; and the purer his motives and the more exalted his character, the more certain it was, in these circumstances, that he would leave no offspring behind him. Many of the bishops were already assuming the manners and dignity of kings in their respective districts; and though their rule was the best and the most greatly desired by the Egyptians, it was far from being altogether good for the Church. Isidore did not even approve of the beautiful churches which were being built all over the land. ‘It was not for the sake of walls,’ he writes, ‘but for the sake of souls, that the King of Heaven came to visit us. Could I have chosen, I would rather have lived in Apostolic times, when church buildings were not thus adorned, but the Church was decked with grace, than in these days, when the buildings are ornamented with all kinds of marble, and the Church is bare and void of spiritual gifts.’ The office of a bishop, he points out on another occasion, ‘is a work, not a relaxation; a solicitude, not a luxury; a responsible ministration, not an irresponsible dominion; a fatherly supervision, not a tyrannical autocracy.’ But he does allow that ‘there are bishops who take pains to live up to the Apostolic standard; if you say very few, I do not deny it.’ He complains of the inhospitality, ‘the gluttony,’ and ‘pugnacity’ of the monks. But in estimating his censures at their true worth, it is necessary to remember Isidore’s point of view. A hermit of that age considered the most temperate indulgence in ordinary and well-cooked food as gluttony. Were not bread, water, dates, and raw vegetables enough for the body? ¹ A hermit would not own a cloak, unless it were so old and worthless that he 'could throw it out by the wayside and leave it for three days without anyone caring to appropriate it.' Some of them were so humble that they avoided the eager service of their disciples; and to them, of course, the possession of a servant was a reprehensible luxury. One monk relates: 'In my youth I lived with Abbot Cronius. Old and trembling as he was, he would never bid me do anything; he would rise himself and hand the golla ² to me and to the rest. And Abbot Theodore of Pherinè, with whom also I lived, would set out the table by himself, and say "Brother, if thou wilt, come and eat." I said, "Father, I came to thee to profit; why dost thou not bid me do somewhat?" He answered never a word; but when the old men asked him the same thing, he broke out with: "Am I Cœnobiarch, that I should command him? If he like, what he sees me doing, he will himself do." Thenceforward I forestalled the old man's purposes. And I had learned the lesson of "doing in silence." We must not, therefore, conclude that the bishops and monks who aroused the wrath of Isidore were really evil-livers or bad Christians. Self-willed and domineering they too often became, but they were for the most part a set of honest, hardworking, temperate-living men, who naturally found that they could not fulfil the duties of their position on the meagre fare and under the stern rules of a hermit. An interesting light is thrown on this subject when we are told of one bishop who was regarded as a great transgressor.¹

¹ The author of a very curious treatise on 'The Nations of India and the Brahmans' has been identified with Palladius, but the similarity of name seems to be the only ground for the identification. This Palladius set out on a journey to India to study the philosophy of that country, and persuaded the Bishop of Adulf, a port of the Red Sea, to go with him. They met with so many difficulties that at last they returned to Egypt, having spent but a very short time in India. Another man, a merchant in the Indian trade, had made the same attempt in company with a priest, but they never got farther than Taprobane (Ceylon), where they were taken prisoners, and lived for six years in slavery before they were able to escape.

² Akhmin gave birth to other great men, besides hermits, in this century. It was here that the Egyptian poet Cyrus was born, who was the friend of Eudocia, wife to the Emperor Theodosius II. Cyrus was given high civil appointments by the Emperor, and Evagrius says that he was appointed to the command of the forces in the West (North Africa) ; but he afterwards took holy orders, and was made Bishop of Cotyæum.

¹ It is only in the recent years of this nineteenth century that the Egyptian monks have been permitted to eat meat once a week—on Sunday—instead of once a month.

² Water-jar.

Socrates allows that he was well instructed in logic, in philosophy, and particularly in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, besides being remarkably eloquent. But, our historian complains, 'He was not simple in his diet, for although he practised the strictest moderation, yet his table was always sumptuously furnished. His habits were soft and delicate, being accustomed to clothe himself in white garments, and to bathe twice a day in the public baths. And when some one asked him why he, who was a bishop, bathed twice a day, he replied: "Because it is inconvenient to bathe thrice." Going one day to visit the Bishop Arsacius, he was asked by one of the friends of that prelate why he wore a garment so unsuitable for a bishop, and where it was written that an ecclesiastic should be clothed in white. "Do you tell me first," he said, "where it is written that a bishop should wear black;" and, when he that made the inquiry knew not what to reply to this counter-query, "You cannot show," rejoined Sisinnius, "that a priest should be clothed in black. But Solomon is my authority, whose exhortation is 'Let your garments be white.' And our Saviour in the Gospels appears clothed in white raiment; moreover, he showed Moses and Elias to the Apostles clad in white garments.'" Socrates allows that the bishop's promptness extorted the admiration of all present.

Isidore of Pelusium was a devoted admirer of Chrysostom, and wrote bitterly of his own Pope in the following words: 'Theophilus, who had a mania for building and worshipped gold, and who had a spite against my namesake' (Isidore of Alexandria), 'was put forward by Egypt to persecute that pious man and true theologian.' Isidore afterwards influenced Cyril to treat the memory of Chrysostom with respect, and to restore his name to the diptychs. Still, Isidore was not always a pessimist; in one place he observes that the study of Church history should relieve despondency as to existing evils, and that even the present state of the Church should remove distrust as to the future. By this time the adoration of saints and martyrs had begun to obtain that prominent place in all the Churches which continues in the Latin Church, and to a less extent in the Greek and Egyptian Churches, to this day. It became the custom to store relics of saints in every new church that was built; and as in the other parts of the empire the supply was hardly equal to the demand, a great many mummies of the innumerable Egyptian saints and martyrs were dug up and sent to Constantinople and other places.

¹ Sisinnius, a bishop of the Novatians.

Pilgrimages also became common to those shrines which were left undisturbed, and some of these are still performed every year by the faithful in Egypt; others are still performed to the same places, though Mohammedan saints have now usurped the honours of their Christian predecessors in many cases, as at Tanta.

Another custom, too, the converted pagan Egyptians brought with them into Christianity was that of having sacred trees. The favourite was the Persea, which they declared now to be sacred to Jesus, because it was under a Persea that Jesus and His parents rested when they passed through the Matarieh. These trees, which were of foreign extraction, were dying out all over the country; and in spite of a law passed by Arcadius that no Persea should be cut down in Egypt, and that anyone guilty of buying or selling one should forfeit five pounds in gold, they rapidly became extinct. It is not even known for certain now what tree is meant by the Persea. Some say they were peach-trees; others identify it with the Balanites ægyptiaca; others declare it to have been the sensitive variety of the genus Mimosa.¹ A great deal of copying and translating was still done by the more learned communities of monks. At least three translations were made of the New Testament into the three dialects of Egyptian and Coptic—the Sahidic of the district beyond Assiout (still called Sayeed or Said), the Bashmuric or Beschymeric, and the Coptic proper of Memphis and the Delta. Many Lives of the saints and martyrs were at this time translated into Coptic, and also many works of the Fathers. Some curious Gnostic writings also belong to the fourth century. Most important of all, the four celebrated manuscripts of the New Testament which are now the pride of the Vatican, Paris, St. Petersburg, and the British Museum respectively, were written in Egypt about the middle of the fourth century. The one in London had once a superscription on it saying that it had been written by Thecla, an Egyptian lady of high rank, soon after the Council of Nicea. All the oldest manuscripts known show their origin by the Egyptian form of spelling some of the words. About the beginning of the fifth century churches began to be built in the Byzantine garrison towns to the Arian bishop George, who had been murdered in a pagan riot in Alexandria, and was regarded by the Byzantines as a martyr, and who was, moreover, particularly obnoxious to the Egyptians. The Byzantines added insult to injury by representing him riding triumphantly on horse-back, like his great predecessor St. George, and slaying a dragon, which, they were careful to explain, signified the Athanasian error, which he had trampled under foot. One of these churches still exists within the walls of the Roman fortress of Babylon; it is called after him Girghis, and is still in the possession of the Greek (Byzantine) Church, but they have long since forgotten the Arian St. George, and believe their church to be dedicated to the earlier martyr.

¹ The sacred tree now of the Latins at Matarieh is a sycamore fig. It is probably about 200 years old.

Another church was built to his honour in the garrison town of Ptolemais (Thebaid), and the name of the Arian saint prevailed over the Greek name of the town. The fragments of the town that remain in our day are called Girgeh. Timber was now extensively used for roofing churches, instead of the flat stones of the pagan period. X

Between 390 and 403 John Cassianus was also in Egypt, for the express purpose, like so many other travellers of that date, of studying this land of monks and monasteries. He was much struck by the voluntary hardships which they all endured, and spoke admiringly of those who lived so far from water that they had to carry all they wanted on their shoulders for a distance of three or four miles. He wrote in Latin, however, and had to communicate with the Egyptians through an interpreter. He caused the 'Rule' of three or four of the most celebrated of the Egyptian ascetics to be translated into Latin for the benefit of the Western monks.

Another visitor to Egypt about this time was Moses of Khorene, one of the most celebrated writers of Armenia.

He was sent with several companions at the public expense by his country to study both in the pagan and Christian schools of Alexandria, and they made good use of their time. They translated several of the most important Alexandrian manuscripts into Armenian, and centuries afterwards Europe reaped the benefit of their labours. Many valuable books of antiquity have come to us, from the Armenian convent at Venice, which owe their existence to the labours of Moses and his companions. In the latter half of the fourth century, in fact, and the beginning of the fifth, Egypt was once more—what she had long ago been under the early Ptolemies and the early Pharaohs—the dispenser of learning, and to a less degree of the material products of civilisation, to the whole world.

Yet all through this century the slow process of self-destruction and deterioration went steadily on, and in its closing years Alexandria lost the distinctive glory of her Church, that Catechetical School in which so many of her greatest saints and scholars had been trained. We know nothing of the reasons which led Rhodon, who had succeeded the blind Didymus in its presidency, to transfer the college to a town called Side in Pamphylia; but we do not find that Theophilus exerted himself in any way to prevent a step so fatal to the Christian learning of Alexandria and the very existence of the college, which did not long survive its transference. Henceforth the way was left clear for Hypatia and that passionate revival of pagan philosophy, which was met, not by a deeper learning and a more perfect scheme of life, but by riot and murder. Those reigns of Cyril and Dioscorus, during which the power of Christian Egypt appeared to reach its highest development, did but accelerate her rapid decline.

CHAPTER XXIII

CYRIL THE GREAT

A.D. 412
A.M. 128

CYRIL, who succeeded his maternal uncle Theophilus on the Papal throne of Alexandria, was at the time a young man, and headstrong to a degree which brought him into trouble more than once during the early years of his episcopate. He had been trained for five years among the monks of Nitria before his ordination, but Isidore of Pelusium had even then found fault with him for occupying himself with worldly thoughts and interests. Against his moral character no word was ever breathed. The contrast between the Popes of Alexandria and the Popes of Rome in this respect is very striking; for even when, as in the case of Athanasius and other Popes accused of heresy, attempts have been made to blacken the moral character of the Egyptians, they have invariably failed in proof: in most instances they have been triumphantly refuted. But Cyril had the faults of his office—he could brook no rival; and as at this time the Emperor of the East was only twelve or thirteen, the Patriarch was practically independent in Egypt. He had a standing army of some five thousand monks in Nitria alone; and the Egyptian monks of that day, unarmed as they were, made very good soldiers, and were capable of a successful resistance, even against the Imperial troops, as they had already shown.

Cyril's succession to the throne was not undisputed. The Archdeacon of Alexandria, whose name was Timotheus, was strongly supported, and it is to be feared that there was something very like actual fighting between the rival candidates before the matter was settled in favour of Cyril.

Cyril began his reign by a sharp persecution of the Novatians, who had become more powerful than he thought right, and had a bishop of their own in Egypt, called Theopemptus. Him Cyril deprived of all his property, as well as of the 'treasure' of his Church. But the early years of Cyril's government I shall pass over in as few lines as possible—not for lack of material, but because the story of those first few years has already been told, far better than I can tell it, in Kingsley's wonderful sketch of Cyril and Hypatia. If anyone who cares about Egypt has not read that book, let him do so forthwith, and he will get a much more vivid picture of the Alexandria of those days than any that I can draw for him. There are doubtless some minor inaccuracies (for instance, Kingsley seems really to have been under the impression that Scetis was on or near the Nile; and though Hypatia may have been quite as beautiful, she can hardly have been as young as she is there represented), but the bitter rivalry between Hypatia and Cyril, the weakness and effeminacy of the nominal governor Orestes, the torture of Hierax, the attempted massacre of the Christians by the Jews, the prompt way in which Cyril called out his army of monks and expelled the whole Jewish population of Alexandria in return—all this and more may be read in the pages of 'Hypatia.' Orestes wrote complaints to Constantinople, but no one ventured to interfere with the despotic proceedings of the Egyptian Pope.

Acting, not on orders from the Imperial Court, but on the advice of his own people, Cyril had an interview with Orestes after he had driven out the Jews, and endeavoured to make peace, tendering him in solemn appeal a copy of the Gospels. But though Orestes would doubtless have been glad to keep on good terms with the real ruler of Egypt, Cyril could not control his monks, except when he was actually present in command of them. Thus they met Orestes in the street at a critical time, and had well-nigh murdered him before they were called off. One of their number was taken prisoner on this occasion, and tortured to death by the prefect in revenge, which so roused the indignation of Cyril that he did a thing which he must afterwards have sincerely repented—gave the remains of the unfortunate monk a grand Church funeral, and declared that he was to be regarded as a martyr. But the most terrible tragedy of his reign was the murder of Hypatia by the same monastic army. This also should be read in Kingsley's book, but we will here transcribe the brief account in Socrates :—

There was a woman at Alexandria named Hypatia, daughter of the philosopher Theon, who made such attainments in literature and science as to far surpass all the philosophers of her own time. Having succeeded to the school of Plato and Plotinus, she explained the principles of philosophy to her auditors, many of whom came from a distance to receive her instructions. Such was her self-possession and ease of manner, arising from the refinement and cultivation of her mind, that she not infrequently appeared in public in presence of the magistrates, without ever losing in an assembly of men that dignified modesty of deportment for which she was conspicuous, and which gained for her universal respect and admiration. Yet even she fell a victim to the political jealousy which at this time prevailed; for, as she had frequent interviews with Orestes, it was calumniously reported among the Christians that it was by her influence that he was prevented from being reconciled to Cyril. Some of them therefore, whose ringleader was a reader named Peter, hurried away by a fierce and bigoted zeal, entered into a conspiracy against her; and observing her as she returned home in her carriage, they dragged her from it, and carried her to the church called Cæsareum, where they completely stripped her, and then murdered her with shells. After tearing her body in pieces they took her mangled limbs to a place called Cinaron, and there burnt them. An act so inhuman could not fail to bring the greatest opprobrium, not only upon Cyril, but also upon the whole Alexandrian Church.

There is no ground for supposing that Cyril knew anything of this ghastly murder till it was all over, but it could not fail to make a deep impression on him, since he must have realised that he was indirectly responsible for this foul stain on the Christian Church. He remained very quiet for some years after this, fulfilling his proper duties as Patriarch, and entering no protest when, in the year following these stormy events at Alexandria, an Imperial law was passed forbidding the clergy to take any open share in politics and restricting the number, while regulating the conduct, of the parabolani.¹ It must also be recorded amongst the early acts of Cyril that he refused to inscribe the name of Chrysostom on the diptychs, and wrote to Atticus that if he refused to condemn Chrysostom he would forfeit the communion of the Patriarchate of Alexandria. Isidore of Pelusium, however, prevailed upon Cyril to reconsider his determination and to restore Chrysostom's honoured name to the Egyptian diptychs.¹

¹ The parabolani were a kind of Church guild, whose proper duties were to act as attendants in the hospital and nurses to the sick poor in their homes. They were ranked among the clerics, but were subordinate to the regular orders. From 416 to 418 they were placed under the control of the prefect, as a punishment for insubordination and riotous behaviour; but after that were again suffered to be under the orders of

In Cyril's Paschal letter for 429 we find his first authoritative utterance on the Nestorian heresy, which was then beginning to agitate the Christian world. Nestorius was a native of Germanica, and had become a monk of the convent of St. Euprepus near Antioch. In 428 Theodosius II., weary of the perpetual clerical disputes of Constantinople, refused to appoint anyone from that city as Patriarch, and summoned the monk Nestorius to fill the vacant see.

Nestorius was, like most other monks of his time, zealous, intolerant, ignorant, brave, and careless of self. He came to Constantinople with a fixed intention of exercising to the full the great powers now entrusted to him. He began by persecuting the Arians, then the Novatians, and all the many other sects of the Byzantine provinces. But it was not long before he fell under suspicion of heresy himself—the Patriarch. It was the parabolani who were chiefly responsible for the disgraceful riot at the Council of Ephesus in 449.

¹ 'The diptychs were folded tablets of wood, ivory, gold, or silver, on which were inscribed the names usually recited at the Eucharist. They were generally the names (1) of Mary, the Apostles, and other chief saints; (2) of eminent persons who had died in Catholic communion; (3) of those living persons whom the Church thought good to honour. In the East, Spain, and Gaul, they were read before consecration; at Rome, partly before and partly after.—From Bright's 'History of the Church.'

that fatal political weapon in those days. His heresy, however, seems to have been a real one, and not a mere difference of opinion about a formula, as so many of these heresies were. Nestorius taught that our Lord was not Himself God, but merely a man so superabundantly blessed and inspired by God that He could not sin.

Cyril's Festal letter to his own subjects was sent to Constantinople, and shown by some one there to Nestorius, who was very angry at the outspoken condemnation of his teaching contained in it. It happened that at this time (early in the year 430) a Pelagian bishop and his associates had come to Constantinople from the West, and Nestorius, with the courtesy due from one archbishop to another, wrote to Celestine of Rome to consult with him about these wandering sheep of his. Having thus saved his dignity, he took occasion incidentally to mention his complaint of Cyril, and try to secure the support of the Roman Pope against the Alexandrian. As Celestine did not answer him, Nestorius wrote again, when he received an apology and a confession that the delay was unavoidable, as his letter and documents had to be translated from Greek into Latin before Celestine could read them. Meanwhile Celestine had written to Cyril to know what it was all about. On being informed by Cyril, who was a much better scholar and theologian than either Celestine or Nestorius, of the real nature of the question at issue, Pope Celestine declared that the views of Nestorius were flat blasphemy. By this time Cyril had written two letters to Nestorius, pointing out that the excitement and trouble had been caused, not by his Paschal letter, but by the refusal of Nestorius to allow the Virgin Mary the title of Mother of God (Theotokos). After much correspondence between the three bishops, those of Rome and Alexandria joined in condemning Nestorius of Constantinople. Celestine first held a synod, which pronounced Nestorius a heretic, and wrote (August 11, 430) to Cyril to ask his co-operation. Cyril called an Egyptian synod with the same result. Four Egyptian bishops were sent to Byzantium with the letters of these synods and the sentence of excommunication against Nestorius; but before they could reach Constantinople the Emperor Theodosius II., at the instance of Nestorius, issued orders for a General Council at Ephesus.

Cyril prepared to obey the summons, but it is to be feared that he did not rely entirely on the goodness of his cause. He took with him large sums of money, and bribed freely all those at the Imperial Court whom he thought could help him to attain his ends. He also took with him no less than fifty Egyptian bishops, besides the far-famed hermits Shenouda of Akhmin and Victor of Tabennisi. Memnon, Bishop of Ephesus (who was an Egyptian), joined him with another large body of bishops, and together they so far outnumbered the Nestorian bishops that Nestorius would not even appear at the Council, but held one with his own party, and in his turn excommunicated and deposed Cyril and Memnon.

The sessions began in June, 431; but it soon became evident that no real agreement was possible. The opposing parties lived like soldiers in opposite camps; letters were conveyed by beggars in hollow canes; bribes passed freely; and both sides complain equally of the violence used by the other. A story is told of Shenouda that he was on one occasion in the room where the bishops met, and wherein a throne was specially reserved, on which the Gospels were laid. Nestorius, coming to this room, and very probably not observing the significance of the book, removed it to take the reserved place. Shenouda sprang from his seat, and, picking up the Gospels, hurled them at Nestorius with bitter reviling. Surely an odd way of asserting the peculiar sanctity of the book! Nestorius asked who his discourteous assailant was, and, on being told, desired to know what he was doing in the synod, since he was no bishop, nor even an archimandrite, but only a monk.

‘I am he,’ replied the sturdy hermit, ‘whom God hath sent to unmask thy wickedness and proclaim thy punishment’; and immediately—so says the chronicle of the Bishop of Nikius—Nestorius fell down in a fit in the midst of the assembly. Other writers do not speak of this fit, but all agree that Cyril at once proceeded to invest Shenouda with the dignity of archimandrite, that he might be qualified to remain in the council-room.

Among the partisans of Cyril on this occasion was the Abbot Eutyches, who, twenty years later, was himself to be excommunicated for heresy. Another ascetic whose spiritual power Cyril enlisted on his side was Dalmatius, once a soldier in the guards, now a solitary who had not quitted his cell for forty-eight years. His fame was great in the dominions of the Byzantine Pope, and Cyril was not slow to perceive what an effect on the popular imagination a demonstration in his favour on the part of the holy recluse would produce. He had bribed half the Byzantine Court so lavishly as to strain seriously the finances of the Egyptian Church, and now he played his grand stroke. On receiving his earnest appeal Dalmatius called together the monks of all the monasteries of Constantinople, with their abbots at their head, and, himself leading the way, went forth in a vast procession, chanting as they went, and gathering the whole population after them, to demand an interview with the Emperor. The immense crowd surrounded the palace, the monks still chanting; but their abbots shortly came out from the presence of the Emperor—who had good reason to dread a monastic army loose in the streets—and told the monks to go down to the church of Mocius, and wait there. Through the streets again went the barefooted regiments, still with measured chant, and lighting tapers as the evening darkened. Eventually Dalmatius came to them, and, mounting the pulpit of the church, publicly announced that the Emperor had given a favourable answer.

Instructions were, in fact, sent to Ephesus, and Nestorius was thus deposed by command of the Emperor (October 431) and a man called Maximian elected in his stead. Nestorius was at first sent back to his monastery near Antioch; but four years later John, bishop of that place, entreated that he might be sent where his personal influence could do no harm, and he was banished to the Great Oasis in the Thebaid—a populous, and at that time a prosperous, Christian community.

During most of this summer all three bishops—Nestorius, Cyril, and Memnon—having been deposed by rival meetings of the Council, were considered as being under arrest, and guards slept at the doors of their chambers. After the Council had accepted the Imperial decision against Nestorius, Cyril and his bishops were allowed to return home, in October 431.

The controversy was by no means at an end, and for some years absorbed much of Cyril's attention. Nestorius had a strong party in the Byzantine Empire, which exists to this day. In his zeal against the heresy of Nestorius, Cyril went to the opposite extreme, and laid the foundation of what was called afterwards the Monophysite heresy.¹

The Nestorians emigrated in great numbers to Persia and the adjacent countries, where almost all the native Christians still hold this form of religion. In other respects they maintained the primitive customs of the Church, and especially condemned in synod the practice of compulsory clerical celibacy. Nestorius himself never again left Egypt. He suffered much in an invasion of the Blemmyes, who overran the Oasis, destroyed its property, and took Nestorius among others prisoner. Being released by them, he reported himself to the governor of the Thebaid, and was immediately re-arrested. It is said that he finally died from the effects of the ill-treatment he had received, but the year of his death is not known; it must have taken place between the years 439 and 451.

Cyril himself died in the year 444, having ruled Egypt nearly thirty years. He was succeeded by his archdeacon, Dioscorus, a man as able, as energetic, and more unscrupulous than himself. So much stands out clear; but with regard to the moral character of Dioscorus, we have a body of absolutely opposing evidence, according to the religious party of the critic.

¹ This is always denied or explained away by the Greek and Roman Churches, but there seems little doubt that at one time of his life Cyril held the same views for which Dioscorus was afterwards condemned, declaring at the time that his faith and that of his predecessor Cyril were one and the same. Cyril said, writing in defence of his reconciliation with John of Antioch, 'While conceiving of the elements which constitute the One Son and Lord we say that two natures are united; but after the union, since the separation into two is now removed, we believe that the nature of the Word is one, as of One made man and incarnate.'

CHAPTER XXIV

RIVAL POPES

A.D. 444
A.M. 160

AT the time of the accession of Dioscorus the relations between the three great ecclesiastical thrones of Alexandria,¹ Rome, and Byzantium were becoming yearly more strained. Pope Celestine had been succeeded in Rome by Leo the Great, a man bent on converting that 'primacy of honour' which had been accorded as a matter of courtesy, at the second General Council, to the Roman see, into a real supremacy over all the other Patriarchal sees. The Patriarch of Constantinople, though the Imperial see and second in rank of precedence according to the authority of the same General Council, had never been quite so powerful as the other two, and constantly appealed to one against the other. No Pope of Alexandria had ever been deposed by the joint action of Rome and Constantinople, and except Honorius (in the sixth, seventh, and eighth General Councils) no Roman Pope has ever been formally condemned for heresy; but several Patriarchs of Constantinople, including so celebrated a man as Chrysostom, had been deposed virtually, though not always openly, by the combined action of Rome and Alexandria, or by Alexandria alone. It is clear from Leo's letter to Dioscorus, in June 445, that he intended to take advantage of the fact that two comparatively unknown men had succeeded to the other Patriarchal sees to assume a right of interference; and it is easy to see that in the case of Dioscorus he entirely mistook his man.

¹ It is curious to observe that in the Egyptian manuscripts of this period Alexandria is still called by its ancient Egyptian name. Both Cyril and Dioscorus are called 'of Rakotis'—not 'of Alexandria.'

In trying to get at the truth about Dioscorus through the clouds of calumny which 'so soon surrounded him, we find one thing clear, which certainly tells in his favour—all the worst charges against him date from after the time when he was accused of heresy, and are much the same as those brought against Athanasius and other great men in like circumstances, which we dismiss as absolutely untrue. Dioscorus had never the same opportunity of publicly clearing himself from these imputations as Athanasius, but there is no good ground for supposing that he could not have done so. Canon Venables describes Dioscorus as a 'violent, rapacious, unscrupulous, and scandalously immoral man.' This, it is true, is the language habitually held about him by the writers of the Churches which condemned him, and from whom most English Churchmen have gathered their opinions; but it is not borne out by any real evidence so far as the rapacity and immorality are concerned. Violence unfortunately was a characteristic of all theological disputants in those days; and he was certainly unscrupulous where the honour and dignity of his own country, or what he believed to be the truth in matters of religion, was at stake.

The most probable explanation of all that has been said about him on the score of immorality is that he had been secretly married, and concealed the fact, lest it should stand in the way of his ambition. This may certainly be called immoral, but it implies no breach of the Seventh Commandment, nor was such ever proved against him. John of Nikius and all the other Egyptian historians speak of him with respect and affection. But a more important testimony in his favour is that of Theodoret of Cyrros, a man whom Dioscorus considered a heretic, and treated with violence and injustice accordingly, and who therefore cannot be accused of partiality for the Patriarch, though it may be suggested that he wished to propitiate him.

Theodoret, indeed, was one of the first men with whom Dioscorus quarrelled, accusing him of Nestorianism,¹ and treating Theodoret's own Patriarch (of Antioch) with but scant courtesy. It became evident both to Leo of Rome and Flavian of Constantinople that the new Pope of Alexandria was not inclined to abate the pretensions of his see in any way; and when by his espousal of the cause of Eutyches he gave them a handle against him, they were not slow to use it, though with not exactly the results they had hoped for.

Eutyches, an archimandrite of Constantinople, who had been one of the most zealous opponents of Nestorius, was accused in 448 of an opposite heresy. His prosecutor was Eusebius of Dorylæum, whose unprovoked attack upon an aged man who only asked to be left in peace in his cloister was very properly discouraged by Flavian. Eusebius, at a Council of bishops who were sitting in synod at Constantinople on November 8, presented a memorial against Eutyches, in which he characterised the poor old man as a 'frenzied blasphemer.' Flavian, after hearing the paper read, remarked that such an accusation against one so respected was simply astonishing. But Flavian, unlike the arrogant and overbearing Popes of Alexandria and Rome, had hardly firmness enough for his position. Against his better judgment and his personal recommendation, he yielded to the violence of Eusebius, and consented that Eutyches should be summoned before the Council, which was adjourned to the 12th. Eutyches did not appear, and the members of the Council busied themselves in declaring their own faith in the words of Flavian, carefully chosen to offend neither party: 'That Christ was perfect God and perfect man, consubstantial with the Father as to godhead, with Mary as to manhood; that from the two natures, united after the Incarnation in one Person, there resulted one Christ.' The only dissentient was Basil of Seleucia, who amended his conclusion as follows: 'I adore one Christ, acknowledged in two natures after the Incarnation.'

¹ How far this was from the truth may be seen from the following solemn declaration of Theodoret, which might have been written by the most pronounced Monophysite: 'Whoso denies the Holy Virgin to be Theotokos, or calls our Lord Jesus Christ mere man, or divides the one only begotten, the firstborn of every creature, into two Sons, may he be driven from all hope in Christ, and let all the people say Amen.' Dioscorus and his successors, if not Eutyches himself, would have expressed their faith in exactly the same words. Yet these men were ranged on opposite sides in the melancholy controversy which followed. In truth, the quarrel was not really a religious one, though it assumed that form, but a struggle for supremacy between Leo and Dioscorus.

Then the Council adjourned to the 15th, by which time the messengers who had been sent to summon Eutyches returned, saying that he could not come, since he had vowed long ago never to leave his monastery. He objected to Eusebius as his personal enemy. For his faith he confessed that he believed Christ to be perfect man, but not that His flesh was consubstantial with ours, nor could he speak of two natures after the union. A third summons at length dragged the old abbot from his cloister, and he was voluntarily attended by a crowd of officers, soldiers, and monks. By Imperial order a patrician was also sent to protect him.

Eutyches reiterated his assertion that he must abide by the authority of Cyril and Athanasius.¹ With them he acknowledged two natures in Christ before the union, but afterwards of one—perfect God and perfect man. He was, however, condemned, deposed, and excommunicated on the ground that it was heresy to speak of One nature after the union (or incarnation).

Eutyches appealed to the Popes both of Rome and Alexandria, and Dioscorus at once warmly espoused his cause. Before Leo of Rome could reply to the letter written to him by Eutyches, which was unaccountably delayed on the journey, he received information from the Emperor Theodosius II.—to whom Dioscorus had written—to say that the matter had been referred to a General Council, convened at Ephesus, over which he had appointed the Pope of Alexandria to preside.

This aroused the jealousy of the Roman Pope, and secured his lasting hostility to Dioscorus and his protégé Eutyches. He did indeed send legates to the Council and the doctrinal letter to Flavian which was afterwards known as the 'Tome of Leo,' but he did not go himself to Ephesus. Indeed, he afterwards stigmatised it as the Robbers' Council, in indignant condemnation of the methods employed by its promoters and the shocking violence of its scenes. It must be confessed, however, that others of the Councils of the Church have been accompanied by scenes of brutal violence, and this has not generally been held to invalidate their acts.

¹ The passage in Athanasius on which both Cyril and Eutyches relied has been rejected as spurious. Both these men, however, honestly believed that it was genuine.

In one of the Coptic manuscripts of the Vatican there is a description, purporting to be taken down from the mouth of Dioscorus in his exile, of the voyage to Ephesus. It is in the form of a panegyric on Macarius, one of the Egyptian ascetics of that day, who was afterwards made bishop of a place called Tkoon. The holy man, it appears, was found at Alexandria with a solitary attendant, proposing to walk the whole way to the Council of Ephesus. The two ships which had been chartered for the conveyance of Dioscorus and his bishops were just starting; and the Imperial officer who had been sent to escort the party gently represented to the old man the impossibility of his undertaking, but he refused to go with the Imperial officer. 'I did not come here for repose,' said the old man sturdily. 'I will walk the whole way on my own feet.' And on further entreaty he said: 'God bless thee, my son. I have no money, not so much as half a piece.' 'If that is the case,' said the Imperial officer, 'you cannot come in the ship with me, but you can go in the other with the Patriarch.' And when the old man heard that he was accounted worthy to go up with the man of God he rejoiced greatly, but took his seat modestly in the back of the vessel. Then Dioscorus came to bring him forward and to welcome him, but found that the old hermit could speak nothing except the dialect of his distant province, so had to call an interpreter. And when one of his deacons sneered at the old man, asking what they were to do with an ignorant creature who could not even speak to them, Dioscorus rebuked him sternly and made him ask the old man's forgiveness. But Macarius, not understanding why the deacon should fall at his feet and beg his pardon, hastened to raise him up and take all the blame to himself. 'In truth,' said Dioscorus, 'he shall have pardon from thee, or he shall be excommunicate.' Then Macarius said, 'God forgive thee thy sins, my son.'

The old man became an object of love and reverence to them all during the voyage, and Pinoution, his attendant, was eagerly questioned to know if his master could not work miracles, as it was reported that all these holy hermits could do. But Pinoution was disappointingly matter of fact, and the greatest wonder he could relate to them was the story of an expedition which Macarius had undertaken against a city and temple of the pagans because it was told him that they had stolen Christian children for sacrifice. He had started at once with but three men, whose courage failed them when they came in sight of the great temple with its propylon manned by the heathen with their swords and lances. They cried out forbidding the Christian priest to come farther, 'for what hast thou to do with us?'

'If I have nothing to do with you,' rejoined the undaunted Macarius, 'what had you to do with those Christian children whom you sacrificed to your idols?'

But they answered him and said, 'It is not true.'

'If it is not true,' answered Macarius, 'let me enter, that I may see your temple.'

And they said to him, 'Come.' But the two priests who had guided us were afraid; they would not enter. And as we entered, twenty men came at us to kill us; and we were only four. They said to us, 'This day your lives have come to an end ;' and they seized my Father (Macarius), and would have sacrificed him upon the altar.

Some, however, represented that the chief priest, whose name was Homer, must be called for the sacrifice, and there was a delay while he was sent for. 'And I,' said Pinouton, 'who was chained to my Father, said to him : "Will you not pray, my Father? For, behold! we are at the point of death." And he said, "Courage, my son; Christ will deliver us." And even as we spoke we heard the voice of Visa at the door.'

Visa, hearing that they were gone, had started to follow Macarius with eleven men. They broke open the door and rescued Macarius and his attendants, seized the chief priest Homer as he approached the temple, and burnt him alive with his gods. They destroyed every idol in the village, and struck such terror into the inhabitants that a great number of them received baptism !

The Alexandrian priests and bishops listened eagerly to these stories of very carnal warfare in those little-known districts of the south, and Macarius was more than ever a hero among them. Discussion of heresy was forgotten for the time, and the writer lingers reluctantly over the story of the peaceful voyage which bore them to a scene notorious to this day for its unseemly strife between the followers of Christ.

CHAPTER XXV

THE COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON

A.D. 449
A.M. 165

THE Council met in the church of St. Mary at Ephesus—the same which had witnessed the condemnation of Nestorius—on August 8, 449. Dioscorus presided, and though he caused that letter of Leo which his legates brought to be formally accepted by the Council, he made various excuses to prevent its being read aloud in the assembly. Most unfortunately, Theodosius had appointed a certain Syrian archimandrite named Barsumas to represent all the Eastern archimandrites in the Council. This man was, as all Eastern monks were fast becoming, an ignorant and bigoted fanatic, and was hotly prejudiced in favour of Eutyches. Barsumas came to the Council, not alone, but at the head of his monastic regiment—1,000 strong, it is stated. These encamped round the church, far outnumbering the Imperial guards, who were there presumably for the purpose of maintaining order.

At first the proceedings, though noisy, were fairly unanimous. Probably the only person who seriously desired the condemnation of Eutyches was his personal enemy, Eusebius. The Acts of the Council of Constantinople, which ended by condemning him, however, were read with acclamation and approval until they came to the amendment which Basil of Seleucia had appended on his own account to Flavian's statement of the faith: 'I adore one Christ, acknowledged in two natures after the Incarnation.'

On these words being read, a furious storm broke out in the meeting. It degenerated into a mere shouting match, in which Dioscorus and his party came off victors. Basil was understood to deny or take back the obnoxious words. Juvenal of Jerusalem asked him if his words had been correctly reported, and he answered that he did not recollect. Finally, Dioscorus put the question 'Did the Council condemn Eutyches or no?' The prelates, speaking one after another, declared in his favour, and he was absolved and reinstated.¹

If the matter had ended there, the heresy of Eutyches would probably have been speedily forgotten, and the whole after-course of events in Egypt would have been different. But Dioscorus, flushed with victory and ready to humiliate his rival, brought forward a sentence of deposition, not only against Eusebius, which would have been a serious mistake, but against Flavian himself, which struck horror and consternation into the whole assembly. The Roman legate shouted 'Contradicitur,' the Byzantine Patriarch simply remarked that he disclaimed the jurisdiction of the Council; but their protests were lost in the scene of uproar and confusion which followed.

Several of the bishops flung themselves at the feet of the president, imploring him to forbear. 'If he deserves rebuke,' cried one of them, 'rebuke him; but do not condemn a bishop for the sake of a presbyter.' Dioscorus rose from his throne, mounted a footstool, and by a gesture obtained a momentary hearing. 'Look you,' he cried, 'he that will not sign the sentence has to deal with me. If my tongue were to be cut out for it, I would say, "Depose Flavian." Are you making a sedition? Where are the Counts?'

¹ There seems no ground for supposing that the bishops acquitted Eutyches 'against their consciences.' The terrorism was exercised later, concerning Flavian, where everyone felt that Dioscorus was wholly and inexcusably in the wrong.

At this point in the proceedings those outside, hearing the uproar from within, could no longer be restrained. They burst madly into the church, a confused mob of soldiers, monks, and parabolani; and there ensued that scene of riot which ended in actual fighting and earned for the second Council of Ephesus its sad notoriety for evil conduct. The monks of Barsumas were the ring-leaders. Flavian was kicked, knocked down, and trampled on, while Barsumas himself called upon his followers to stab the helpless Patriarch. In terror of their lives, the assembled bishops agreed to everything required of them. They signed a blank paper, on which the sentence of deposition was afterwards to be written; the Roman legate only managed to escape from the church without doing so. Flavian died three days afterwards of the injuries he had received.

Dioscorus had triumphed, and returned to Egypt more powerful than ever, to Leo's bitter indignation. For a year the Pope of Alexandria reigned supreme in the East, while the Pope of Rome left no stone unturned in his efforts to crush his rival. He wrote to Theodosius, and declared that the Christian faith would be ruined unless the decision of the late Council were reversed. He wrote to Pulcheria, the sister of the Emperor, who was righteously indignant at the deposition of Flavian. He wrote to Flavian, who had passed away from the Church militant to the Church at rest, and he wrote to Constantinople exhorting the Church there to disregard the decisions of the Council. He appealed to his own Emperor, Valentinian, and entreated him to write to Theodosius on behalf of Flavian, and to desire that a General Council might be held in Italy.

Valentinian wrote accordingly, but without effect. Theodosius wrote back that he adhered to his hereditary faith, that he considered the recent Council orthodox, and that Flavian had only received his due. Moreover, while Valentinian had written of Leo as the supreme Pope, Theodosius in his answer speaks of him pointedly as 'the most reverend patriarch and archbishop.' This correspondence took place early in the year 450, but in the July of that year Theodosius died.

It is a disputed question whether it was before or after the death of Theodosius II. that Dioscorus took the bold step of excommunicating Leo himself—'for trying to reverse the decision of a legitimate Council.' It seems more likely that he should have done this at the height of his triumph, just after the Emperor had made it evident that he intended to support the Alexandrian Pope, who at least was one of his own subjects, against the Roman Pope, who had not even taken the trouble to come in person to the Council, and had angered Theodosius by his pretensions to jurisdiction in the Eastern Empire. But some historians think that Dioscorus took this step when the bishops assembled at Nicea in 451. Not more than ten bishops are said to have signed the sentence, which makes it more probable that it was issued in Egypt, just before the death of Theodosius changed the whole complexion of affairs.

Theodosius was succeeded by his sister Pulcheria, who at once chose a distinguished senator, Marcian, as her husband and colleague. Pulcheria had not only been attached to Flavian, but she saw more clearly than her brother the political aspect of the affair. Between the rival Popes she and her husband held an even course, not allowing any right of interference from the Western potentate, but aware that the growing power of the Egyptian Pope was the more immediate danger to the Eastern Empire, and threatened to lose them their most fertile province. Pulcheria herself took a real interest in the theological question, and both saw that an accusation of heresy was their surest weapon against the ascendancy of Dioscorus. They began by compelling Anatolius,¹ whom Dioscorus had consecrated in the room of Flavian, to subscribe the 'Tome of Leo,' and to anathematise both Eutyches and Nestorius in formal Council. Marcian also intimated to Leo that he was perfectly willing to grant another Council, and that Leo was welcome to preside, if he chose to come himself to the East; but that, if such a journey should be inconvenient to him, Marcian would take charge of the whole matter.

Leo at once wrote (April 451) to urge on Marcian that the question before the Council should be, not whether Eutyches were wrong in faith, or Dioscorus had 'decided perversely'—since these points were already settled—but simply on what conditions pardon should be granted to those bishops who had yielded to Dioscorus at the recent Council. Marcian, however, would not hear of the Council being held in Italy, nor would he admit that the doctrinal question was decided. He desired all the bishops at once to assemble for a General Council at Nicea. On this Leo decided not to attend, but appointed four legates to represent him in the Council. It is said by some that they 'presided' in his name, and this is true in so far that they sat above the other Popes and bishops as representing Leo, and were considered the ecclesiastical presidents. Marcian appointed nineteen of the highest civil dignitaries to preside in his name over the Council.

¹ Anatolius, before his consecration as Patriarch, had been the apocrisarius (commissary) of Dioscorus at Constantinople.

The Council, however, did not meet at Nicea, though over five hundred of the bishops assembled there before, at the Emperor's command, they were desired to proceed to Chalcedon, as being more convenient to himself. On October 8, therefore, the proceedings were opened in the church of St. Euphemia at that place.¹

The Roman legates began by demanding that Dioscorus should be told to withdraw from the Council. Being asked for a specific charge against him in support of their request, they at length said that he had 'presumed to hold a Council without leave of the Apostolic See.' The Imperial commissioners, however, did not take the same view, and Dioscorus was allowed to remain, though not in his usual place. The case for the prosecution was then opened by Eusebius of Dorylænum. Dioscorus answered with great self-command that the Council in question had been held by the Emperor's order, and asked that its Acts should be read. The arrival of Theodoret, however, caused such a tumult in the assembly that for some time no business could be proceeded with. As at Ephesus, the different parties lost all self-control and shouted bitter accusations against one another, without any attempt at argument or relevancy. The Council would probably have broken up in actual riot, like its predecessor, had it not been for the presence of the Imperial commissioners, who at length succeeded in restoring order, and gravely rebuked the assembly :—

¹ Evagrius gives a description of the church of St. Euphemia and its beautiful surroundings.

‘These outcries do not befit bishops, nor help either side. Allow everything to be done in due order. Let the Acts be read.’

The Acts were read accordingly, but the reading was constantly interrupted by violent outcries from either side. Dioscorus himself behaved well on this occasion. He refrained from joining in the unseemly clamour, and, when opportunity was given him, made a careful statement of his faith, disclaiming all notions of a ‘confusion or commixture’ of godhead or manhood in Christ.

He also said in self-defence : ‘The reason why Flavian was condemned was plainly this, that he asserted two natures after the Incarnation. I have passages from the Fathers Athanasius, Gregory, and Cyril,¹ to the effect that after the Incarnation there were not two natures, but one incarnate nature of the Word. If I am to be expelled, the Fathers will be expelled with me. I am defending their doctrine ; I do not deviate from them at all. I have not got these extracts carelessly ; I have verified them.’

The Roman legates complained of the freedom of speech which Dioscorus was permitted, and asked if Flavian had been so treated at Ephesus.

¹ Both parties agreed in appealing to Cyril, whereas the fact was that Cyril, like the New Testament, could be quoted on either side.

‘No,’ answered the president, ‘but this synod is being conducted according to the principles of justice.’

Evidence was then given as to the violence of Dioscorus at Ephesus. On this ground the commissioners proposed his deposition and that of five other bishops, including Juvenal of Jerusalem, who had conspicuously disgraced themselves by their behaviour at that Council. Shouts of applause greeted this proposition, but no formal voting was then taken. The ‘Tome of Leo’ was received by most of the assembled bishops with acclamation. Doubts were expressed, however, by some of them whether the statement of duality in Christ were not carried too far. One of them, Atticus of Nicopolis, requested more time for consideration of the Tome, and also objected to the suppression of Cyril’s third letter to Nestorius. The commissioners therefore adjourned the Council, and appointed it to meet again in five days.

The Roman party, however, persuaded the Council to meet again in three days, in order that they might be free from the interference of the Imperial commissioners. As these were not present, Dioscorus refused to attend also, not acknowledging the legality of the meeting, and declaring that he had nothing more to say. In his absence, and unrestrained by the representatives of the law, every sort of reckless accusation was brought against Dioscorus, as in earlier days against Athanasius, and readily accepted by the Roman legates. By an overwhelming majority the deposition and excommunication of Dioscorus were carried. A formal notification was sent to him, to those of his Church with him at Chalcedon, to Marcian, to Pulcheria, to Valentinian, and to the dioceses of Constantinople and Chalcedon.

On October 17 the Council met again in full session, and in the course of its proceedings the Imperial commissioners complained that the deposition of the Egyptian Pope had been carried out in their absence and without the knowledge of the Emperor. The deposition of Dioscorus, though permitted to take effect, since it had been suggested in Session I. by the Imperial commissioners, was never formally sanctioned by the Council in full session. The five bishops whom the Court had proposed to include in the sentence were forgiven on condition that they should subscribe the 'Tome of Leo,' and were permitted to resume their places.

Thirteen Egyptian bishops were then summoned to the Council, and ordered to anathematise Eutyches and to subscribe the 'Tome of Leo.' With great reluctance they consented to the former; the latter, though with almost abject expressions of respect for the Council, they refused to do except by order of their own Pope. They declared that if they were to be guilty of such disloyalty to him they would certainly be murdered by the indignant Egyptians on their return to their own country. The Imperial commissioners interfered to protect them, and ordered that they should remain in Constantinople, and should not be required to subscribe anything until a new Patriarch of Alexandria had been elected.

The subsequent proceedings of the Council are well known, and do not need to be recapitulated, as the Egyptians, with whom we have to do, took no part in them.

By his overweening arrogance and violence Dioscorus had certainly brought his fate upon himself; but he submitted with a certain dignity, worthy of a dethroned sovereign. He made no attempt to return to his own country, and lived quietly at Gangra, to which place he was banished. But the people of Egypt did not submit so easily, and the Church of Egypt to this day refuses to accept the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE VALUE OF A GREEK PREPOSITION

A.D. 451
A.M. 167

WHEN the news that their Pope had been deposed and excommunicated reached Egypt, the indignation of the nation knew no bounds. With one voice the inhabitants refused to acknowledge the decision of the Council. If their Pope was excommunicate, they were content to remain excommunicate with him ; what he declared to be the true faith, that was enough for them, whatever a Byzantine Emperor or Roman Pope might decree. To them it was a question of national freedom, and the doctrinal question a mere difference of expression, except in so far as the formula which their own Pope had sanctioned became to them a national watchword. The line between the Byzantine residents in Egypt and the native Egyptians became more sharply marked than ever. Those who were proud of their pure Greek descent sided with the Byzantine Church, but the vast majority were still Egyptian in feeling as well as in blood. It became a point of honour, as a true patriot, to reject the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon.

The return of the four bishops who had been charged with the Imperial mandate for the election of a new Patriarch was the signal for a general outbreak. Dioscorus was their Patriarch, their ruler ; so long as he lived they would acknowledge no other. Still, there was a powerful Greek element in the Church, more particularly in Alexandria, and at length a candidate was agreed upon among the bishops whom it was hoped might be acceptable to all parties. This was Proterius, Archpriest of Alexandria, who had been appointed by Dioscorus himself to take charge of the Church in his absence, but who professed himself ready to accept the decision of the Council of Chalcedon and—on the further demand being made upon him by the Roman Pope¹—the ‘Tome of Leo.’

On the consent of the Egyptian bishops to consecrate Proterius the indignation of the people knew no bounds, and showed itself in a popular insurrection. In their eyes Proterius was a traitor, false alike to his country and his Church. The soldiers were called out to subdue the rising, but were fairly defeated, and driven to take refuge in the precincts of the deserted and ruinous Serapeum. In the tumult the place caught fire or was fired, and the unhappy soldiers were burnt to death.

¹ That Pope was by no means entirely satisfied with the results of the Council of Chalcedon. He had succeeded in crushing his most formidable rival, it was true, but neither the Emperor nor the Council had yielded the claim which he had most at heart—the supremacy of the Roman Pope over all the Churches. So far from this, they had even, in spite of the protest of his legates, enacted a canon (28th) especially intended to safeguard the Eastern Church against such unfounded claims. Leo was not satisfied, either, with the wording of the decree which deposed Dioscorus, and although his legates had been permitted to prefix to it the words ‘The archbishop of the great and elder Rome, through us and through the holy synod now present,’ he changed this, before issuing it to his own bishops, into a form which spoke of himself as the ‘head of the universal Church,’ condemning Dioscorus ‘by us his vicars with the consent of the synod.’ Nor did he find either of the new Patriarchs—Anatolius of Constantinople or Proterius of Alexandria—so amenable as he had hoped. Indeed, the latter, on Leo’s questioning the accuracy of his decision, soon after his accession, about the time of Easter, gave the Roman Pope clearly to understand that the Paschal cycle of the Egyptian Church, ‘the mother of such laborious investigations,’ was unquestionably accurate, and that Egypt and the East would keep Easter in conformity with it in the coming year (455).

Florus, the Byzantine prefect and commander-in-chief, took prompt measures of reprisal. He stopped the public dole of bread and closed the baths and all public exhibitions, besides sending for reinforcements to Constantinople. The Emperor at once despatched 2,000 men, who made the passage in six days. But they were new recruits for the most part, and by their insubordination and licentious conduct they only intensified the evils they had come to suppress. Florus and the people were compelled to come to terms with each other. A mass meeting was held in the hippodrome, at which Florus promised to cancel his restrictive measures, and an outward show of peace was restored. But the Egyptians would never recognise 'the Emperor's bishop,' as he was called; nor did Proterius ever consider himself safe without a military guard. The clergy also were for the most part in opposition to the intruded Patriarch, and only fourteen of the bishops stood by him. One of the priestly circle even in Alexandria, where his adherents were most numerous, refused to communicate with Proterius, on the ground that he omitted the name of Dioscorus from the diptychs and commemorated the Council of Chalcedon. This man was Timothy, afterwards nicknamed Ælurus.¹ He was excommunicated, together with his deacon Peter (Mongus), and banished to Libya with four or five bishops and some Alexandrian monks who refused to acknowledge the new Patriarch while Dioscorus was yet alive.

In 454 Dioscorus died, but the Egyptians, though still refusing to acknowledge Proterius, did not venture to elect his successor till three years later, when the Emperor Marcian died also. On the news of this, Timothy Ælurus returned to Alexandria, and was consecrated by those bishops who had consistently refused to acknowledge Proterius. It is stated that Timothy played the ghost at night outside the cells of monks, and resorted to unworthy stratagems in order to secure his own election; also that he was irregularly consecrated. The first statement is probably true; the second is equally true both of Proterius and Timothy, since in neither case were the conditions required by the Egyptian Church for the election and consecration of their Patriarch fulfilled. The duke or Imperial officer of the province was absent from Alexandria at the time, but on his return he unwisely took upon himself to expel Timothy from Alexandria. This was the signal for a fresh popular outbreak, which directed itself against the unfortunate Proterius. A frantic mob rushed to his house, but he succeeded in escaping into the neighbouring church of Quirinus. For some time they surged and howled round the church, waiting for him to appear; then their fury could restrain itself no longer, and they poured into the sacred building. Proterius and some of his clergy retreated inside the narthex or baptistery, but they were instantly pursued and slain. Six of the priests lost their lives in defending him. Then the mob dragged the body with wild cries through the town, where it suffered terrible indignities from the frantic populace, and was finally burnt—the third of those fanatical murders which disgrace the record of Alexandria: George the Arian, Hypatia the pagan, and now Proterius the Greek.

¹ I.e. the cat. The origin of this nickname is matter of conjecture.

Timothy was absent from the city at the time, and had nothing to do with this shocking murder, but, like his far greater predecessor Cyril and for the same reasons, he was powerless to punish the murderers. On his return he visited his displeasure on those of the clergy and bishops who had given their adherence to Proterius; formally declared that the Egyptian Church renounced communion with those of Rome, Constantinople, and Antioch; and did all he could to widen the schism instead of healing it.

The fourteen bishops who now found themselves in their turn deposed and excommunicated presented petitions to the Emperor and the Patriarch of Constantinople. Timothy also sent a petition on his side by a deputation of bishops and clergy, of which only a fragment remains, so that the only contemporaneous accounts we have of these proceedings are all written by the Chalcedonians, as the adherents of this Council and Proterius were called in Egypt.¹

The new Emperor, Leo, puzzled by the conflicting appeals which reached him from Alexandria, from the Pope of Rome, from his own Patriarch, and from a strong party in Constantinople who objected to the Chalcedonian decrees, wrote to all the Metropolitans throughout the world, commanding them to assemble their provincial Councils and send him their synodical opinion whether the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon must be upheld, and whether the election of Timothy Ælurus was to be accepted. Only two bishops (according to John of Nikius) ventured to stand up for Timothy, or to advise against the acceptance of the Council of Chalcedon. Some of the bishops guarded themselves, in the case of Timothy, by stating that his election was only to be considered null and void, 'if the statements of his enemies were true;' but most indulged in unmeasured abuse of the Alexandrian Pope.

¹ John of Nikius, who lived in the seventh century, says that Timothy's life had been spent piously as a monk in the convent of Kalamoun (in the Fayoum) until he was made one of the presbyters of Alexandria, and then, after the death of Dioscorus, his successor. He invariably speaks of Timothy with great respect, and regards him as contending for the true faith against the Chalcedonians, 'who troubled the whole world.'

The Emperor, however, seems to have thought it his best policy to let the Egyptians alone; and the whole controversy would probably have died a natural death, if the persistent intrigues of the Roman Pope had not at length persuaded the Emperor, in 460, to send orders to Stilas, the military commander at Alexandria, to expel Timothy from Alexandria and preside over the election of an orthodox Patriarch.

Timothy, who appears to have thought that 'Paris was well worth a mass,' and who evidently considered the point in question important only from a political and not a religious standpoint,¹ professed himself ready to give in his adherence to the Council of Chalcedon if desired; but Pope Leo prevailed with the Emperor Leo not to accept his submission, and Timothy Ælurus was accordingly banished to Gangra and afterwards to the Chersonese.

Another Timothy was consecrated in his place, who is distinguished by the surnames of Surus or Salofaciolus. This man, unlike his namesake, was evidently a Christian first and a patriot afterwards, and the beauty of his character won for him the respect and admiration of all parties. For sixteen years he ruled Egypt in peace, showing kindness and justice to all parties alike ; and, to his honour be it spoken, at the risk of offending both the Leos, he reinserted the name of Dioscorus in the Church diptychs—an act the significance of which can hardly be appreciated except by one familiar with all the ecclesiastical struggles of this unhappy fifth century.

¹ This is evident from the fact that at a time when his party was triumphant he spoke in the same strain to a body of Eutyochian monks who were anxious to obtain his sanction for their extreme views; telling them that, like Dioscorus, he stood by the faith of Cyril, and believed our Saviour to be consubstantial according to the flesh.

Even those extreme partisans who refused to acknowledge ‘ the Emperor’s bishop ’ greeted him with plaudits in the streets, saying, ‘ Even if we do not communicate with thee, yet we love thee ; ’ and he showed his real wisdom by politely but consistently disregarding all recommendations on the part of the Emperor to greater strictness with heretics. Perhaps it might have been more difficult for him to preserve peace and charity in his kingdom if the Roman Pope, Leo, had not died almost immediately after writing to congratulate Timothy Surus on his election. He was succeeded by Hilary, who had enough to do in his own dominions, without carrying out that policy of systematic interference with the concerns of the Eastern Patriarchates which detracts from the otherwise deservedly great reputation of Leo I.

In 471 the Patriarch of Constantinople died, and was succeeded by Acacius ; and in 474 the Emperor died, and was succeeded by Zeno, who, however, the next year fled for his life from Basiliscus, who assumed the purple.

Basiliscus was known to favour the Eutychian party, and an embassy from Alexandria was at once sent to beg that their rightful Patriarch, Timothy Ælurus, should be restored to them. To this the usurping Emperor at once consented, and with the true Christianity which shines out in every action of the other Timothy’s life he at once retired to his monastery near Canopus. Timothy Ælurus therefore returned in peace ; but, instead of learning from the example of his namesake, his first proceeding was to persuade the Emperor to issue a circular letter condemning the Council of Chalcedon, and to require its subscription by all Patriarchs and bishops. Acacius of Constantinople refused, whereupon a Council was held at Ephesus in 477, at which Acacius was (nominally) deposed. Timothy Ælurus's triumph, however, did not last long. In 477 Zeno regained possession of his throne, and only the Christian forbearance of one Timothy and the extreme old age of the other saved the latter from a fresh banishment. In fact, Timothy Ælurus died in the same year. Timothy Salofaciolus,¹ hearing that the extreme party intended to oppose his return to Alexandria, thought it better to remain in his monastery ; and Peter Mongus, who had been the constant friend and companion of Timothy Ælurus, was chosen Patriarch in his place. There are the same conflicting statements by the different parties about the manner of his election ; and it seems clear that the majority of the bishops took no part in it, though, on the other hand, there seems no reason to believe, as Neale does, that only one bishop was present at the ceremony.² Most of them probably feared the Emperor, who had intended himself to nominate the Egyptian Patriarch, though such a proceeding was against all the laws and customs of that Church. Their fears were justified ; for as soon as Zeno heard of the consecration, he issued a decree for Peter's banishment. Peter, however, does not appear to have left the country, but to have remained concealed in Alexandria during the five following years of peace which Egypt enjoyed under the gentle Timothy Salofaciolus.

¹ From a Coptic and Latin word meaning 'wearer of white head-gear.'

² The number of Egyptian bishops who accepted the Council of Chalcedon, and constituted the hierarchy of the future Byzantine Church in Egypt, was only fourteen. The total number of Egyptian bishops at that time was over 100.

It was the great desire of Timothy, and of all good Egyptian Christians and patriots, that some arrangement should be come to on his death which might put an end to the scandal of rival Popes or Patriarchs existing at the same time in Egypt. A special embassy was therefore sent to the Emperor from Alexandria, entreating that the election of the next Patriarch might be left, as from time immemorial, to the Egyptians themselves, and undertaking, on their part, that the man chosen should accept the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon. The man at the head of this embassy was John Talaia (probably so-called from a village of that name in Egypt), who had been the constant companion of Timothy Salofaciolus, and was also a great friend of Illus, a Byzantine official. This last connection, however, on which the Alexandrians doubtless relied, was in fact a disadvantage to him, for Illus had already fallen under suspicion at the Court, though he was not publicly disgraced till later. According to contemporary historians, the Emperor had good reason to believe that John himself hoped to be chosen Patriarch of Alexandria, and did not consider him a safe man for such a position. He therefore granted the petition of the Alexandrians, but first made John take an oath that he would never himself aspire to the see of Alexandria. This oath John broke, and thus the chance of a peaceful solution to the difficulties of the Church on the death of Timothy Salofaciolus in 482 was lost. John Talaia was chosen Patriarch and accepted the nomination. This in itself was sufficient to exasperate the Emperor, and John's next proceeding rendered a breach inevitable. He wrote the usual synodical letters to the chief bishops of Christendom to announce his succession ; but while his letter to Pope Simplicius of Rome was sent direct, the letters for the Emperor and for Acacius of Constantinople were sent under cover to his friend Illus, with (it is suggested) bribes to be employed in securing his purpose. But Illus, already in disgrace, was at Antioch ; therefore the version which reached the Emperor was that John had not only seized upon the Patriarchal throne in defiance of his oath, but that he had written to put himself under the protection of the Pope of Rome, and had not even paid his sovereign or the Patriarch of Constantinople the ordinary compliment of writing to them. Not unnaturally indignant, Zeno wrote to Simplicius to warn him that John would not be recognised as Patriarch of Alexandria, and that it was proposed to make peace by accepting Peter Mongus, whom the Egyptian party desired, on his giving satisfactory assurances of orthodoxy. Simplicius wrote back much in the style of Pope Leo, assuming a right of interference, and saying that, though he was ready to suspend his judgment about John, he could not possibly accept Peter.

This only irritated Zeno and Acacius still further, and the Emperor immediately sent orders to Alexandria that Peter Mongus should be enthroned, on condition that he subscribed a document sent for that purpose by Pergamus, the new Procurator of Egypt. This celebrated document was in the form of a letter addressed by the Emperor, with the sanction of the Byzantine Patriarch—by whom, indeed, some say it was dictated—‘to the most reverend bishops and clergy, and to the monks and laity throughout Alexandria, Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis.’ It is called the Henoticon, or instrument of Union, and was carefully drawn up to reconcile all parties of the Church. It would probably have succeeded in doing so, had it not been for the strenuous opposition of Simplicius and his successor, who objected to the fact that it ignored the Council of Chalcedon. These Popes succeeded, not only in perpetuating the schism at Alexandria, but in creating another, between East and West, which lasted for nearly forty years. The character of Peter Mongus also, who readily accepted the Henoticon and read it publicly in church, did not help the cause of true Christianity. Making all allowance for the bitter calumnies of his party opponents, and putting aside as without good evidence all the worst charges against him, it seems clear that he was an able and unscrupulous man, who was chiefly bent on retaining his throne. Though not himself exaggerating the point at issue, and therefore being justified in his readiness to agree with everybody, the inexcusable action clearly proved against him is that, holding such opinions, he did certainly oppress and exile some of the Egyptian bishops and monks who held to the Chalcedonian faith, as it was called in Egypt, in order to force upon their acceptance the Emperor’s Henoticon. John Talaia never returned to Egypt, though he made an attempt to appeal to Zeno’s successor, Anastasius, whom he had known in Egypt. Fortunately for the peace of Egypt, Anastasius would not listen to him, but exerted his influence to get him made Bishop of Nola, in Campania, where he lived quietly for many years.

Peter Mongus only occupied the Patriarchal throne eight years, and died in October 490. Acacius had died in 489, Zeno died in April 491, and Felix of Rome, who had broken off all communion with the Eastern Churches, in February 492. Thus the way was left clear for a new century to begin, under happier auspices, by the death of all those who had taken part in the last and saddest of the many sad controversies which disgraced the record of the Church in the fifth century, and left her no longer one. Perhaps the best comment on the point of doctrine, which was made the excuse for so much political strife and jealousy, is that written by Evagrius, himself an orthodox member of the Byzantine Church, who regards the controversy as a suggestion of the devil to sow discord in the Christian Church, and says of the difference between $\epsilon\upsilon$ and $\epsilon\kappa$ (in or of two natures):—

Such was the device of the envious and God-hating demon in the change of a single letter, that, while in reality the one expression was completely inductive of the notion of the other, still with the generality the discrepancy between them was held to be considerable, and the ideas conveyed by them to be clearly in diametric opposition, and exclusive of each other; whereas he who confesses Christ in two natures clearly affirms Him to be from two, inasmuch as by confessing Christ at once in godhead and manhood he asserts His consistence from godhead and manhood; and, on the other hand, the position of one who affirms His origin from two natures is completely inclusive of His existence in two, inasmuch as he who affirms Christ to be from godhead and manhood, confesses His existence in godhead and manhood, since there is no conversion of the flesh into godhead, nor a transition of the godhead into flesh, from which substances arise the ineffable union. So that in this case by the expression, 'from two natures,' is aptly suggested the thought of the expression 'in two,' and conversely ; nor can there be a severance of the terms, this being an instance where a representation of the whole is afforded, not merely by its origin from component parts, but, as a further and distinct means, by its existence in them. Yet, nevertheless, persons have so taken up the idea of the marked distinction of the terms, either from a habit of thought respecting the glory of God, or by the inclination forestalling the judgment, as to be reckless of death in any shape, rather than acknowledge the real state of the case ; and hence arose the occurrences which I have described. -

From that time to this the Byzantine—or, as we now call it, the Greek—Church has occupied much the same position in Egypt as the Church of Rome did in the last century, if not to this day, in England. It was an alien Church, less divided by doctrine from the National Church, but with the far deeper gulf between them of different nationality and different hopes. The Greek Patriarchs or Alexandria were at first imposed on that Church in Egypt by the arbitrary nomination of the Emperor ; if left to themselves, the Egyptians generally abstained from electing one at all, as for sixty years between 482–589, and for more than seventy years after the Moslem conquest. The numerical strength of this Church at the present time in Egypt is about 6,000 ; whereas the National Church still numbers about a tenth of the whole population among her adherents.

CHAPTER XXVII

A REIGN OF PEACE

A.D. 491 THE new Emperor, Anastasius, who succeeded Zeno and
 A.M. 201 married his widow Ariadne, was well acquainted with Egypt, where indeed he had been exiled by the late Emperor. He had lived in the district of Menouf,¹ where he made many friends. On one occasion some of the principal inhabitants of the towns of Menouf and Hezena² proposed to Anastasius that it might help his cause to make a pilgrimage to a certain hermit, Jeremiah, who lived in the district and was widely revered. Accordingly a deputation went with Anastasius to implore the blessing and prayers of the holy man. Father Jeremiah listened to all they said, and blessed them in departing; but he spoke no special word to Anastasius; and after they had left the presence of the hermit, his friends found Anastasius greatly concerned at this slight, and full of forebodings that the man of God, seeing into his heart, had deemed him unworthy to receive a blessing. His Egyptian friends endeavoured to console him; and some of them, turning back, went again to Father Jeremiah, and told him that Anastasius, for whom they had specially desired his favour, was very unhappy. Father Jeremiah desired them to recall Anastasius to his presence, and taking him aside with Amonius of Hezena, and one or two of those who were in his confidence, declared that the only reason why he had abstained from giving Anastasius an old man's blessing was because he had seen in a vision the hand of God laid in blessing upon the head of Anastasius. 'God Himself,' added the hermit solemnly, 'has chosen thee from among millions to be His anointed. Thou shalt be His lieutenant upon earth, for the protection of His people. Only, when my prophecy is realised and my words come back to thee, do thou fulfil also the command that I lay upon thee this day: Commit no sin; undertake nothing against the religion of Jesus Christ; and acknowledge not the faith of Chalcedon, which offends God.'

¹ Professor Amelineau inclines to think that by Menouf is here signified Memphis. But the narrative in John of Nikius would fit better with the present town of Menouf.

² This name has not been identified.

Afterwards, when Anastasius became emperor, he sent to beg that some of the disciples of Father Jeremiah would come and visit him. Among those who accepted the invitation was Father Varydnos, who was a relation of Father Jeremiah; but, much to the disappointment of the Emperor, they came under a prohibition from their Superior to accept anything, except some incense and any sacred offering the Emperor chose to make for the Church. However, Anastasius built in the place of his exile a magnificent church, where formerly had been but a small one, dedicated to Saint Irai.¹ He sent also the sacred vessels for it of gold and silver, and precious stuffs for the service of the church. He sent large presents to his Egyptian friends, and made some of them magistrates. He also, according to John of Nikius, built many other things for the good of Egypt; among them, a citadel on the shore of the Red Sea. He restored the celebrated lighthouse at Alexandria, which was almost in ruins.

¹ A female saint (Iras).

Indeed, no Byzantine emperor had ever been so popular in Egypt, and they were equally happy in their new Patriarch, who bore the honoured name of Athanasius, and had been unanimously elected in the orthodox manner on the death of Peter Mongus. Both the Emperor and the Egyptian Patriarch did their best to restore peace and charity to the distracted East. Anastasius desired that the whole controversy should be buried in oblivion, and that in each diocese the people should use what formulæ their bishop approved, so long as those bishops refrained from condemning and persecuting those who did not agree with them. Evagrius says that: 'In consideration of these circumstances' (the perpetual differences among the bishops, and their refusals to admit one another to communion) 'the Emperor Anastasius removed those bishops who were promoters of change wherever he detected any one either proclaiming or anathematising the synod of Chalcedon in opposition to the practice of the neighbourhood. Only the Popes of Rome remained stubbornly intolerant, and refused to re-enter communion with the Churches of the East on any other terms than the explicit acknowledgment of the decisions of Chalcedon, and the anathematising of Nestorius, Eutyches, Dioscorus, Peter Mongus, and Acacius, equally by name. The other four great sees—Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Jerusalem—were now in communion with each other, though not with Rome.

Even the pagans of Alexandria shared the blessings of the new reign of peace. Hierocles, who earlier in the century had been oppressed and publicly scourged in Constantinople—it is said, on account of his opinions—now lived the rest of his days in peace in his native city. He was one of those philosophers who strove to reconcile the old and the new, to read the higher meanings once more into the old Egyptian beliefs, and to reconcile them with the teaching of the new morality. Some of his writings still remain to us, and are worth studying. The other writers in Egypt at this time are of little importance. Some have thought that Aetius, a celebrated Egyptian physician,¹ flourished at this time, but the latest authorities put him a whole century earlier. The record of his adventurous life—whether as pagan, Christian, or heretic—is not very creditable; but he has left a lengthy work which gives an interesting account of the state of Egyptian medical science in his time. Aetius is a great believer in the virtue of Nile water, and not wholly sceptical about the merits of a green jasper set in a ring.

Athanasius only held the Patriarchate seven years, but his successor John (Hemula) was a man of the same charity and wisdom, and the country continued in peace. In other parts of the empire there were disturbances and trouble; the Emperor himself was mobbed in Constantinople at one time, and only quieted the populace by a threat of immediate abdication—but, for the greater part of the reign of Anastasius, Egypt was free from war or tumult. There was, indeed, a curious outbreak of disease, which is described as a madness seizing upon people of all ages and sex, causing them to run about barking like dogs, and to lose the use of human speech. Whether this was due to hydrophobia—a disease supposed to be unknown till lately in Egypt—or some curious form of contagious hysteria, cannot now be determined.

¹ Aetius was born at Antioch, but lived mostly at Alexandria. He was an extreme Arian.

To John succeeded another John, called, from his birth-place, John Nikiota (of Nikius). He had lived a hermit's life for some years in or near the monastery of El Far, which was in the district of Belbeis. In his Patriarchate began the interchange of synodical letters between Alexandria and Antioch which has lasted till the present day. The Patriarch of Antioch was Severus, whose name is held in high honour by all the Monophysites, as those who rejected the Council of Chalcedon were called. Severus had lived in Alexandria before he was appointed by Anastasius to Antioch. The Emperor must afterwards have bitterly regretted this, as Severus proved himself one of those to whom toleration was impossible, and persecuted those who would not accept the Henoticon.

In Abyssinia also the Church remained faithful to Egypt, rejecting with her the Council of Chalcedon and the intruding Patriarchs which the Byzantine emperors endeavoured to force upon her. The Metropolitan of Abyssinia always came for consecration to the Egyptian Patriarch, and refused to acknowledge any other.

About 501 Egypt suffered from an invasion of Persian troops, who overran the Delta up to the very walls of Alexandria. The Byzantine troops defeated them in several battles, and finally drove them out of the country, but meanwhile the whole harvest of the year had been destroyed and the people suffered greatly from famine. A Christian Jew of Alexandria began a public distribution of food to the starving poor of Alexandria, but on Easter Sunday the press of the multitude round the appointed church to receive his alms was so great that it is said no less than three hundred persons were squeezed to death in the crowd.

Egypt furnished in this reign one of the poets whose epigrams are contained in the fifth book of the Greek Anthology, published soon after at Constantinople. His name was Christodorus, and he was a native of Thebes. The scribes were still hard at work on their labour of copying and illuminating the manuscripts for which all the world still sent to Egypt. A copy of the work of Dioscorides on plants, which is still preserved in the library at Vienna, was made for one of the Byzantine princesses in this reign, and is beautifully illustrated. In the same library there is a copy of the Book of Genesis, written in Egypt about this date, which has no less than eighty-eight small paintings of historical subjects.

When John Nikiota died, the Emperor desired Dioscorus, a cousin of Timothy Ælurus, to be elected. But though Dioscorus himself was acceptable to the people, they bitterly resented the attempt of the Emperor to dictate to them in the matter of their Patriarch, and the popular feeling ran so high that Dioscorus pacified them by disregarding the Emperor's nomination and submitting himself to be properly elected—or rejected—by the canonical authorities. They were too wise not to accept him at once, and all the canonical ceremonies were duly complied with in the church of St. Mark, after which he went in solemn procession through the streets, and celebrated the Holy Communion in the church of St. John. But the baser sort of the Alexandrians, having been once roused, were not so easily quieted, and the rioting went on fitfully the whole day, till by an unhappy chance Theodosius, the son of a Byzantine official of high rank, was killed. The murderer was promptly punished by the Alexandrian authorities; but when the day's proceedings came to the Emperor's ears he was so much offended that, fearing what might follow, the Alexandrians entreated their new Patriarch to go and plead for them at Constantinople. This he did, and succeeded in gaining a free pardon for the city. It is honourably recorded of him that, though the Chalcedonian party of Byzantium insulted him in the streets, he behaved with perfect good-temper all through his visit, and abstained from saying anything which could raise fresh troubles.

Unfortunately he died very soon after the Emperor Anastasius, just when his wisdom and charity were most wanted in his own city. For Justin, who succeeded Anastasius, was an illiterate soldier of Slav origin, and by no means inclined to follow the wise and tolerant policy of Anastasius. He was himself a supporter of the Council of Chalcedon, and as Severus was the most zealous of the Patriarchs against it, he gave orders for his arrest, also, as some say, that his tongue should be cut out. Severus escaped to Alexandria, where he did a great deal of harm in stirring up religious strife, and would have done more if it had not been that Timothy III., the successor of Dioscorus II., refused to break off communion with either party in the Church, though his personal convictions were, like those of Severus, against the Council of Chalcedon.

On the whole, however, Egypt remained at peace through the short reign of Justin I. and until Justinian, having spent the first few years of his reign in establishing his kingdom in the West as well as in the East, and in the negotiations which led to the reconciliation of the Greek and Roman Churches, turned his attention to the Egyptian heretics, for he was a firm supporter of the Council of Chalcedon. He sent a peremptory summons to the Patriarch of Egypt to appear before him, and Timothy was preparing to obey when he fell ill and died.

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE BEGINNING OF THE END

JUSTINIAN came to the throne in 527, but, so far as can be ascertained, he did not concern himself much with Egyptian affairs for some years. Though he himself supported the Council of Chalcedon, his wife Theodora held the Egyptian form of belief, so that he was not inclined to push matters to extremity on either hand. The only exception to the continued peace in Egypt during the reign of Timothy III. is one concerning which all the writers who speak of it are hopelessly at variance. It seems clear that on one occasion Justinian did send a man named Apollinaris with troops to enforce compliance, on the part of the Egyptians, to the Imperial faith, which occasioned much blood-shedding and had no effect at all in securing the adherence of the Egyptians. It is also clear that in the year 550 he appointed a Patriarch of Alexandria named Apollinaris. But whether these two were the same, whether the scandalous scenes which are reported by all as having taken place on the entry of Apollinaris refer to the events of Timothy's Patriarchate or to the year 550, or whether they refer to a prefect and not at all to a Patriarch of that name, it seems impossible now to decide. John of Nikius, in the extremely imperfect translation in which we possess his chronicle, cannot be quoted as an authority on disputed points, but in this case there is one strong reason for accepting his version of the affair—that it is entirely against his own prejudices. He was a strong Monophysite partisan, and if the disgraceful scenes which are described really took place on the entry of an Imperial and Chalcedonian Patriarch he would have been only too ready to say so. Instead of this, he speaks of the affair as a purely military attempt on the part of the Emperor to enforce the decrees of Chalcedon on Alexandria, and says that the Patriarch Timothy sent a deputation of monks and hermits to entreat Justinian to rescind the order for a general massacre, and to permit his subjects to live peaceably in the faith of their fathers. The deputation, through the intercession of the Empress Theodora, was successful, and Justinian sent an order to his army to withdraw from Alexandria into the North African provinces. Later on, John of Nikius speaks of the Patriarch Apollinaris, Chalcedonian and Imperialist though he was, as a man gentle and pious, living in harmony with both parties, and says that he had been a reader in the convent of Salama at Alexandria.

It seems probable, therefore, that no attempt was made by Justinian to intrude a Byzantine Patriarch on the Egyptians till after the death of Timothy; and we have some grounds for supposing that he might have refrained even then, had the Egyptians been able to agree among themselves. But, on the death of Timothy, a fresh schism broke out in the Church between two parties, of which the one asserted that the body of Jesus was consubstantial with us according to the flesh, and therefore, like ours, corruptible; the other that it was incorruptible—an appearance, as some said, and not a reality. The bulk of the people desired Theodosius, who belonged to the former party and had been the principal secretary of Timothy III. ; but the other party desired a man called Gainas.

A custom had grown up in the Egyptian Church that the nominated successor should watch all night by the dead body of a deceased Patriarch. Theodosius was keeping this vigil when a tumultuous mob burst into the church with Gainas. Theodosius, in fear of his life, escaped out of the city, and Gainas, for two or three days, seemed likely to be accepted as Patriarch. But Justinian was prompt to seize the opportunity for interference ; and as soon as possible his officers appeared in Alexandria, and Theodosius was recalled and established in the Patriarchate. This did not recommend him to the Egyptians, however, and he had a hard matter to maintain order in the city and kingdom, or to persuade his people that the assistance he had accepted from the Emperor did not signify his acknowledgment of Imperial rights of interference or agreement with the Emperor's faith. The Emperor himself appears to have shared the popular impression, and not long afterwards he called on Theodosius to give public adherence to the Chalcedonian faith. Large bribes of privilege and power indeed were offered him on the occasion, which he refused indignantly.

Justinian, finding Theodosius impracticable, looked about him for some more suitable tool, and the intrigues of the Roman legate influenced him to choose a man named Paul, who was not even a native of Egypt.¹ Without even a pretence of consulting the Egyptians, Justinian had him consecrated Patriarch of Alexandria, and sent him to that city under a strong military guard. This was in the year 541, nearly sixty years after the banishment of John Talaia, the last Melkite Patriarch. Paul's Patriarchate, as far as the Egyptians were concerned, was a dead letter. No one would acknowledge or communicate with him; he was nicknamed the New Judas; and Theodosius, from his place of exile, was obeyed as the true Patriarch. As Paul, by the aid of his troops, kept possession of the great church of the Cæsareum and several other of the principal churches, the Egyptians built some for themselves, particularly the Angelium, which was a sort of rival to the Cæsareum.

¹ Unless we accept the statement of Makrizi, who, instead of Tarsus, calls him of Tunis.

Not only the Egyptians, but even many of the Byzantine officials in Egypt, refused to acknowledge Paul's authority, and Paul proceeded to take measures accordingly. He had been invested by the Emperor with extraordinary powers, and he determined to remove Elias, the military commander of Lower Egypt, from his post. Elias was absent from Alexandria at the time, and Psoius, a friend of the commander and deacon of the Cæsareum, sent him secret warning of the conspiracy against him. This letter, however, fell into the hands of one of Paul's agents, and Paul immediately caused the deacon to be arrested on a pretended charge of neglect of the church accounts. He was given into the custody of Rhodon, the Prefect of Egypt, by whom he was tortured and eventually murdered. His relations appealed to the Emperor, who degraded Rhodon, and named Liberius Prefect of Egypt, with orders to make a thorough inquiry. Rhodon defended himself by declaring that he had the Emperor's own orders to obey Paul. Paul, on the other hand, contended that he had given no orders for the death of Psoius, and disowned those which Rhodon believed himself to have received from Paul through a citizen named Arsenius. Rhodon and Arsenius were both put to death, and Paul was banished to Gaza, where, in a provincial Council summoned by the Roman legate and the Patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem, he was deposed, and a man named Zoilus consecrated in his place for the throne of St. Mark.

The Egyptians treated his appointment with the same absolute disregard as that of his predecessor. Theodosius was the Patriarch of Egypt, though he was still banished from Alexandria.¹ From his time until the date of the Arab conquest there were two Patriarchs in Egypt—the nominal one, who held possession of the episcopal palace and most of the richer churches in Alexandria, but whose authority was openly and habitually disregarded by almost the entire nation (the exceptions being chiefly in the garrison towns of Egypt); and the real one, who generally lived in the great monastic settlement of Nitria, and from thence governed his people by his simple word.

The Egyptian Church was disendowed as well as disestablished, for from this time till the Arab conquest the payment of the whole revenue arising from her ancient endowments, equivalent in our money to about eighty thousand pounds a year, was enforced by the State officials to the Patriarch, who was the Emperor's nominee in Alexandria. From this time also the use of the Greek language became confined to the State Church, thus established by the Emperor for the Imperial officials, and was no longer in Egypt, with these exceptions, the language of society or of religion. The National Church, on the other hand, translated its liturgies into the national language, now known as 'Coptic.' With poverty and the decline of Greek learning came an increase of superstition in the country, and growth of trivial legends. Thus we are told by one traveller in Egypt about this period that when he asked why one of the doors in the great temple of Ptah (at that time a Christian church) was always kept shut, he was told that it had been rudely shut against the infant Jesus five hundred years before, and that ever since no mortal strength had been able to open it!

¹ He was imprisoned for some time at Constantinople.

By the command of Justinian, but probably with ecclesiastical money, three convent fortresses were built for purposes of defence in Egypt, and garrisoned by monks. One of these is the convent of Mount Sinai; the other two are the monasteries of St. Anthony and St. Paul on the Egyptian side of the Red Sea. It is not intended to state, of course, that these celebrated monastic settlements date only from the time of Justinian, but that they were rebuilt and fortified in his reign. That of St. Anthony at least has probably existed on the same spot ever since the great hermit's death. But the earlier settlements had doubtless remained faithful to the Egyptian Church, and the monastic garrisons of Justinian must have been Imperialists, though these convents have now for many centuries again belonged to the National Church.

Year by year the breach between the small Byzantine population with its alien Church, and the mass of the Egyptian people under their canonically elected ruler, deepened and widened, till, a century later, the very Moslems were welcomed by the Egyptians as their deliverers from their Christian oppressors. Deep, indeed, was the guilt of those who thus betrayed their country to the Infidel, and tremendous has been their punishment; but great also was their provocation. Their principal churches were taken from them and the revenues given to the Emperor's nominee; their own Patriarch could not leave his desert retreat except by stealth. The colours of two opposite parties of chariot-racing in the circus became the colours of the rival political parties all over the empire, and particularly in Egypt. The Byzantine party were called the Blues; the native or Egyptian party, the Greens. Gibbon gives a lively picture of the demoralisation of the State, owing to the rivalries and feuds between the Blues and the Greens; and the Egyptian historians are full of similar stories.

A large party, both in Egypt and Palestine, were still further alienated by Justinian's edict condemning the errors of the great Egyptian, Father, Origen, and anathematising his soul. Next came the famous controversy of the Three Chapters, as they were called—the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia; the treatise of Theodoret against Cyril and his twelve articles; and the letter of Ibbas, Bishop of Edessa, to the Persian bishop, Maris. Justinian issued, in the year 545, his edict condemning these writers on the ground of heresy, and desired all the bishops of the empire to subscribe this condemnation. This edict was an indirect attack on the Council of Chalcedon, which had approved these men. The Egyptian Church therefore would have had no scruples in accepting the edict, except on the ground—which the bishops of North Africa actually took—that it could not be right to anathematise dead men, though their errors were to be rejected. But the Egyptian Patriarch does not seem to have been asked to do anything in the matter. Zoilus, the Emperor's Patriarch, was required to sign, and did so; but afterwards recanted, and was promptly banished by the Emperor, who appointed Apollinarius in his stead. Justinian, who was Emperor both of East and West, also sent for Vigilius, the Pope of Rome, and commanded him to subscribe the edict. After much prevarication Vigilius did so in 548; but when, in 551, Justinian issued a second and still more stringent edict of the same kind, Pope Vigilius summoned up courage to refuse. He took refuge in the church of St. Peter, at Constantinople, and it is said that the pillars of the altar were nearly pulled down in the efforts of the Imperial officers to drag the Roman Pope from sanctuary. He afterwards escaped to Chalcedon; but eventually the Emperor gave him a safe-conduct, as he wished him to attend a General Council which he had summoned to meet in Constantinople in 553. Apollinarius of Alexandria sat in this Council, but the Egyptian Church was not represented, and took no notice of the decisions of the Council.

Other troubles were not wanting besides those of civil and religious strife. Terrible earthquakes took place all over the East. John of Nikius says that the shocks continued at intervals in Egypt for a whole year, but he does not say in which year of Justinian's reign. Pestilence and famine succeeded, and the whole of the Delta seems to have been in a miserable condition. In the Thebaid, where the authority of the Emperor was hardly felt, things were better, and Christianity was steadily progressing through the Nubian kingdoms, till in the fifth and sixth centuries it had become the dominant religion from Alexandria to the furthest confines of Ethiopia or Abyssinia. Idol-worship lingered longest in the island of Philæ, but it is recorded to have ceased even there in the reign of Justinian. Theodosius sent fresh missionaries into the interior, and religious strife in the north became religious zeal in the south, where no one troubled himself about the Byzantine Court, and where the mass of the population had probably never heard of the Emperor's Patriarch.

In 566 Justinian died, and in 567 Theodosius, the Egyptian Patriarch, died also. It is said that Apollinaris, believing that his claim to the Patriarchal throne would now be undisputed, gave a grand banquet to celebrate the occasion in Alexandria, but he was quickly undeceived. The Egyptians only delayed because they could not make up their mind between the rival candidates for the office. Eventually their choice fell upon Peter, a man of profound learning and greatly respected throughout all Egypt.

It was during the short reign of Peter that Jacobus or James Baradaeus came to Alexandria. This remarkable man was born at Tela, a town about fifty-five miles east of Edessa, in the later years of the preceding century, and was now very old. In 541 he was called from his monastery near Constantinople and ordained by Theodosius, Patriarch of Alexandria, and some other Egyptian bishops who were detained there by Justinian. He was made bishop, with the nominal title of Edessa, but was in reality a missionary bishop for all the scattered congregations in the Byzantine dominions outside Egypt, which were one in faith with the Church of Egypt and rejected the Council of Chalcedon. For the rest of his life he was untiring in his efforts, often in danger from the Byzantine officials and ecclesiastics, unwearied in his journeys to and fro. He is said to have ordained eighty-nine bishops and many thousand priests. It is probable that the nickname Jacobite, which was certainly at a later date applied to the Monophysites, came from the name of their great missionary bishop. But to call the Egyptian or Coptic Church the 'Jacobite sect,' as Neale and other ecclesiastical historians have done, is as unmeaning and incorrect as it would be for the Greek Church now to describe the Church of England as 'the Hussite sect.' The term Melkite, on the contrary, which after the Arab conquest was always used to describe the remnant of the Byzantine Church which remained in Egypt, had a real significance, and was readily adopted by the Church in question. It is derived from Melek, the Arabic for 'king,' and signified 'king's men,' or those who still remained faithful to the Byzantine Emperor.

The occasion of his visit to Egypt was to try and make peace between the Churches of Egypt and Syria. Paul, who had been consecrated some time before by Jacobus as Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch, had under persecution consented to acknowledge the Council of Chalcedon and all that it involved. For this he had been excommunicated by Jacobus; but, having made good his escape from Constantinople, Paul recanted his submission to the Emperor and expressed great penitence for his treason, as in the eyes of Jacobus and his own eyes his act had seemed. Jacobus not only received him back into communion, but reinstated him as Patriarch of Antioch. This gave great offence in Egypt, and, according to John of Ephesus, Peter formally deposed the erring Paul. Jacobus came to Alexandria to remonstrate, but, instead of convincing Peter, was apparently convinced by him—it is hinted that things were known to the discredit of Paul in Alexandria, which was his native city—and Jacobus gave his formal assent to the deposition of Paul, only stipulating that, as he had repented, he should be restored to communion. But Paul had a considerable party of adherents in Syria, who refused to accept the joint decision of the Patriarch of Alexandria and their own Metropolitan ; so the only effect was to create a fresh schism in Syria, which lasted for some years. At length Jacobus determined to go again to Alexandria, where Damian had by this time succeeded to Peter ; but he was taken ill at a monastery on the Egyptian frontier. Damian, on hearing of his illness, hastily went in person to the succour of the venerable bishop, but arrived too late.

This visit from Jacobus Baradæus is almost all we know of the Patriarchate of Peter III., who died about two years after his accession, and was succeeded by his syncellus, Damian, who maintained the excellent traditions of his immediate predecessors, and, withdrawing from all party strife, was content to govern his people from the desert monasteries of Nitria. Apollinaris himself died in 569, and was succeeded by John, a retired general in the Byzantine army, who was consecrated at Constantinople, and sent over to take possession of the ecclesiastical revenues. He showed himself, however, according to the testimony of the Monophysite, John of Nikius, a man of peace, who was content to glorify God in his own Church, and forced no one to abandon his belief.

The disaffection in Egypt was increasing so much that the old rule which forbade any native Egyptian to be enrolled in the Imperial troops was more stringently enforced than ever; certainly a politic rule, since it was precisely this want of military discipline and experience which caused all the Egyptian revolts to fail. The trade of Egypt, though decreasing, was still very great. Egyptian corn-ships still sailed for England every year to trade for tin, though the Roman occupation of that country had long been given up. It was in this reign that Cosmas the navigator made his celebrated voyages to the Persian Gulf, India, and Ceylon. He was not only a trader, but a keen observer of nature and men, who took great interest in the lands where his business led him. He was an Egyptian, and when he retired from business he wrote several books descriptive of the countries which he had visited. Unfortunately, only one of these works, and that probably the least valuable, has survived to our day. It is called 'Christian Topography,' and was written chiefly 'to confute the impious heresy of those who maintain that the earth is a globe, and not a flat oblong table, as is represented in the Scriptures'!

In spite of the absurdities of his system, however, the book gives a great deal of valuable information about India and Ceylon; not only concerning the state of Christianity in those lands, but concerning their natural products and principal articles of commerce.

This book of Cosmas also preserves two important historical inscriptions, which he copied from a monument then existing at Adulē, an Ethiopian port on the Red Sea. The monument was 'a wedge-shaped block of basanite or touchstone, standing behind a white marble chair, dedicated to Mars, and ornamented with the figures of Hercules and Mercury. One of the inscriptions was engraved on the block, the other on the chair. The former relates to Ptolemy Euergetes (B.C. 247-222); and the latter, of later date, to the conquests of an un-named king of the Auxumitæ.

Not only was the trade and the learning of Alexandria decreasing, but the city itself was going out of fashion as a residence for the principal Byzantine officials. They mostly lived at Taposiris, a town about a day's journey west of Alexandria, the site of which is still marked by the ruins of some of the palaces and baths which they built there. Still, however, learned men came to Alexandria to correct their copies of ancient manuscripts, and still Egyptian physicians and Egyptian science were renowned throughout the world. But through the reign of Justinian and those of his successors, Justin II. and Tiberius II., the process of disaffection and degradation went steadily on.

CHAPTER XXIX

THE REVOLT OF THE BROTHERS

A.D. 582 IN the early years of the reign of Maurice, who succeeded
A.M. 298 Tiberius II., a fresh revolt broke out in the North of Egypt. It was headed by three brothers—named Abaskiron, Menas, and James—who took up arms against the Blue or Imperial party. They seized and pillaged the towns of Bana and Bousir,¹ and killed a great many people. Eventually they set fire to Bousir, and burnt the public bath among other buildings. The local prefect managed to make his escape under cover of the night, and fled to Constantinople, where he represented the serious nature of the rebellion. Maurice sent indignant orders to John, the Governor of Alexandria, to see that it was speedily put down. But the rebels had not only established themselves firmly in the Delta, they menaced Alexandria itself, and seized the corn boats on their way to that city. This produced an actual famine, and the mob rose against the governor, John, who had originally been a personal friend of the three brothers now at the head of the rebellion, and attempted to murder him. He was only saved by the devotion of some of the principal Egyptians belonging to the National Church, who stood by him and brought him off in safety.

¹ These towns were so near together that they are now confounded under the name of Abousir-Bana, near Samanhoud.

John's friendly relations with the Egyptians, however, did him no good at Court, and Maurice dismissed him from his office, and appointed a man named Paul in his place. Meanwhile the revolt gained ground daily in Egypt, and the Byzantine power seemed ready to fall. Isaac, son of the eldest of the three brothers, by a brilliant dash made himself master of several vessels, and cruised along the coasts, even to Cyprus, making war on all Byzantine ships. In this extremity the Byzantine Patriarch was sent to treat with the insurgents, and the place of meeting was fixed at Aykelah, the native city of the three brothers.

Eulogius had succeeded John about the year 579 A.D., and was the first Byzantine Patriarch who had won in some degree the confidence of the Egyptians. He was neither Greek nor Egyptian, but a native of Antioch, and had been consecrated at Constantinople to rule over the handful of aliens which the Emperor at Constantinople and the Pope of Rome persisted in regarding as the true Egyptian Church. Eulogius was indeed a personal friend of Gregory the Great, who shortly afterwards succeeded Pelagius in the see of Rome, and maintained a correspondence with him all his life.¹ But Eulogius, though no Egyptian, was a true Christian, and by his piety and learning did much to save the Greek Church from absolute extinction and degradation in Egypt. Eulogius readily consented to treat with the insurgents on behalf of the Emperor, and went to Aykelah with his deacon Ailas. The Blues and Greens assembled in great force, and long discussions took place, but without result, since the insurgents would only accept pardon on condition that John, the dismissed prefect, should be returned to them. 'This John fears no one,' the spokesman is reported to have said; 'he is an enemy to all tyranny, and treats us as we desire to be treated.'

¹ In 598 Gregory wrote a letter to Eulogius of Egypt, which must interest all Englishmen. After congratulating the Patriarch on his success in reviving the Byzantine Church in Egypt, he tells him of the efforts which he on his part is making for the conversion of the Angles. He tells Eulogius all about the mission of St. Augustine to England, and relates with joy that at the last Christmas no less than ten thousand pagans had received Holy Baptism.

The Emperor evidently thought it expedient to yield, for the insurgents were now masters of the whole of Northern Egypt, and all taxes were paid to them instead of being remitted to the Byzantine Government. John was sent back to Alexandria, and a man named Theodore, who knew Egypt well and was the son of a well-known general, took the field against the insurgents.

It appears that one of the original complaints of the Egyptians was that two of their nation whom they greatly respected had been arrested and imprisoned. The names of these men are given as Cosmas, son of Samuel, and Banon, son of Ammon; but the reason of their arrest by the Byzantine Government is nowhere stated. Theodore insisted that these two men should not only be set at liberty, but that they should accompany his army, in order that the insurgents should see for themselves that they were free. His demand was at once acceded to by the Government; not only Cosmas and Banon, but three other men who had been arrested with them, were delivered to Theodore, who thereupon marched in search of the Egyptian insurgents. He camped immediately opposite to them, on the other bank of the river, and brought out Cosmas and Banon in full view of their compatriots. At his desire, though whether by persuasion or threats we are not told, Cosmas and Banon addressed the insurgents from across the river, entreating them to return to their allegiance, assuring them that the Roman Empire was not yet enfeebled or conquered, and that their ultimate success was impossible.

The appeal was successful. Little by little the insurgent camp broke up, and its members passed over the river to Cosmas and Banon with the Imperial troops. The three brothers were left alone with their immediate adherents, but they boldly endeavoured to stand their ground, and met the attack of the Byzantine army with desperate courage. They fought till night fell, and then fled from the field to Abu San. Here they made a brief halt, but with daylight discovered that they were pursued by the Byzantine army. The gallant little band retreated fighting towards Alexandria, but they were at length overpowered, and all three brothers, with Isaac, were taken prisoners.

They were placed on camels and paraded about the streets of Alexandria, that all men might know the revolt had come to an end. Then they were thrown into prison; but the prefect, John, stood their friend as much as he dared, and no further steps were taken against them till long afterwards, by a new prefect, who succeeded John. This man cut off the heads of the three brothers, and sent Isaac into exile. The same prefect, probably acting under orders from the Emperor, who had evidently neither forgotten nor forgiven the revolt, though he had not dared to use harshness at the time, confiscated the goods of the chief men who had taken part in it, and delivered the towns of Aykelah¹ and Abu San to the flames.

¹ The town which rose upon the ruins of Aykelah was called Zawiet Professor Amelineau identifies it with the present Zawiet-Sakr.

So ended the revolt of the three brothers, but it was not the only one in Egypt during the reign of Maurice and his successors. Again and again, in different parts of the country, the smouldering flame of discontent broke out. In the canton of Akhmin the insurgents were at length driven by the Byzantine army into the barren hills, and there surrounded and starved to death. Under Phocas a fresh attempt broke out in the district of five towns—Kharbeta, San, Basta, Balqua, and Sanhour—the suppression of which was accompanied by circumstances of the utmost barbarity. It was because the Egyptians had learnt by repeated disappointment and failure that they could not alone shake off the yoke, which since 451 had become yearly more distasteful to them, that in the early years of the seventh century they looked in despair for help to the victorious Arabs, and by this treason to their faith brought upon themselves the far heavier yoke under which they have groaned during twelve centuries of persecution and degradation.

CHAPTER XXX

THE PERSIAN CONQUEST

A.D. 603 WHILE the Byzantine rule was tottering to its fall in A.M. 819 Egypt, the national party was gaining strength every year. The Patriarch Damian had been succeeded in 603 (or 607) by Anastasius, who had the true martyr spirit, and, notwithstanding that he left Nitria at the risk of his life, constantly travelled through his country, and even held ordinations in Alexandria itself. He built another church in that city, the stronghold of Imperialism, which he dedicated to the Archangel Michael.¹ In his time the Nile rose so rapidly in one night that the whole of the town of Esneh was flooded, many houses were overthrown by the water, and a great number of the inhabitants perished.

¹ In Egypt the Archangel Michael had taken the place of one of the pagan gods, to whom they were greatly devoted. In the fourth century Pope Alexander solemnly broke the brazen image of this idol in Alexandria, and altered the temple into a church. But he only won the consent of the people by promising them that they should find the patronage of Michael, to whom he dedicated the church, far better for them than that of the idol, and that nothing should be changed in the yearly feast which they had been wont to celebrate, save only that it should be held in honour of Michael instead of the idol. This ancient heathen feast has been kept in Michael's honour ever since. The Egyptians have a legend that on one day in the year the mouth of the pit of purifying fire is opened, and that it is Michael's privilege to plunge into it and bring up as many souls into Paradise as he can carry on his wings.

The Egyptians, as might be expected, joined eagerly in the general revolt against the Emperor Phocas. Three thousand Byzantine soldiers supplemented by a great number of irregular native troops were sent through Pentapolis by the elder Heraclius, Exarch of Africa, to secure Egypt for his son, who was engaged in making himself master of Constantinople. Bonakis, who commanded this contingent, effected a junction with the troops of the Prefect of Mareotis without opposition, and turned against Alexandria. The governor came out to meet them at the head of such troops as remained faithful to Phocas. He was hopelessly outnumbered from the first, and the insurgent commander sent to say that if he would even remain neutral his life should be spared; but he indignantly refused the offer, and fell fighting. His head was cut off and exposed on the gates of Alexandria. The Byzantine Patriarch, Theodore, who had about two years before been nominated by Phocas on the death of Eulogius, took refuge in the church of Athanasius, for the whole city gladly welcomed the general of Heraclius, and his life was in danger.

The inhabitants of Nikius, headed by their bishop, hastened to acknowledge Heraclius, and their example was quickly followed by almost all the cities of Egypt. Only one Egyptian of any standing, the same Cosmas who had stopped the revolt of the three brothers against Maurice, declared for Phocas, and very few even of the Byzantine officials. Two of these, however—Paul, Prefect of Samanhoud, and Marcian, Prefect of Athribis¹ with a lady named Christodora, who seems to have been a person of great influence, endeavoured to make a stand for Phocas, especially as they had just received news that his general, Bonose, had arrived with an army at Pelusium. Two native armies (one under Theodore and Plato, accompanied by Theodore of Nikius and Menas, the chancellor of his diocese; and the other under Cosmas and Paul, accompanied by Christodora) now menaced each other in the district of Menouf; but both sides waited for the Byzantine troops. On the same day Bonose (for Phocas) arrived at Athribis, and Bonakis (for Heraclius) at Nikius, and pushed on hastily to join their native allies. The fight took place a little to the east of the town of Menouf, and victory declared for Bonose. Bonakis was killed, and Plato and Theodore, seeing that the day was lost, fled to Atris, and took refuge in the convent. Theodore of Nikius and his chancellor came to the tent of Bonose, carrying the Gospels and asking for mercy. Bonose seemed at first inclined to spare them, and took them with him to Nikius. But Marcian and Christodora represented to him that it was by the bishop's orders that the statues of Phocas had been thrown down from the gates of Nikius, and that he was too dangerous to be allowed to live.

¹ Athribis is ruined, and its place taken by the modern town of Beutha.

A^b

/n

The bishop was therefore beheaded in his own city, and Menas was subjected to so severe an application of the bastinado that, though he had paid three thousand pieces of gold for his ransom, he died two or three days after he was set at liberty. The inhabitants of the surrounding country were struck with terror, and the monks of Atris thought to purchase their safety by delivering the fellow-countrymen who had sought refuge with them to the victorious general. Not only Plato and Theodore, but the principal inhabitants of Menouf, who had fled to the convent—among them three old men who were greatly respected—were brought in chains by the monks to Bonose at Nikius. They were all publicly scourged, and then beheaded on the same spot where the bishop had been put to death.

This, however, was only a passing success for the adherents of Phocas. All the principal inhabitants of Egypt, all the members of the 'Green' party, all the strength of the National Church, were for Heraclius. Reinforcements of all kinds poured into Alexandria, where Nicetas, the lieutenant of Heraclius, had arrived. Paul of Samanhoud made a feeble demonstration against the city, but was driven off with stones which ~~sunk~~ ^{sunken} his boats in the canal. A hermit of great sanctity and renown, named Theophilus, who had lived forty years on the top of a pillar by the river, on being consulted by Nicetas (who knew what an effect his words would have on the Egyptians), promised victory to Nicetas and the speedy accession of Heraclius. On this, Nicetas sallied out of Alexandria and gave battle to Bonose. His victory was complete; Bonose fled to Nikius, and all the Blues joined Nicetas. Bonose next sent a soldier to assassinate Nicetas under pretext of a message of surrender, but one of his own men warned Nicetas. The herald was searched and killed with the dagger found concealed upon him for the purpose. Eventually, after some more desultory fighting, the adherents of Phocas were finally crushed. Bonose and Theodore the Byzantine Patriarch were both killed in the final struggles; Paul of Samanhoud and Cosmas were both made prisoners, but were treated with leniency. Nicetas devoted himself to the task of restoring order throughout Egypt, for many members of the Green (or National) party were inclined to take advantage of the confusion to plunder the defeated Blues in all directions. Many of the Byzantines left Egypt altogether, and some renounced their Christianity and returned to the old pagan religion. Nicetas by a judicious mixture of severity and clemency—he remitted all taxes for three years—succeeding in re-establishing peace.

But peace could not endure long in Egypt. Barely four years afterwards Syria was overrun by the Persian troops of Chosroes, and Egypt was threatened. The Christians of Syria took refuge in Egypt in vast numbers, and both John, the Byzantine Patriarch (who had been nominated by Heraclius to succeed Theodore), and Anastasius, the National Patriarch, vied with each other in relieving the necessities of their fellow-Christians. John, of course, was by far the richer, as all the ancient endowments of the National Church were by command of the Emperor confiscated to the support of the Byzantine Church in Egypt; and the deprived Monophysites were only gradually making fresh provision for the support of their own Patriarch and clergy. John had four thousand pounds waiting for him in the Church treasury when he landed, and, besides his official income, enormous sums were sent him for the relief of the Syrian refugees. The Patriarch of Antioch himself took refuge in Egypt, but he went to the National Patriarch, Anastasius, who received him with open arms and as much splendour of reception as the times allowed; for again famine had followed in the track of strife, and the Nile had not risen to the requisite height. St. John the Almoner, as the Byzantine Patriarch was afterwards called, in affectionate memory of his generosity, had shown more liberality than prudence in the distribution of the funds entrusted to him. He had not only established hospitals for the sick, and relieved the fugitives, but alms were given daily to all who applied at his gates. When the men who were charged with the distribution represented to John that some of those who applied for daily alms wore gold ornaments, he rebuked them for an officious and inquisitive spirit, declaring that if the whole world came to ask alms at Alexandria they could not exhaust the riches of God's goodness.

As a natural consequence, the money ran short before the need was over, and John was in sore distress. In this juncture a rich citizen of Alexandria, who greatly desired to be made a deacon (the first step to the high dignity of a Patriarch), but who had been twice married, and was therefore canonically incapacitated, offered John an immense supply of corn and a hundred and eight pounds of gold, if he would break the canon law and admit the donor to the diaconate. John was sorely tempted,¹ and even sent for the man, but finally told him that, although he could not deny that the gift was sorely needed, yet, the motive being impure, the offering must be declined. 'God,' he is reported to have said, 'who supported the poor before either of us were born, can find the means of supporting them now. He who blessed the five loaves and multiplied them can bless and multiply the two measures of corn which remain in my granary.'

The citizen, foiled in his ambition, departed, and almost at the same moment a message came that two of the Church ships had returned from Sicily with a large cargo of corn. The Patriarch John fell on his face in mingled humiliation and gratitude, thanking God that he had not been permitted to sell the gift of the Holy Ghost for money.

¹ John himself was a widower, a native of Cyprus, and had never been either a monk or a deacon; therefore on all counts his elevation to the Patriarchate of Egypt was uncanonical. But, for the Imperial party in Egypt, the Emperor's nomination overrode all ecclesiastical laws.

Though he received all the ecclesiastical revenues, John, like all the other Byzantine Patriarchs, had little authority outside Alexandria and the two or three cities which were garrisoned by Byzantine troops. But by his personal virtues he endeared himself to the Alexandrians; and, though all the endowments of the Church were at his disposal, he lived with the same simplicity as the National Patriarch—with whom indeed, as became his character, he maintained friendly relations. When Anastasius, who was universally loved and respected, died, his successor Andronicus was permitted to live openly in Alexandria, and peace was maintained between the rival Churches. The Egyptians readily acknowledged the piety of the Emperor's bishop, and, though they would yield obedience to no Patriarch but their own, they equally with the Imperial Church commemorated John as a saint after his death.

A yearly sum of Church money was devoted by John to the ransom of Christian captives. Discovering that the men who were entrusted with this duty were in the habit of taking bribes from the friends of the captives, to determine which should first be ransomed, he called them before him and forbade them ever to receive such money in future. At the same time he increased their salaries, to spare them the temptation. It is said that some were so much touched by his forgiveness and generosity that they voluntarily declined the increase of pay which he offered. One curious incident is recorded of the way in which he managed his congregation. Already, as in all Churches where a fasting communion is made obligatory, a very large proportion of the congregations belonging both to the Imperial and National Churches had given up communicating altogether. But in the Imperial churches of Alexandria a further innovation had lately grown up. Many of the fashionable members of the congregation did not even remain to 'assist' at the celebration of the Eucharist, but left the church at the conclusion of the Gospel. On two occasions the Patriarch solemnly followed his congregation out of the church, and left the service unfinished. On their expressing astonishment and inquiry, he calmly told them that 'Where the sheep are, there the shepherd ought to be. It is for your sakes,' he added, 'that I go to the church; for my own part, I could celebrate the office at home.' The congregation took the hint, and remained in church till the service was over.

But though his virtues were undoubted, John had not the kind of courage which leads to martyrdom. There had been a brief respite; but now that the Persians were firmly established in Syria, they advanced into Egypt, and were welcomed as deliverers by the National party, who hailed every chance of throwing off the hated Byzantine yoke. The whole of the Delta was in their hands, and they laid siege to Alexandria. Nicetas, the general who had so successfully contended against native levies of undisciplined Egyptians, evidently considered resistance hopeless. He persuaded the Emperor's bishop to accompany him, and the two fled from Alexandria, which was immediately occupied by the Persians in 620. The whole of Egypt submitted to them up to the borders of Ethiopia, and for nearly ten years Egypt was once more a Persian province. Heraclius had enough to do in defending his own capital from the victorious Persians, and made no attempt for some time to recover Egypt. Nor did he nominate another Patriarch for the State Church in Egypt, though John died in the same year of his flight. Probably he would have found no one to accept the office from him at this juncture. About a year afterwards Andronicus died, so that both the Churches in Egypt were without a head. But when the National Church proceeded to the election of a new Patriarch, the small but rich State Establishment appears to have taken alarm. If there were but one Patriarch in the country, it was clear that all the revenues, which so far they had kept in their own hands, were liable to be reclaimed by him; and refusal on their part would be dangerous. It was determined to wait the Emperor's pleasure no longer, and the Byzantine Church proceeded to elect a man named George, of whom little to his credit is known, but who probably served their immediate purpose as well as another.

The National Church elected Benjamin, a man of wealthy parentage, whom after-events have made famous. He had been a monk in the monastery of Deyr Kirios (Cyrus), and was distinguished for his austerities and his devotion to prayer. He had been, for some years before his election, in Alexandria with the Patriarch Andronicus, whom he succeeded.

CHAPTER XXXI

THE ACT OF UNION

A.D. 629
A.M. 345

IN the year 629 Heraclius, having waged successful war against the Persians in other parts of the empire, turned his attention to the recovery of Egypt. Experience, however, had taught him that he could not retain his hold in that country without conciliating the National Church, and in so doing the bulk of the population. He therefore on his way back from a victorious campaign consulted Athanasius of Antioch (the same who had taken refuge in Egypt some years before); Sergius of Constantinople; and Cyrus, Bishop of Phasis, who represented three different shades of religious opinion, as to the best means of doing so. After much discussion it was decided not to mention the Council of Chalcedon, since openly to accept or reject that Council would inevitably offend one of two parties beyond retrieval; but it was determined to draw up an Act of Union, which should affirm one Will in our Lord instead of one Nature. This compromise was accepted by the three bishops above named, of whom one was a Monophysite and the other a 'Chalcedonian' Patriarch, and the Emperor promptly appointed the third of them (Cyrus) Patriarch of Alexandria, and sent him off to that city with full powers to effect the hoped-for reconciliation. What became of the unfortunate George, whom the Græco-Egyptians had chosen for themselves, cannot be ascertained. Makrizi does not know of his existence; and Eutychius, a Melkite historian of the tenth century, declares that George fled from Egypt 'for fear of the Saracens.' But as Cyrus was appointed Patriarch of Alexandria in 630, and as Amr did not invade Egypt till 639-40, his memory may be held clear from this accusation. It is most probable that Heraclius simply ignored the action of the State Church in having set up a Patriarch for themselves, and that George did not venture to assert himself against the Emperor's nominee, but retired into private life on the arrival of Cyrus.

Cyrus found no difficulty in his task as far as the Egyptian laity and many of the clergy were concerned. One Will signified to them one Nature, and they readily agreed to accept the Act of Union, and to communicate with the State Church in doing so, declaring that the Byzantine Church had come over to their views. Indeed, the principal members of the Byzantine party thought the same, and received the Emperor's decree with consternation. At the Council which Cyrus called in Alexandria to discuss the matter, Sophronius, an intimate friend of St. John the Almoner, and a man of great weight in the Church, remonstrated with the most urgent entreaties. He declared that the Emperor had but evolved a new heresy—indeed, it has ever since been called the Monothelite heresy—and implored Cyrus not to publish the Act of Union. Cyrus paid no attention to these remonstrances, but was dismayed to find that the National Patriarch coldly refused to discuss the matter, or to accept any theological decision from the Emperor. Cyrus knew that the reconciliation would be of little political value without the sanction of the Patriarch, and he attempted to carry his point by force. The lives of the principal Egyptians who stood by their Patriarch were in danger, and they retreated from Alexandria. Benjamin was banished to a small monastery in the Upper Thebaid,¹ and Sophronius on the other hand retired into Syria, where he was afterwards elected Patriarch of Jerusalem.

Heraclius appears to have been well content with the measure of success which his agent had attained, and felt sufficiently secure to go on pilgrimage in the following year to Jerusalem. It was on this occasion that the events happened which are commemorated in the so-called Fast of Heraclius—a fast still kept in Egypt and throughout the East every year.²

Heraclius had given his word to the Jews of Syria for their safety, in consideration of costly presents which he had received from them. But when he came on pilgrimage to Jerusalem he was indignant and horrified to find what havoc had been wrought there, not so much by the Persians as by the Jews, who had profited by the occasion to indulge their deep hatred of the Christian religion. The Syrian Christians appealed to the Emperor for vengeance on the Jews.

Then (says Makrizi) Heraclius told them he could not massacre the Jews, as he had pledged to them his word for their safety, and had sworn it to them. Then the Christian monks, Patriarchs, and presbyters gave him as a reason that he need not be hindered by that from slaughtering them, inasmuch as they had dealt with him by craft so far as to make him give them his word for their safety, without his being aware of the real state of their case ; and that they would undertake for him, in expiation of his [breach of] faith, to bind themselves and the Christians to a fast of a week every year for ever.

¹ It is said that Benjamin was cheered in his flight by the vision of a celestial messenger, who foretold to him that within ten years the Lord would deliver the Egyptians by the advent of a nation circumcised like themselves, and that by them the Byzantine yoke should be broken for ever.

² It is curious that almost the only lasting result of the attempted Union of Heraclius in Egypt has been to impose the observance of this fast on both Churches alike.

Heraclius inclined to their terms, and made a shameful onslaught upon the Jews, whom he massacred until none were left in the kingdoms of Rome, Egypt, and Syria, but those who had fled and hidden themselves. The Patriarch [of Jerusalem] and the bishops then wrote unto all the cities, to constrain the Christians to keep this fast for seven days in the year, which is known among them as the 'Week of Heraclius.'

The days of Byzantine rule in Egypt were numbered. The Persians had been driven back, and the Byzantine garrisons re-established in the Delta ; but it seems probable that no troops were stationed south of the Fayoum, and Upper Egypt appears to have been left practically to itself, or later to that celebrated yet shadowy person known as the Makaukas. From the deserts of the Arabian peninsula a new and more formidable enemy rose up to defy the Roman Empire, viz., the recently created Saracen power, animated by the irresistible fervour of a new religion. Mohammed their prophet was dead, but his successor Omar was pushing his conquests in every direction. Early in the year 640,¹ having overrun Syria, one of their ablest generals, Amr or Amru ebn Aas, turned his eyes upon the far more valuable prize of Egypt, and by a stratagem obtained consent from the Kaliph Omar to the expedition.¹

¹ This date used to be given as 638, but modern researches have established it two years later.

¹ Omar's reply was to the effect that if Amr were already on Egyptian soil, he might go forward ; if not, he must return. Amr, having reason to guess what was in the letter, refused to open it until he had camped within the frontier of Egypt.

CHAPTER XXXII

THE ARAB CONQUEST

A.D. 640
 A.M. 356
 A.H. 18

It has been already pointed out that at the time of the Arab invasion of Egypt the greater part of that country was in a state of passive opposition to the recently re-established Byzantine occupation. For the last ten years many of the officials had systematically kept back the dues which the Byzantine Government was powerless to collect, and two or three of them seemed to have lived like petty kings in Egypt, paying to the Persians as little as they could help, and practically independent of either Persian or Byzantine control. When in 630 Heraclius drove out the Persians and re-established his garrisons in Egypt, he was too well aware of the insecurity of his tenure to proceed rashly, and waited for his religious concessions to the Egyptian party to take effect. Still the governors of the different provinces, some of whom were native Egyptians, knew that the time of reckoning could not long be put off; and all of them had personal as well as political cause to dread the re-establishment of the Byzantine power.

If, however, the Act of Union, otherwise called the Ekthesis, had been accepted by the Patriarch Benjamin, these men would have been powerless. But Heraclius, through his agent Cyrus, whom he had appointed Patriarch of the Byzantine (or State) Church in Egypt, made the fatal mistake of undervaluing the power of the Egyptian Patriarch. When the bulk of the Egyptian nation, as it seemed to Cyrus, gladly accepted his terms, he did not hesitate to persecute and banish the Patriarch for refusing. But this only made the refusal and disapproval of Benjamin patent to all Egypt, and from that day the Act of Union was doomed. Whatever their faults, the Egyptian nation had never yet failed in loyalty to their Patriarch. The concessions of the Emperor might seem all that they desired, but, if the Patriarch was not satisfied, the true Egyptian would have none of them. Slowly the inert mass of public opinion swung back from the Emperor, and Cyrus began to perceive that he had failed. The dishonest officials breathed more freely; the day of reckoning seemed far off.

One of these officials stands out from all the others in a disgraceful pre-eminence. Most people have at least heard of the Makaukas, for his name, his functions, his very existence even, have been made the subject of many controversies. Quite recently, however, the translation of the papyri in the collection of the Archduke Rainer has enabled us to clear up some at least of the difficulties attending this subject.

Most scholars have long agreed that Makaukas is not a proper name, but have been puzzled to decide whether it was a nickname or an official title. The fact seems to be that it is neither. The man in question was a pagarch (loosely rendered as prefect in most histories), and his name was George, son of Menas Parkubios.¹ The pagarch was the civil governor of an Egyptian province, the whole administration of which was confided to him. He was responsible for the public security and order, and for the collection and remittance of the imperial Imposts. Also all highways, dams, canals, bridges—in short, all the public works of the district—were in his charge, even to the coinage, measures, and weights. Only the army (represented in most provinces by little more than a single garrison) and the clergy (a much more important exception) were exempt from his control. The number of subordinate officials who looked no higher than their pagarch for orders was consequently very great. Recent researches have revealed to us the names and districts of the three principal pagarchs in Egypt at the time of the Arab conquest.

¹ Menas, or Mena, was such a common name in Egypt that a surname, usually Greek, was often attached to those who bore it. (The 'e' is pronounced short, as in 'hen.')

The official language of Egypt was Greek, and the complimentary title given to these pagarchs was a word which signifies in English 'the most glorious,' just as our ambassadors always have the prefix 'his excellency.' The Arabs took this word μεγαλῆς for part of the actual name of the pagarch who treated with Amr for the surrender of the country; and thus George the Traitor has been known for centuries by a title which he has little right to bear - Makaukas ('the most glorious').

Μεγαλῆς | The Prefect (or Pagarch) of Lower Egypt was Amnon Menas, 'a man full of pretension, but quite ignorant, who detested exceedingly the Egyptians, and was continued in his office after the conquest of the country by the Arabs.'¹ The Pagarch of Middle Egypt—whose province on one bank of the Nile appears to have included the districts of

¹ John of Nikius.

Heracleopolis Magna, Arsinoë, and Oxyrhynchus—was Cyrus, of whom we know little, except that he joined in delivering the country to the Mohammedans. The Pagarch of Upper Egypt—or Babylon, as it is called in the papyri—was that George (Girghis) whom we call the Makaukas. These were the three important provinces, in each of which there were also a dux (or military governor) and a garrison. Besides these there were, either then existing or added immediately after the Arab conquest, two lesser pagarchs—Philoxenos, of the Fayoum; and Shenouda, of the Rif Province.

Three out of these five men were by the indisputable witness of their names Egyptians,¹ but they could not have belonged to the National Church, because that would have disqualified them for their official position. Those writers who speak of the Makaukas as a Copt are perfectly correct; but the inference which some have drawn, that he belonged to the National—or, as it is now called, the Coptic (Egyptian²)—Church, is false. He might in his heart incline to the Church of his fathers, but he could not have done so openly. He was a Byzantine official and an Egyptian; and he was false alike to his emperor, to his Church, and to his country.

He had been long in office at the time of the invasion, and was the most powerful of all the pagarchs. This was partly owing to the fact that Babylon, the capital of his province, was on its northernmost boundary, and that for twenty years or more the dwellers in the valley of the Nile had looked to him alone as their ruler. The ravages of the Persians taught them that Byzantium was powerless; and since the Persians had gone, though Babylon itself had been re-occupied by Byzantine soldiers, and small garrisons were also stationed in Arsinoë and the Fayoum, the whole country lying south of Babylon had been practically unaffected by their return. Whether the soldiers of the distant garrisons wore Persian or Byzantine dress mattered little to the population. They paid their taxes all the same to the pagarch, and left him to settle to whom the money was due. For many years the powerful George of Babylon had settled it in the simplest manner, by keeping everything himself that was not returned in salaries or public works to the province. But when Heraclius, believing that by his Act of Union he had conciliated the whole country, began to press for a real re-establishment of his government and a repayment of the Egyptian revenues, George saw ruin staring him in the face. Already, from motives or far-seeing policy, he had sent a complimentary embassy to the rising power, with gifts of honey and slaves to their leader Mohammed. Now Mohammed was dead, and the conquests of Heraclius filled him with dismay. If the moribund empire were to rise again, and sweep the Arabs away, as its troops had already swept the Persians, he would be the first to be called to account. Already the troops of Heraclius and of Omar, Mohammed's successor, faced each other in Palestine; and George knew well that whichever power proved victorious there was the future master of Egypt. The late successes of Heraclius inclined him to think that this would be the winning side, after all, and he hastened to act accordingly.

¹ It was not uncommon for Egyptians of the Imperialist party to take Greek names, but no instance is known of a Byzantine taking an Egyptian name.

² The ancient religious name for Memphis was Ha ka ptah. Of this the Greeks made Αἴγυπτος, and applied it to the whole country. When the Arabs came, they called it Agupta (hard g), and the inhabitants Agupti. In course of time it became Gupt and Gupti, which the English mispronounce Copt and Coptic.

He had a beautiful daughter called Armenosa, and he conceived the brilliant project of marrying her to Constantine, the widowed son and heir of the Emperor, with so large a dowry that the latter might think it expedient to waive the question of arrears of tribute. Constantine was then at Cæsarea, and seems to have favourably entertained the proposal. Accordingly, late in the year 639, a gorgeous marriage procession left the city of Babylon to escort the Egyptian bride to her royal husband. Her guard of honour amounted, we are told, to the number of two thousand cavaliers, besides slaves, and a long caravan laden with treasure.¹

On approaching the Egyptian frontier, and evidently intending to pass by Kantara to El Arish, Armenosa heard that the Arabs had been victorious and were now closely besieging Cæsarea and preparing to invade Egypt. The young Egyptian acted with a courage and promptitude worthy of her remote ancestors. She retired herself to Belbeis, and prepared for defence; but she at once despatched her regiment of Egyptian guards to hold Pelusium in case the enemy came by that way, as seemed most probable. She sent warning to her father, but remained herself in Belbeis, encouraging the inhabitants to make a stand for the defence of their country against the infidels.

Amr, the Moslem general, avoiding Pelusium, marched straight for Belbeis, and laid siege to that city. For one month the brave girl held the Arabs at bay with her scanty and undisciplined forces. After several obstinate fight and great loss of life Amr at length took the city by storm, and Armenosa, with all her treasures, fell into his hands. Either the warrior respected the maiden for her gallant attempt at resistance, or he realised the importance of doing nothing to offend the powerful Pagarch of Babylon. He sent Armenosa back to her father with all honour, and the Pagarch's difficulty was solved. From henceforth there could be little doubt as to which of the rival powers was the 'rising sun.'

¹ The story of Armenosa is taken from El Wakedi, and not from the papyri or from the chronicle, which is here imperfect.

He did not venture, however, openly to avow himself the friend of the invaders. Babylon was strongly fortified and well garrisoned by the Imperial troops. It must be remembered that the Nile ran farther to the east than it does now, and that the city of Babylon was connected with the island of Rhoda—also strongly fortified—by a bridge of boats. Another bridge of boats connected Rhoda with the west bank of the Nile, where Gizeh now lies. This town has existed under a more ancient name from remote times, but it was little more than a northern suburb of Memphis. Memphis, though still rich in beautiful relics of pagan times, was already a defenceless and half-ruined city. Babylon once taken, both she and all the other rich cities of the south must fall an easy prey to the conqueror. The policy of the Pagarch George was to aid Amr in the capture of Babylon, but he still remained outwardly the servant of the Emperor and the friend of the commander of the garrison.

Meanwhile Heraclius, hearing of the invasion of Egypt, and knowing well the weakness of his own hold over that country, sent his confidential agent, the Patriarch Cyrus, to treat with Amr and offer him money to withdraw from the country. Amr was already encamped before Babylon, and had begun the famous siege of that almost impregnable fortress. It is said that Cyrus went so far as to offer not only tribute, but the Emperor's daughter Eudocia, or some other member of the royal family, in marriage to the Caliph Omar. The negotiations fell through; Amr already understood that the Pagarch George was far more powerful than the Patriarch Cyrus, and the latter only succeeded in displeasing his own master Heraclius, who summoned him to Constantinople and overwhelmed him with reproaches for his presumption in the matter of Eudocia. Indeed, Cyrus would have paid for his proposals with his life, had not the fall of Babylon and the danger of Alexandria made his presence necessary in the latter city, where his influence was very great.

Amr was too wise to keep the whole of his army idle before Babylon during those seven months. He sent to Omar for reinforcements, and as soon as they came he despatched troops with all secrecy to the Fayoum, apparently to cut off possible reinforcements from the Imperial armies in that direction. However, the Arabs found the Byzantine troops ready to oppose them on the other side when they proposed to cross the river, and retreated, but managed to carry off a great number of sheep and goats. By this time the Byzantine generals in the Delta, Theodosius and Anastasius, had effected a junction with the troops at Babylon, by which the garrison was considerably strengthened. They also sent reinforcements to the Fayoum, but under command of one Leontius, who is described as being fat, lazy, and without practical experience of war. He left half his troops with the general who had succeeded to the command in the Fayoum (one had already fallen in fight with the Moslems), and returned with the rest 'to report the condition of affairs' to his superiors.

For seven months Amr spent himself in unsuccessful attacks upon Babylon and in a fruitless siege. He posted his troops in three divisions—one at On or Heliopolis, to cut off reinforcements from the north; one on the north-east or landward side of Babylon; and one at Tendounyas (Greek: Tiantônios), a fort on the bank of the river to the south-west of Babylon, of which nothing remains but some ruined foundations, now at some distance from the river-bank.

Egypt looked on passively while her fate was thus decided by a combat between the armies of two alien nations in her midst. Side with the Imperial troops they would not; yet their consciences forbade the Egyptians openly to espouse the cause of the infidels. They left the issue, as their own historian implies, to the judgment of God.

That Babylon fell at last by fraud or stratagem, and not by assault or capitulation, is agreed on all hands; but it is hard to reconcile the conflicting statements of various writers, and say with certainty what did happen. The popular story is that George (the Makaukas) 'persuaded' the garrison to retire from the fortress to the island of Rhoda, and that the Arabs, having timely notice from the pagarch, at once occupied the fortress. That George would have done so if he could, and that he did give secret information to the Arabs of all the intended movements of the Byzantine general, there is no reason to doubt. But a study of the field of operations on the spot renders it impossible to believe that any Byzantine general could have been deluded into thinking the island of Rhoda a better position for his garrison than the citadel of Babylon ; and the undoubted evidence we possess of the loyalty of the Imperial troops renders it equally impossible to believe that they were willing agents in a treacherous desertion of their post. It seems better to reject the popular tradition and to accept instead the far more credible account given by John of Nikius.

His version is that by a feint Amr drew the greater part of the garrison out in an attack upon his troops. When the Imperial soldiers believed themselves to have driven off the besieging army, another body of Arab troops cut off their retreat from behind and surrounded them on all sides. A terrible battle took place, in which the Byzantines sold their lives dearly. Eventually a remnant of them broke through the ranks of the Moslems, and succeeded in reaching the bridge of boats and making good their retreat on the island of Rhoda. Only 300 soldiers were left in Babylon, and they hastily entrenched themselves in the citadel, leaving the town perforce to be occupied by the Arabs. Here they held out for some time longer ; but at length, seeing the hopelessness of their position, they agreed to abandon all their war material and to withdraw from the citadel on condition that they were allowed to join the remnant of the army in Rhoda and to retreat to the north unmolested.

The pagarch had already made terms with Amr, which included all the non-Byzantine inhabitants of Egypt. He stipulated that the Egyptians should be left absolutely free as far as their religion was concerned, on condition of paying tribute and making no resistance to the occupation of the country by the Arabs. Amr swore to observe the proposed conditions, on the one hand with the pagarch and the Egyptians, on the other with the general and the Byzantine troops.

On hearing of the fall of Babylon, Domentianus,¹ the general commanding in the Fayoum, left the chief city of that province with all his troops by night, and abandoned the whole district to the Arabs. They struck the river apparently at some point north of Gizeh, and fled towards Alexandria without any attempt to join forces with the Babylonian troops, whose idea appears to have been to retreat on Nikius,² and there concentrate their forces for a final stand. This, however, Amr gave them no time to do. He did, it seems, allow them to begin their retreat northwards without molestation, but no sooner were they well away than he started with a division of his army to follow and cut them off.

He first came up with the troops which had fled from the Fayoum under Domentianus, who showed no fight at all. Their general, hearing of the approach of the Moslems, flung himself into a small boat, and, setting sail for Alexandria, abandoned his soldiers to their fate. They were not slow to follow his example. They flung down their arms on the bank and scrambled for the boats. But the boatmen, sharing the panic, took flight also, and made the best of their way back to their native province. The Byzantine soldiers were left to the mercy of the Arabs, who surrounded them on the river and massacred them in cold blood. It is said that only one man, Zacharias, who was 'a gallant warrior,' escaped to tell the tale.

¹ This name is probably corrupt.

² Nikius is the Greek name not only of a city, but of a district called the Isle of Nikius, lying between two branches of the river. Both the district, which was a diocese, and the city had but one name also in Egyptian—Pshati. This older name is still preserved, but given to a comparatively modern hamlet in the same district—Ibshadi.

On the other hand, the retreat of the Babylonian garrison deserves to be more widely celebrated than it is. They could only have been a few hundred men at most, and for three weeks they fought their way back to liberty against an enemy greatly superior in numbers and well mounted, through a population at the best indifferent and for the most part openly hostile. The militia, or irregular troops belonging to the Green and Blue factions, equally and openly refused to fight against the invaders. It must be remembered that little or nothing was known of the newcomers by the common folk, except the fact that, unlike the Byzantine oppressors, for whom hatred had become an hereditary passion in the breast of every Egyptian, they were a circumcised nation, who believed in one God and claimed to be religious reformers. Even without the treason of the pagarch the Egyptians were ready to welcome the Arabs, though before six months were over they began to realise how great their mistake had been. Meanwhile they held aloof, and remained passive spectators as the retreating Byzantines were pushed back inch by inch, as it were, fighting every day, and each day with diminished numbers, but without a thought of flight or surrender. At Khereu¹ they formed once more against the Arabs, and fought a pitched battle with the same ill-success. But they made good their retreat into Alexandria, and prepared to defend that city to the end.

Egypt was now, as John of Nikius expresses it, a prey to Satan. The Moslems spread over the delta, plundering, burning, and massacring wherever they went. The rival Egyptian nobles—Menas, chief of the Greens, and Cosmas, chief of the Blues—carried on, like Ishmaelites, a kind of guerilla warfare with Moslems, Byzantines, and each other; with anyone, in short, who came in their way. Amr, however, was gradually concentrating all his forces upon Alexandria. He left a sufficient garrison in Babylon, but broke up the great camp there¹ and moved the bulk of his army northwards. On his way he took the city of Nikius, with terrible slaughter, though no attempt was made at resistance. They put to the sword everyone they met, 'in the streets and in the churches, men, women, and children alike, sparing none.'

¹ Khereu, now El Kerioum, about twenty miles from Alexandria, whence it used to be considered the first halting-place.

Heraclius had hastily despatched Cyrus to Alexandria to assist in the defence of that city, and by this time not only all the Byzantine troops in Egypt, but all the civilians of that nationality who could do so, forsaking their houses and goods, had collected within her walls for safety. There was little hope of safety, however; for Alexandria, like the rest of Egypt, was torn by internal dissensions, and unity of action was impossible.

The general in command was Theodore, and the only other Byzantine general remaining appears to have been the cowardly Domentianus. Among the civilians who had taken refuge in Alexandria were two of high official rank ; one of whom was a Monothelite Egyptian, named Menas, and the other a brother to the late Byzantine Patriarch George, whose name was Philiades, and who was probably of Greek extraction. Domentianus was at feud with both these men, and also with the Patriarch Cyrus, his own brother-in-law. Theodore was so greatly disgusted with the conduct of Domentianus that he refused to espouse his quarrel even against the Egyptian Menas. Domentianus therefore recruited on his own account all the Blues he could find in Alexandria for his protection, and Menas followed suit by enrolling all the Greens in the city under his private standard. Naturally it was not long before the two parties were at open war in the streets. It was with the greatest difficulty that Theodore suppressed the riots, and degraded Domentianus from his rank of general. Meanwhile the Arabs were closing round them on all sides, and in the autumn of the year 640 the siege had begun.

¹ Then occurred—so runs the graceful legend which shines out from a background of treachery and bloodshed like a gleam of sunshine on a day of storm—a curious incident. When the order was given to strike the tents of the Moslem camp, some one told Amr that a pair of doves had built their nest on the roof of his tent, and that the young ones were not yet fledged. Amr at once gave orders that they should not be disturbed, and that his tent should be left standing as it was until his return from Alexandria.

Though supplies were cut off by land, the sea was always open to the Alexandrians, and this accounts for the fact that, in spite of all her internal weakness, Alexandria held out against the Moslems for more than a year. At first they confidently expected succour from Constantinople, but the state of affairs there was not favourable to so costly and difficult an enterprise as the reconquest of Egypt. Heraclius was already stricken for death, and breathed his last in February 641. His eldest son Constantine was a hopeless invalid ; and the incestuous marriage of Heraclius with his niece Martina, whose infant son he desired to share the throne with Constantine, had turned the whole power of the Church against him.

When the news of his death reached Alexandria, Theodore felt that all hope was gone. What his personal feelings about the succession were, we do not know; but Domentianus, Menas, and the Patriarch Cyrus agreed in desiring peace with the Moslems, and their united influence with the principal men of the city was too strong for him. Surrender became a question of time and terms.

The one opportunity that fate had put into their hands had been thrown away. On one occasion, we are told, Amr himself, with his second in command and his freedman, was taken prisoner by the Byzantines in a brilliant sally, and brought before Theodore. No one knew the name and rank of their prisoner; and when Amr by his haughty bearing was in danger of revealing himself, he was saved by the presence of mind of his freedman, who pressed forward and struck him on the mouth, bidding him hold his peace before his betters. Amr's second in command then took the conversation on himself, and contrived to persuade Theodore and Cyrus to send them 'back to Amr' with proposals for a truce. It was only the tumultuous rejoicings of the Moslem army at the unexpected return of their leaders which revealed to the Alexandrians the opportunity they had lost.

A desperate attack which left the Arabs for a short time masters of the city brought matters to a crisis. The Byzantines did, indeed, succeed in dislodging them again, owing to the rashness of the Moslem general, but it was felt vain to continue the struggle any longer. Cyrus was empowered to treat with Amr for the surrender of the city and the withdrawal of the Byzantines from Egypt.

The terms, if we may take them from John of Nikius, were as good as they could have expected. Eleven months' cessation of hostilities was granted to allow all Byzantines living in Egypt, who desired to do so, to leave the country. A large sum of money was demanded as their ransom, and it was agreed that those who preferred to remain in the country should pay tribute in common with the native Egyptians to the Moslems. All the Byzantine troops were to withdraw with the honours of war, taking with them that which belonged to them. A solemn undertaking was given that they should never attempt to re-enter the country, and one hundred hostages—fifty from the army, and fifty civilians—were to be given till the engagement should be carried out.

On their part the Moslems promised that they would observe the same terms with the Byzantine Christians as they had already promised to the Egyptians; that they would take no church from them, nor attempt to interfere in their religious affairs. Curiously enough, the last clause of this treaty stipulated that the Jews should be allowed to live in peace in Alexandria. Probably the community had undertaken, on this condition, to find the greater part of the money which was paid to the Moslems.

Cyrus returned to the city and laid the proposed agreement before Theodore and the other chief men of the various parties; but there was some demur, and eventually they proposed to send an express to Constantinople and ask Constantine's sanction before concluding the agreement. It thus happened that the Moslem general and his army entered the town to receive the promised ransom before the surrender had been publicly announced. The population flew to oppose their entry, and a troop of soldiers was hastily despatched to restrain the mob and assure them that peace had been made by the Patriarch

Cyrus. On this the fury of the mob turned itself against Cyrus, and they clamoured for his life. Cyrus, who had plenty of courage, came out and faced the howling mob, who, instead of falling upon him, gradually quieted down to hear what he had to say. Then he made them an address which so worked upon their feelings that they were covered with shame, and offered willingly to bring their gold towards the payment of the ransom.

Thus, in the December of the year 641, Egypt passed under the Moslem yoke, from which—whether under Arab, Circassian, or Turk—she has never since been able to free herself, and which slowly but surely has crushed out her art, her civilisation, her learning, her religion, and well-nigh her very life; for of the four millions who make up the present population of Egypt¹ there are barely seven hundred thousand who can claim beyond dispute to be the true descendants of the ancient Egyptians and the enduring witnesses through centuries of persecution for the faith of Christ.

¹ Since the above was written, a new census has been taken (in 1897). The figures are not yet published, but it is currently reported that the total population is now over eight millions, of which about nine hundred thousand are acknowledged Christians of the National Church of Egypt

PART II

CHAPTER I

THE NEW MASTERS

A.D. 642
A.M. 358
A.H. 20

It was thirty years before the commencement of our present era that Egypt exchanged the yoke of the Ptolemies for that of the Romans. It was in the year 642 A.D. that the treason of a renegade native delivered her into the hands of the Arabs. Though Egypt had been more or less Christian since the preaching of St. Mark, her faith had been at variance with that of her masters during the greater part of these six centuries.

Until 323 the State religion of Egypt was pagan ; from about 340 to 380 it was generally Arian ; and after 451 it became, to give it the name used by Egyptian historians, Chalcedonian. The National Church of Egypt, whether right or wrong in her rejection of Chalcedon, fairly claims that she has remained ever the same—rejecting all later creeds than that of Nicea, and refusing to acknowledge any Pope but her own. Since the conquest of the country by the Arabs the State religion has always been Moslem, and has gradually absorbed into itself the greater part of the Egyptian nation. Still there are—not seven thousand, but more than seven hundred thousand, who have not bowed the knee to Baal; and with a pathetic pride those who have remained faithful call themselves, not the Church, but the nation.

It has been a popular notion for some centuries that Europe owes to the Arabs her science and much of her learning. In one sense this is partly true, for what they were able to assimilate in course of time from the ancient civilisations which they destroyed they passed on in a more or less imperfect form to Europe; but a careful study of history shows us that they originated nothing of value. The 'Arabs' who in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries invented the Arab art and architecture which spread through the Saracen world were Greek, Armenian, and Circassian rulers who employed Egyptian architects and developed existing styles. The very names which used to be quoted as proof of an Arabic origin are found by modern research to be Greek or Egyptian, pronounced or written as if they were Arabic. (For instance, 'alchemy' is of 'El Khemi' or Egypt.) In Egypt their physicians, their architects, their engineers, and their artisans were all natives of the country, and for some centuries Christians as well. Even now any place of trust, or any post where superior intelligence is needed, is filled by a Copt, and generally by a Christian Copt. This may appear a startling assertion to make, but it will be borne out by anyone who will take the trouble to study the history of Egypt under the Moslems, and who will put aside popular prejudice in examining her condition at this day. The Arabs, and after them the Turks, were splendid soldiers, and had some virtues which the Egyptians would have done well to emulate; but at heart they were, and have remained, barbarian. Their idea of government is personal aggrandisement, and their idea of civilisation personal luxury.¹

In the outset of their career the Arabs, however, were far superior to personal luxury. Their food was of the simplest, their couch of the roughest, and they despised the refinements which they afterwards so coarsely imitated. Amr was almost aghast at the wealth and splendour of Alexandria, and wrote to Omar in extravagant terms of his conquest. But though he writes much of the baths and the shops, he says nothing of the books or the works of art which still adorned that city, and everyone knows the story of the library. Gibbon throws doubt upon its destruction, but his only good argument against it is the silence of the contemporary writers, and this is by no means conclusive. It was not till they had lived among the Egyptians for a century or two that the Arabs realised what they had done. At the time it must have seemed to them a most trifling incident. One of the most learned of the Alexandrian scholars of that day—one hesitates to call him John Philopompus, because it seems almost impossible that he can have lived so long—sought an interview with the barbarian conqueror, and entreated that the books of the Alexandrian library should not be dispersed or destroyed, but might be delivered to his guardianship. Amr, we learn, was inclined to grant his request, but inquired with curiosity what he could possibly want with the musty old parchments. The scholar replied indignantly, but incautiously, that some of them were worth all the riches of Alexandria put together. Amr replied that, if so, he was not empowered to give them to the first man who asked for them, and referred the question to Omar.

¹ The pure-bred Arab in Egypt, represented by the present Beduin tribes, is still superior to personal luxury; but the reigning Arabs of the eighth to the eleventh century degenerated almost as quickly as their Turkish successors.

The Kaliph's decision was simple. 'If these books contain nothing more than that which is written in the book of God (el Koran), they are useless; if they contain anything contrary to the sacred book, they are pernicious; in either case, burn them.'

It is written that the books sufficed for six months' fuel for the public baths of Alexandria.¹

While engaged in arranging the affairs of Alexandria the Moslem general received a strange embassy. The monks of Nitria and Scetis had mixed but little with politics for some time, and we do not hear of their taking part in any of the petty civil wars and futile rebellions of the sixth century. But the tidings that the Byzantines had been driven out of the land by a new power, whose very name was unknown to them, but who—so the rumour ran—was favourable to the Egyptians and to their National Church, drew them once more from their desert retreat. In solemn procession they came, barefoot and roughly clad, but with all the dignity of an independent state, to treat with the new conqueror. They demanded a guarantee of their safety and liberties, and the return of their rightful Patriarch, Benjamin, to Alexandria. Amr must by this time have been well aware of the importance of conciliating the National Church. He at once gave the monks the charter they desired—which Makrizi says that he saw still preserved in one of their monasteries eight hundred years afterwards—and wrote a letter to the Patriarch Benjamin to assure him that he was henceforth free to show himself as openly as he pleased. Benjamin lost no time in returning to Alexandria, where he was received with great joy. The Byzantine Patriarch, Cyrus, did not long survive the downfall of all his hopes. He was taken ill on Palm Sunday, and died in three days. A man named Peter was elected—whether by the Court or by the bishops of the Byzantine Church in Egypt is not stated—in his place; but, finding that Benjamin was recognised as the only true Patriarch by Amr, he quietly abandoned his post, and withdrew to Constantinople with the Byzantine refugees. For sixty years after his death no attempt was made to set up a Greek Patriarch in Egypt.

¹ It is true that the ancient library of Alexandria was burnt by Julius Cæsar, but it was shortly after replaced by the rival library of Pergamus.

From Alexandria Amr sent an expedition into Pentapolis, but did not attempt to occupy the country, which, since the Arab conquest, has practically ceased to form part of the Egyptian dominions. He contented himself with carrying off an enormous booty, consisting chiefly of cattle, and a great number of captives, who were reduced to slavery. After this he returned to Babylon, and began to build a new town for himself and his followers, a little to the north of the older city. For, barbarian as he was, the recorded actions of Amr show him to have been not merely a successful soldier, but a statesman; and he fully realised the importance of keeping his army separate from the inhabitants of Babylon and Memphis. He exacted enormous sums from the conquered people, but for the rest he let them alone, and governed them through men of their own nation. In his time the promise which he had given of religious liberty was strictly kept; justice, even if it strongly resembled tyranny, was dealt alike to Melkite and Monophysite, and the native Egyptians were ready to acknowledge that they were better off under the infidel than they had been under 'the Chalcedonians.' Amr had the Nilometers from Philæ to Rhoda put into sorely needed repair, and gave orders that Trajan's Canal, since then known as El Khalig,¹ should be cleared out and prolonged. He regulated and simplified the administration of justice, but permitted the Egyptians to be judged by their own compatriots, and the decisions of the Moslem cadi were only binding on the army of occupation. He built the first mosque in Egypt on the site where the present mosque of Amr, though more than once rebuilt, still stands; but all the columns needed for it were brought at a later date from the churches of Memphis—a precedent which has been followed ever since, the Arabs having no faculty for stone-carving, though in time they learned how to cut a plain shaft with a mere block for base and capital.

While Amr was thus usefully employed in Egypt, the Caliph Omar was assassinated, and one of the first acts of his successor, Osman, was to recall Amr from the scene of his successes, and nominate his brother (the same Abdallah who, according to some authorities, had served in Egypt, and was the first to enter Nubia) Viceroy of Egypt. Abdallah was appointed in 647 (A.H. 25), but cared little to enter on his new duties. He increased the tribute payable by the Egyptians, but thought more of extending the Arab conquests than of governing well the countries which had submitted to him. One expedition had already been sent into Nubia, or the country south of Assuan, and the first thought of the new governor when he went to Egypt was to avenge its comparative failure.

¹ This ancient canal is now being filled up (1897) by order of the English sanitary authorities. It is not known yet whether the Pharaonic festival of the Nile will be discontinued in consequence.

CHAPTER II

THE SOUDAN EXPEDITION

A.D. 653
A.M. 369
A.H. 31

THOUGH the Roman or Byzantine rulers of Egypt had never really established themselves for any length of time beyond the limit of Philæ, the bloodless conquest of paganism by Christianity in all these southern countries had been going on steadily for centuries. The Christian religion at the time of the Arab invasion was professed not only in the valley of the Nile, but far down to the southern frontier of Abyssinia, on the eastern side of the African continent. All these countries acknowledged the head of the National Church of Egypt as their Pope. There were a number of politically independent Christian kingdoms between Assuan and Abyssinia, which, it must be confessed, fought a good deal among themselves; but on the whole, as even Mohammedan historians acknowledge, this part of Africa was never so well settled, well governed, and well cultivated as at this time. Not even Egypt herself has suffered so terribly and her civilisation been so effectually destroyed by the Arab and Turkish invasions as these kingdoms, which under the influence of Christianity had but just begun to emerge from the chaotic condition which we have learnt to regard as the normal state of the African interior.

Opinions differ as to whether Amr marched in person against Nubia in 643 (A.H. 21) or sent an army under the command of one of his Emirs. In the 'Book of the Conquests,' by Ahmed el Koufi, the author writes as follows:—

Amru ebn Aas was in Egypt when he received a letter from Omar, commanding him to march on Nubia and conquer this country, the country of the Berbers; of Barkah; of Tripoli in the west; and all the provinces belonging to them—Tandjah, Afrahenjah, until Sous el Aksa.

Amr, the writer adds, had intended to send the sum of ten thousand dinars, which he had just received as tribute from the Alexandrians, to Omar; but on receiving these orders he divided them instead among the soldiers of his army, and after making the necessary preparations sent Abdallah ebn Said into Nubia with 20,000 (?) men.

Abdallah allowed his soldiers unbridled licence; they spread themselves over the country, murdering and pillaging on all sides. After the first surprise, however, the Nubians gathered together for the defence of their country to the number of 100,000 (?), and attacked the Moslems with so much courage that, says their historian, 'they had never experienced so terrible a shock.' One of the principal Moslem warriors told the writer afterwards that he had 'never seen men aim their arrows with such skill and precision as these Nubians.' He declared that during the war it was not uncommon for a Nubian to shout to a Moslem to know in which particular member he preferred to be struck; and if the Arab mockingly answered the challenge and mentioned any particular part of his person, he instantly received an arrow in the place indicated, without fail. But 'they preferred to aim at the eyes of their enemies.'

In the end the victory remained with the Arabs, but they gained little by their success at first, not even a single prisoner, since the Nubians fought to the death. The Moslems judged it expedient to retreat across the frontier, and it might have been long before they ventured again into a country where they had met with so stubborn a resistance, had it not been for the rashness of the Nubians themselves, who in the following years made more than one expedition into Egypt, and did much damage. The Arabs after the death of Omar were greatly hindered by internal dissensions, and Amr was recalled from Egypt by the new Kaliph, while the new governor, Abdallah ebn Said, did not go near the place for some time. Had the Egyptians combined with the Nubians to expel the invaders at this juncture, there is little doubt that they could have succeeded with ease. But the Heaven-sent leader of men, so greatly needed, did not appear, and the opportunity was lost. The Nubians exhausted themselves in objectless raids, and in the year 653 (A.H. 31) Abdallah, who had now taken over the government of Egypt, marched again into Nubia with the resolute purpose of subduing that troublesome country.

He penetrated as far as Dongola (the Dongola of the seventh century was nearly a hundred miles south of the present town) and laid siege to that city. He constructed a stone-throwing machine, the like of which had never been seen among the Nubians, and directed it, either by accident or design, against the principal church of the city, to such good purpose that in a short time it lay in ruins.

The fall of their great church seems to have intimidated the Nubians as nothing else could have done, and their king (whose name is variously given as Kalidourat, Bali-daroub, and Kalidourdat—none of which versions are likely to be correct) opened negotiations for peace.

Eventually a formal treaty was concluded between the Arabs and the Nubians, in which the former agreed not to invade Nubia, and to give aid, if called upon, in the wars of the latter. In return the Nubians were to allow a mosque to be built in Dongola for those Arabs who might desire to settle there, and to see that no harm was done to it, and no Moslem annoyed or hindered in the exercise of his religion. They were even to hold themselves responsible for the cleaning and lighting of this mosque. Moslems were to be allowed free entry into the country, but no fugitive slave from the Arabs in Egypt was to be given shelter.

The worst feature of the treaty was the clause which laid the foundation of the Arab slave trade—so different an affair from the domestic servitude which has existed from time immemorial in Oriental countries. Three hundred and sixty slaves from the interior, of both sexes, among whom should be found no old man or old woman or child below the age of puberty, were to be brought every year to the Governor of Assuan, for the Iman. As may be imagined, it was not long before forty slaves were required as a backsheesh for the Governor of Egypt in addition to the three hundred and sixty forwarded to the reigning Iman. Presents of wine, wheat, barley, and fine robes for the king were to be sent in exchange; but occasionally the Mohammedan governor for the time being had scruples about the wine. Another question of conscience subsequently arose—whether, so long as the tribute of slaves was duly paid, it was just to take slaves from Nubia beyond the stipulated number. The Mohammedan judges to whom the question was referred made no difficulties in deciding that all slaves taken in the wars which constantly prevailed in these countries—which, indeed, were bound to prevail for the purpose of obtaining slaves for the tribute—and all those who had been reduced to a condition of slavery in their own country, were legitimate trade.

It is also recorded by Moslem authorities that one of the principal inhabitants of Nubia presented a mumba, or pulpit, to the new mosque of Amr at Fostat, and sent Victor, his own carpenter, who was a native of Denderah, to fix it in its place.

The Egyptians were not slow to feel the difference between the government of Amr and that of Abdallah, and in the year 657 they showed unmistakable signs of preparing for a general rebellion. Abdallah left the country to consult the Kaliph Osman; but a conspiracy had already been formed by the Arabs themselves against Osman, and Abdallah was hardly out of Egypt before that country was taken possession of by one of the principal conspirators, whom the army of occupation appear to have readily received. Osman hastily promised all that was demanded of him by the Arab rebels, and in particular the request of the Egyptian party—that Abdallah should no longer be their governor. But secret instructions having been found on one of Osman's messengers that the new Governor of Egypt, Mohammed ebn Bekr, was to be assassinated as soon as he reached the country, the indignant Arabs appear to have made common cause with the Egyptians against the Kaliph. They marched upon Medina, killed Osman, and elected Ali in his place (A.H. 36). In the commotions which followed, Egypt was left without a governor ; two were named, but were dismissed or died without entering the country, and the appointment of Mohammed ebn Bekr was finally confirmed in A.H. 37.

The Moslems, however, were still disunited. Ali reigned in Persia, Arabia, and Egypt ; but Syria was in the hands of Moawiyah, and Amr was on his side. In the year 660 (A.H. 41) the assassination of Ali and his son Hussein, with the abdication of his elder son Hassan, left Moawiyah sole master of the Moslem world.

CHAPTER III

ABD EL AZIZ

A.D. 660
A.M. 456
A.H. 41

MOAWIYAH is the first Kaliph of the dynasty of the Ommyades, so called after Ommyah, the great-grandfather of Moawiyah. Egypt had reason to rejoice in his accession, for he at once restored the governor whom they had respected as well as feared—Amr ebn Aas. He died, however, about a year afterwards, and Moawiyah sent one of his younger brothers, Atbah, to govern Egypt. Atbah dying within the year, another man was appointed and speedily dismissed; so that Egypt had three successive governors within as many years. Finally, in 664 (A.H. 45) Mosleima was appointed Governor of Egypt, and remained there till his death in 681 (A.H. 62). During these seventeen years and the three years of his successor, Said ebn Zezid, Egypt remained in comparative peace, though in all other parts of the Saracen Empire there were constant dissensions and civil wars, owing to the struggles of the different Moslem leaders for supreme power.

About a year before the accession of Moawiyah, Benjamin, the National Patriarch of Egypt, died at a ripe age. He had laboured unremittingly to encourage and strengthen the members of the National Church, to refund the monasteries which had been pillaged and destroyed in the recent commotions, and to reform the morals of his people. He had sent a new Metropolitan to Abyssinia, and with him a monk named Tekla Haimanot, of great sanctity, who is held in reverence there to this day, and credited with being the first founder of monasticism in that country. Benjamin's last act was to consecrate a new church to St. Macarius in the desert settlement of Nitria.

His successor was a man named Agatho, who had for some time acted as his coadjutor, and who reigned alone eighteen years. He suffered a good deal from the oppressions of a certain Theodosius, who belonged to the Greek Church—as the remains of the Orthodox Byzantine Church must from this time be called in Egypt—and used the power which he had obtained from the Moslem authorities to levy heavy contributions from the Egyptian Church. At one time, indeed, it is said that Theodosius gave orders that if the Patriarch showed himself beyond the precincts of his own house in Alexandria he should be stoned. There must have been some personal enmity between the two, for on the death of Agatho, Theodosius, without apparently any show of legal right, affixed seals to everything in the Patriarchal residence; so that the household was in actual distress, and compelled to appeal to the Moslem authorities, who immediately redressed their grievance.

Theodosius died soon afterwards, but the feud did not die with him. The new Patriarch was John of Sebennytos (Samanhoud), and not long after his accession he gave offence to the Emir of Egypt by omitting to send him compliments and presents on his entry into the province. It is recorded that, so far from intentional rudeness, John was busy with the affairs of his people, and had not even heard of the governor's arrival; but a brother-in-law of Theodosius took occasion to suggest that John was rich, and could well afford a fine.

The Emir, whose name is given differently by different writers, but who was probably Said ebn Yezid, sent for the Patriarch and demanded a fine of one hundred thousand pieces of gold. In vain the Patriarch protested that he had not so much as a hundred drachmæ of his own. He refused to save himself by yielding up the Church funds entrusted to him, and was delivered to the torture, his feet being placed in a vessel of hot coals. He remained steadfast, and was only saved by the sudden illness of the Emir's wife, which struck the Emir with superstitious terror. Still the Patriarch was kept in prison, until the Egyptians promised a ransom of ten thousand pieces of gold for the liberty of their Patriarch, and he was set free. It is recorded of him that the day on which he was let out of prison, being Maundy Thursday, he went straight to the cathedral to take part in the ceremony of washing the beggars' feet, and celebrated the Holy Communion before returning to his house.

It was either during the reign of this Patriarch or that of his predecessor that the great church of St. Mark was rebuilt in Alexandria. Probably both took part in the work, as both are credited with the restoration. Except in the case of the Patriarch himself, whose sufferings have just been related, the Egyptian Church does not seem to have been oppressed during this time: but the country suffered from a grievous famine for three years, which taxed its resources heavily.

In the year 683 (A.H. 64) the Kaliph Yezid died, and his son, Moawiyah II., only reigned six weeks after him. There were two claimants for the Kaliphate—Abdallah ebn Zobeir and Merwan ebn el Hakim, who had been proclaimed at Damascus. Zobeir sent his agent, Abd-er-Rahman, to seize upon Egypt, always the most important province of the Eastern Empire, whether Saracen or Byzantine. The Governor of Egypt who held for the Ommyades was expelled; but hardly had Abd-er-Rahman established himself in Egypt, when he received news that Merwan himself had invaded the country to enforce his claims. Abd-er-Rahman hastily surrounded the new city of Fostat with a deep fosse, and then marched out to give battle. The two armies met at Ein el Shams (Heliopolis), and after an obstinate struggle victory declared for Merwan. Abd-er-Rahman sought safety in flight.

Merwan took possession of the Moslem capital (Fostat) and nominated his son, Abd el Aziz, Governor of Egypt. On the day of his entry the son of the great conqueror Amr ebn Aas died in his house at Fostat. He had lived a retired life, taking no part in politics, but so disturbed was the state of affairs in the city that the Arabs dared not give his father's son a public funeral. His body was hastily interred within the precincts of his own house.

Merwan left Egypt in the same year, and had hardly reached Syria before he died suddenly of the plague. The struggle continued for ten years between the rivals for the Kaliphate; but Abd el Aziz held Egypt for his brother, Abd el Melek, and kept the country in subjection during his lifetime. On the whole his government was good, but, though he treated the people with more or less justice, he systematically oppressed the National Church, rightly recognising that in this organisation and its head, the Egyptian Patriarch, he had to reckon with his only formidable rival. When the Patriarch John died, he sent peremptory orders that the election of his successor should take place in Babylon, which now formed the southern suburb of Fostat, instead of at Alexandria.¹

The man chosen was Isaac, a monk of the convent of St. Macarius. Shortly after his accession, Isaac received messengers sent from one of the kingdoms of Southern Nubia, or the Soudan, detailing a grievous state of things in their country. They had hardly any bishops left, they said, and greatly needed them; but the king of the northern kingdom (though nominally a Christian) had allied himself with the Saracens, and made constant war on his southern neighbour—probably to collect slaves for the yearly tribute. Indeed, the writers feared that even if bishops were sent to them, they would not be allowed to pass in safety.

Isaac wrote at once to the king of the northern kingdom, entreating him to give a safe-conduct for the desired bishops, and pointing out to him that he must answer for it before God, if by his fault the Churches of the southern kingdom remained deserted. What expressions he may have used about the Moslems in this letter we know not, but it was represented to Abd el Aziz that Isaac was intriguing with the southern kingdom against the Moslem yoke, and the Emir promptly arrested the Patriarch and condemned him to be beheaded. Abd el Aziz was persuaded, however, to delay the execution of the sentence till the messengers could be brought back and the incriminating letters shown to him. The friends of Isaac in this emergency adroitly substituted other letters of the same tenor, but couched in language absolutely void of offence to the most jealous Moslem, for those which the messengers had in their charge; and by this device the life of the Patriarch was saved.

¹ After this date the election of the Patriarch generally took place at Babylon, but the consecration was always performed in the Church of the Angels at Alexandria until the end of the eleventh century. The Patriarch-elect promised to pay from his official revenues an annual sum to the clergy of Alexandria for the maintenance of their churches.

Shortly afterwards a malignant epidemic broke out at Fostat, and the Emir hastily removed from the town. He went to Helwan (not the modern town of that name, which under the patronage of a later Moslem ruler has grown up round the sulphur baths, but an earlier Helwan by the river), where he fixed his residence, and changed a small country village into a handsomely built town. Here he built mosques and planted palm-trees, and even granted permission to the Christians to adorn his town with two churches for the sake of their architectural beauty. Much of his material he probably brought across the river from Memphis, which was already almost deserted. Towards the end of his reign Abd el Aziz built himself also a palace at Fostat; indeed, in reference to his passion for building he is called by the Eastern historians a second Pharaoh.

In 688 (A.H. 69-70) the Patriarch Isaac died, and the first choice of the Egyptians fell upon John, Abbot of Nitria, who was therefore brought by the bishops and a large number of the most influential Egyptians to Abd el Aziz, in order that the latter might confirm the election, since it was clearly understood now by the Egyptians that, unless this compliment were duly paid to the Moslem authorities on the election of a Patriarch, fine or persecution would be the result.

Among the followers of John was a monk named Simon, who was a Syrian by birth and greatly respected by the Nitrian community, where he dwelt. One of the bishops was overheard to remark that he was the right man for the Patriarchate, and the Emir seized on this pretext to declare that the election was not unanimous, while at the same time he tauntingly asked if there were no Egyptian in the country of sufficient merit to be elected to the Patriarchate. The Egyptians present respectfully intimated that they had chosen an Egyptian, but that the will of God and the Emir's pleasure must decide the matter. Abd el Aziz naturally preferred the Syrian, and, in spite of the protest of Simon himself, he was elected Patriarch instead of John, who appears to have yielded with alacrity in favour of his attendant. The episode was creditable to both, for Simon's first act was to appoint John his coadjutor, and, during the three years which he lived, to follow his advice in all matters.

Simon is revered by the Egyptian Church as a saint, and they even attribute to him the power of working miracles. He kept his monastic rule as strictly as if he were still in his convent, and never tasted flesh. He was zealous for the purity of the national religion, and appointed a superintendent of the Egyptian monasteries to reform the abuses which had crept in among them. The man to whom this important office was entrusted was John of Nikius, whose zeal was beyond question, and who is also known as a historian. Unfortunately his original history has long been lost, and all our knowledge of it is derived from an Ethiopic translation, manifestly full of errors, which was made, according to the very precise note of the translator, an Egyptian monk living in Abyssinia, 'in the year of the world 7594, in the year of Alexander 1947, in the year of our Lord 1594, in the year of the Martyrs 1318, in the year of the Hegira 980, or 1010 by their lunar computation.'

This Ethiopic translation, moreover, is not made from the original work, which was written by John partly in Greek and partly in Egyptian (Coptic), but from an Arabic abridgment of unknown date. Allowing, however, for all these drawbacks, that part of John's chronicle which deals with the events of his own century must always have a certain value, in spite of the lacunæ which are found in the most important parts of the narrative. Nikius, of which island John was bishop, is situated in the Delta, between two branches of the Nile, in the district of Menouf. Its Egyptian name was Pshati; the Arabs call the district Benon Nasr, which is their translation of the Greek name Nikius. The Egyptian name Pshati still survives in one small hamlet called by the Arabs Ibshadi.¹

It is not recorded how long John held his post of inspector of the monasteries, but his zeal eventually brought him into trouble. A monk convicted of adultery was so severely scourged by the bishop's orders that he died on the tenth day, and on this occasion the smouldering discontent broke into open revolt. The bishops made a formal complaint to the Patriarch of the cruelty with which John discharged his office, and he was accordingly deprived ; it seems probable that he was deposed from his bishopric as well. He was already in advanced age, and did not survive his disgrace many years.

¹ Professor Amelineau supposes that this hamlet marks the site of the ancient city of Nikius or Pshati, but has been misled by the name. The present Ibshadi is an entirely modern village, as I convinced myself by personal inspection. There is not a mound near, not even a scar upon the earth like those which the most entirely destroyed towns of Egypt leave upon the face of the earth, far less any fragment of antiquity remaining. A Coptic priest of the district told me that the ancient site of Nikius was marked by the modern town of Zawiet-Razin, and some years afterwards I was able to make an expedition to the place. Zawiet-Razin is certainly within the limits of the area of the ancient Isle of Nikius, and as certainly is the site of an ancient city. I found the remains of a Pharaonic temple, and the remains of pillars, etc., which had belonged to a Christian church. More than that I had not time to see.

During the reign of this Patriarch a question arose in the Egyptian Church about divorce. A large party had become infected by the lax standard prevailing amongst the Mohammedans, and declared, like them, that it was lawful to divorce a wife at pleasure. On being excommunicated by their bishops the members of this party appealed to the Mohammedan Emir. Instead, however, of espousing their cause, as they had confidently expected, Abd el Aziz sent for all the bishops, not only of the Egyptian Church, but of every sect in Egypt, and desired them to hold a Church Council, and settle the matter formally among themselves.

To the credit of Egyptian Christianity it is recorded that sixty-four bishops—of whom the greater part belonged to the National Church, but among whom were found Gaianites and Barsanuphians, as well as Chalcedonians or Melkite bishops—met together at Babylon in 695, and discussed their common affairs without any outbreak of ill-feeling between the different parties. But even while the Council was sitting, news arrived which had a melancholy effect on the fortunes of the Egyptian Church. A revolution had occurred in Constantinople, Justinian had been deposed, and a successful general named Leontius had made himself master of the Imperial throne. Believing the power of the Greek Empire to be seriously lessened by this, the Moslem governor was not so careful to conciliate the Churches in Egypt, and the Christian annalists complain of persecution, which seems, however, to have been confined to isolated acts of oppression and confiscation. The Patriarch, of course, was always a mark for suspicion and extortion, and it was not long before Simon fell under the displeasure of the authorities.

A priest arrived from India to request Simon to consecrate a bishop for his country, who would return with him. This India was probably India proper, as, though Ethiopia and Abyssinia were both often called by that name, the request was not likely to come from them. It was barely twelve years since Isaac had sent a supply of bishops to the Soudanese kingdoms, and this applicant seems to have come from another and more distant community. But Abyssinia never sent for her bishops to the Mother Church of Egypt, only for her Metropolitan, who then ordained in Abyssinia his own bishops. It is probable therefore that the priest was sent from some Christian community in Malabar or other part of India proper.

Simon told the priest that it would be necessary to obtain first the consent of the Emir, and undertook to do so. But meanwhile Theodore, the Gaianite bishop, who perhaps regarded Simon's caution as unworthy truckling, and was not sorry to advance the interests of his own sect, obtained the confidence of the Indian priest, and took upon himself to ordain a bishop for India, who departed, taking with him two priests besides the Indian. They had accomplished twenty days' journey, when they were arrested as spies, and, though the Indian managed to escape, the others were taken before the Kaliph himself, Abd el Melek, who reigned at Damascus. Abd el Melek, regarding their journey as evidence of a conspiracy between the Christians of Egypt and India against the Moslem dominion, condemned the unhappy Egyptians to lose their hands and feet. He then sent them back to their own country with a letter blaming his brother for allowing these spies to leave the country, and ordered that the Patriarch of Egypt should receive two hundred lashes for his presumption in despatching them without leave, and should, moreover, pay a heavy fine.

Simon protested his innocence in vain, but succeeded in obtaining a respite of three days for the production of his witness, the Indian priest. On learning of the Patriarch's danger, this man, with considerable courage, came forward to give evidence in his favour. Simon was pardoned, but the Indian was thrown into prison, and the unhappy Theodore was crucified. The Christian writers assert that several attempts were made by the Moslems to poison Simon, which at length succeeded, after he had reigned over the Church fourteen years. The bishops did not venture immediately to name a successor, and for some time the affairs of the Church were administered by Gregory, Bishop of Kais.¹ In 703 (A.H. 84) they elected Alexander, who was also a monk from the Natron valley. At the time of his accession the government of the country was left almost entirely in the hands of Asabah, eldest son of Abd el Aziz, who used his power to oppress the Christians sorely. One of his principal intimates was Benjamin, a man who had been a deacon in the Church, but was now an apostate. From him Asabah learned how best to oppress and reduce to impotence the Christian population. One of his measures was to impose a poll-tax of a gold piece on every monk in the country, and to order a census to be taken of their number. At the same time he issued a decree that no one in future was to take the monastic vows upon himself without leave from the Moslem governor, and he imposed an extra tax of two thousand gold pieces on the bishops.

¹ A town of great antiquity, called Cynopolis by the Greeks. It still exists under the name of El Kais, in the province of Minieh.

The Egyptian writers see in the circumstances of his death a special manifestation of the wrath of God. He had entered one of the churches at Helwan while the bishop was there, and, seeing a picture of the Virgin and Child, asked the bishop what it was intended to represent. On receiving the explanation he spat upon the picture, swearing that when his time came he would exterminate Christianity from the country. The same night he was troubled by a terrible dream of judgment, which he related the next day to his father, Abd el Aziz. Almost immediately he was attacked by a violent fever, and died after a few hours' illness. His father did not long survive him. He had governed Egypt more than twenty years, during which time the country had at least been free from the horrors of war; and the care of the bridges and canals, so necessary to her prosperity, had not been neglected.

CHAPTER IV

THE TYRANNY OF TWELVE EMIRS

A.D. 705 ABD EL AZIZ was succeeded by a son of the Kaliph, named A.M. 421 Abdallah. During this man's reign the Christians, who
A.H. 86 had hoped for relief on the appointment of a new Emir, found themselves worse off than ever. He invented new tortures for them, and it is said that one of his amusements was to invite a Christian to dinner and then cause his head to be struck off as he sat down. The Patriarch Alexander, desiring to give no just cause of offence, went to pay him the usual complimentary visit on his accession, and was immediately thrown into prison, while three thousand pieces of gold were demanded as his ransom. The Christians who were employed at Court—for their illiterate rulers, however much they may have hated them, have always found it impossible to dispense altogether with their services—used all their influence to obtain some abatement of the sum demanded, but in vain. The most they could do was to procure his release on bail. A deacon named George (Girghis) gave a bond to produce him again in two months, with the money required for his ransom. The unfortunate Patriarch was compelled to set out on a begging tour throughout the Delta; but his people made up the sum, and, apparently regarding this as a proof that the Christians were better off than he had thought, Abdallah trebled the tribute to be paid by them for that year. The persecution became general all over Egypt, and many Christians in despair professed Islam. Others readily offered themselves to suffer for the faith, but not even the dead among them were allowed to be buried till a special burial fee had been paid to the Government. Churches were destroyed, many who could afford to do so left the country, and many died of starvation.

Abdallah died, but Korah ebn Sherik, who succeeded him, continued the persecution of the Christians as fiercely as his predecessor. He demanded from the Patriarch the same backsheesh as he had given Abdallah—three thousand pieces of gold. Alexander protested his poverty, declaring that the former sum had only been raised by begging, and that more was not forthcoming. Korah contemptuously told him that he might go and collect it in Upper Egypt this time, if he liked, but the money must be forthcoming. Alexander went to Upper Egypt, accompanied by his treasurer and his secretary. The people everywhere received him with great joy, and gave what they could. Alexander left his two attendants in the Thebaid to collect money while he himself made his way southward to the Nubian frontier.

It happened that one of the recluses, of whom the Thebaid was full, had lately desired two of his disciples to prepare him a new cell in another place. In digging the foundations for this cell the monks discovered a buried treasure, consisting of no less than five chests full of old Greek coins. Temptation proved too much for the disciples, and they agreed to keep one for themselves, showing the four to their master as the whole of their find. The recluse looked upon it as a direct gift of God to the sore need of His Church, and commanded that the money should at once be sent to the Patriarch. As he had not yet returned from the south country, the four chests were delivered for him to his treasurer and secretary. Instead of keeping it for their Patriarch these two men concealed the fact of its arrival from him, and applied the money to their own uses. Their styles of living, however, and perhaps the archaic character of some of the coin they passed, at length aroused the suspicion of the Moslem authorities. One of them was arrested, and put to the torture till he confessed the theft and pointed out the hiding-place of the four chests.

By this means the money, instead of helping the Patriarch out of his difficulty, only brought him into fresh trouble. The governor refused to believe the story of the treasure trove concealed by the monks, and made a raid on the great church and the bishop's palace in Alexandria in search of the riches which he insisted the Patriarch must really possess. The Patriarch was arrested and brought in chains before the governor, who upbraided him with perjury when he had sworn to his poverty, and threatened him with death. Finally, he let him go again with renewed injunctions to procure the money, but two years of effort only procured a third part of the sum. Moreover, Korah declared that there must be a private mint¹ at the Patriarchate, and sent a band of soldiers to search the premises. Though they could find nothing of the sort, they took the opportunity to scourge the unfortunate Patriarch till the blood flowed. Incidentally we learn that all the plate used in the churches had been taken; for when the Alexandrian ecclesiastics asked for a sum of money usually paid them by the Patriarch at Easter, he represented to them that while he was reduced to celebrate the holy mysteries on glass and wood he could not be supposed to have any money left. Some slight relief, however, was afforded to the unhappy Church by the appointment of a Copt to collect the tribute demanded from them, and a short period of comparative peace followed, of which Alexander took advantage to make a regular pastoral visitation.

¹ It was only in the preceding reign of Abd el Melek that the Arabs had begun to coin money of their own.

It was not long, however, before Korah resumed his persecution, and, finding that thousands were endeavouring to escape by emigration, he appointed an officer for the express purpose of preventing this, and putting to death those who were taken in the act. A pestilence broke out in the country, which added to the misery of the population, but at least it removed Korah, since he shortly caught it and died.

His successor was only in power three months, and even during this short respite we learn that many of the churches in Alexandria were ruined by the forcible removal of their pillars of porphyry and precious marbles, which were coveted by the Moslems for the ornamentation of their mosques.¹ The next governor was Asama ebn

¹ It is a common remark of the modern tourist that the Christians had done the same in their time, and stolen the pillars from the pagan temples for their churches. It is superfluous to assure anyone who has studied the history of Christian Egypt that this remark is untrue. The early Christians of Egypt were particularly careful to use nothing that had served for the worship of the old Egyptian gods. Even when necessity drove them to build their churches inside the strong walls of a deserted temple, they covered the hieroglyphs with plaster, and set up their own pillars in the enclosure. The only instance known to me where pillars from a pagan temple have been used in the construction of a church is at Luxor, where in the present century some old pillars from one of the ruins were presented by a governor to the modern Coptic church. Ancient inscribed stones are occasionally found built into the Yezid, who carried on the relentless persecution of the Christian Egyptians. Especially he disapproved of monks, and, to ensure their payment of the extra tax imposed upon them, he directed that each monk, on paying his tribute money, should be given as receipt an iron ring, on which the name of his convent and the year of the Hegira in which he had paid the money were engraved. This ring or fetter he was always to wear on his right hand; any monk found without it, either in or outside his convent, was put to death by beheading or by the bastinado. Christians were freely mutilated, blinded, and tortured, and the Emir declared himself the heir of all who were put to death for their religion. The emigration of the Christians, in spite of the penalties attached to it, increased to such an extent that at last Asama issued an order that no Egyptian should travel, even from one part of the country to another, without a passport, for which each person had to pay ten dinars.¹ Anyone found travelling without this might be arrested and both ~~their~~ hands amputated. A / his poor widow who had managed to obtain the necessary passport for herself and her son endeavoured to escape with him along the Nile. The son had charge of both passports, and one day as he went down to the river-brink for water an unseen crocodile rose up, seized, and devoured the lad before his mother's eyes. The unhappy woman was left in a strange district, childless, penniless, and passportless. She had to sell her clothes and beg the rest of the money necessary to procure a new passport at once, in order to save her hands.

walls of churches, but so placed that it is evident the builders did not know their significance.

¹ A dinar seems to have been then worth about 12s. of our money.

Egypt was on the point of a general revolt against the Arabs, when news arrived that the Kaliph was dead, and that the first act of his successor, Omar, had been to throw the detested Emir of Egypt into prison, where he afterwards perished miserably. This was in the year 717 (A.H. 99); but the respite from persecution only lasted the length of his reign, which was barely two years. Omar's successor, Yezid, who was a son of Abd el Melek, at once dismissed Ayoub from the government of Egypt, and sent orders with the new governor that every Christian in Egypt should embrace the faith of Islam or leave the country. The unhappy Christians considered themselves fortunate to have even this alternative left them, and took advantage of it in such large numbers that whole districts became deserted. The churches were pulled down, or, if their fabric was saved, at least their pictures and crosses were destroyed; and in many cases the building was turned into a mosque. Emir after Emir succeeded each other in rapid succession according to the caprice of the Kaliphs. Their names will be found, with those of the Kaliphs, in the chronological table, but it is useless to encumber the text with a string of names when there is but one and the same fact to record of each of them—that they despoiled and persecuted the Christians. The subordinate officials generally improved upon the Emir's orders, and one Obeid Allah, who was appointed farmer of taxes under Hassan ebn Yusef, filled up the measure of oppression.

Once more the unhappy Egyptians rose in defence of their lives and liberties, but they had no chance against a well-appointed army of men who had done nothing all their lives but fight and plunder. The Christians gathered together in the eastern half of the Delta in 725 (A.H. 107), and made a gallant stand against the Arab troops, but, unarmed and undrilled as they were, the battle soon became a massacre. The Egyptians did not run away, but were cut down as they stood. The Moslem historian who frankly records the atrocities we have mentioned complacently remarks that the Arabs 'slaughtered a great number.'

Having crushed the rebellion, the Emir summoned the Patriarch to appear before him. Alexander, well knowing what to expect, fled to the coast with Hamoul, Bishop of Wissim, intending to escape by sea. But on arriving at a place called Pariout he was seized with mortal sickness and thankfully rendered up his life of suffering, lamented by the Christians of all denominations. The delay was fatal to the escape of the Bishop of Wissim, who was arrested and dragged before the Emir. The Emir demanded a thousand pieces of gold as his ransom. Being unable to pay, he was scourged through the streets of Fostat and Babylon as far as the church of St. George (Mari Girghi). Here he was hung up before the great doors, and the scourging continued until the Christians had hastily collected among them 300 pieces of gold, when, almost at the point of death, the unfortunate bishop was released.

The rebellion, however, had the effect of calling the attention of the Kaliph to the state of things existing in Egypt. He dismissed the Emir, and during the short Patriarchate of Cosmas, the successor of Alexander, that unhappy country enjoyed a precarious respite from actual persecution, though the Christians were never free from oppression. But it is recorded as a great cause of thanksgiving that they obtained permission from the new Emir to rebuild the church of Mari Mena (My Lord Mena), still existing in Fostat.¹ Even this slight concession to the Christians gave rise to a popular insurrection among the Moslems. Famine and pestilence, however, broke out just as the unfortunate country began to breathe freely, and the people died by thousands. Moreover, though persecution was no longer expressly ordered by the Emir, a tribe of newly arrived Arabs, to the number of thirty thousand, were allowed to establish themselves in the mountains east of Fostat and to ravage the country at their pleasure. Very soon also the new Emir died, and was succeeded by a man who had once before been Emir of Egypt and one of their most violent persecutors—Khandala ebn Sefayn. He did not dare to show his hatred of the Christians quite so openly this time, but he increased their taxes and branded every Christian with the mark of a beast.

During these events the Patriarch Theodore, who had succeeded Cosmas, died, and—owing to a dispute between the priestly college of Alexandria and the bishops of Egypt proper—his successor was not immediately elected.

At this juncture the Melkite Church, understanding that the Kaliph himself was favourably disposed towards the Christians, determined to make an effort to save their own Church from utter extinction and to regain some share of those revenues, such as they now were, which had been resumed by the National Church since the flight of Peter, sixty years before. The degradation of their communion may be inferred from the fact—recorded by their own historian—that the best man they could find for the office of Patriarch was a needle-maker who could neither read nor write, named Cosmas.¹ As soon as possible after his consecration he was sent on an embassy to the Kaliph ‘to explain the fraud’ which had been practised by the Monophysites on the Arabs at the time of the conquest in representing themselves as the National Church! Though the loss of their possessions and the prestige of the Melkite Church was clearly due to the flight of their Patriarch Peter, they represented that Benjamin and his successors had robbed them of everything, and entreated Hashem to order that everything should be restored to them. Doubtless the Kaliph, whose attention had been called to the need of interference in Egypt by the recent rebellion, had been glad to find that there was a rival body of Christians who could be played off against the more powerful body whose Patriarch had sanctioned the revolt. He therefore treated Cosmas with honour, and wrote to the Governor of Egypt that the Christian churches, with all that belonged to them, were to be given back to Cosmas. Of course, this unreasonable and comprehensive order could not be fully carried out, but it was made a fresh pretext for oppressing the National Church, and many of the principal churches were forcibly taken from her and given to the handful of Melkites which remained. Among these were not only the Cæsareum, but the great Church of the Angels, which the Monophysites had built specially for themselves after they had been turned out of the Cæsareum by the Melkites. The vacancy of the National Patriarchate was also prolonged by the Mohammedan governor, who refused to grant his congé d'élire without a sum which it was quite impossible to pay.

¹ Fostat and the fragmentary remains of Babylon are now called by a somewhat ludicrous mistake, which has passed into common language, 'Old Cairo.'

¹ The date of the election of the Melkite Patriarch Cosmas cannot be given with certainty; the different authorities vary by as much as fifteen years; but all agree that it was under the Kaliphate of Hashem, and it seems probable that the Melkites would choose the time when persecution had ceased and the Patriarchal throne of the National Church was vacant. During these sixty years all their bishops had died, and they had lately been dependent on the occasional visits of a Monothelite prelate from Syria. The Peter who at the Council of Constantinople in 680 had signed as Bishop of Alexandria was not a bishop at all.

Hashem, however, again interfered to restrain the violence of his Emirs, and sent the obnoxious Khandala ebn Sefayn to Mauritiana, where he also caused a rebellion soon afterwards. A man named Hafiz was appointed to Egypt, and the bishops were permitted to meet at Babylon for the election of the Patriarch. Still the Alexandrian party and the bishops were unable to agree, and at length they proposed to refer to an old and greatly respected bishop who had excused himself from attending on the score of illness—Moses of Wissim.

CHAPTER V

REVOLT OF THE COPTS AND FALL OF THE OMMYIAD DYNASTY

A.D. 743
A.M. 459
A.H. 124

WISSIM was a cathedral city of much importance for some centuries in Egypt, but, like many of her towns, it has been so overshadowed by the darkness of the Moslem dominion that in the beginning of the nineteenth century it was spoken of by one of her historians as a place which had entirely disappeared and 'the situation of which is unknown.' Wissim, however, has never ceased to exist, and may be found to this day by anyone who takes the trouble to ride out about two hours into the Delta, from the Embabeh bridge over the Nile. In the days of paganism it boasted two great temples, one to the north and one in the midst of the city. These were pulled down by order of Constantine, and churches were built in their stead. Abu Salih declares that at one time Wissim contained three hundred and sixty-six churches;¹ but this is probably a great exaggeration, though it was evidently a place of great ecclesiastical importance for centuries. A very cursory inspection of the modern village reveals traces of fallen churches and temples; though the present Coptic church, like almost all others in the land, has been rebuilt and modernised since the English occupation enabled the Egyptians to restore their churches with impunity, and it is one of the poorest specimens to be found in the country. Just outside the village, on a high mound, is a low crumbling wall of stones which they call a mosque. This wall surrounds the pavement and pillars of an old Christian church, the pillars (which are of stone with carved capitals) standing for the most part in their places. Outside, on one of the rough foundation stones, a cross is deeply cut. Lower down, on an older foundation still, there is a cartouche and fragments of hieroglyphic writing. High mounds show where digging might possibly bring to light fresh remains. Not far from the town was a monastery which had been built forty years before the reign of Diocletian by an African merchant who settled in the town. This monastery existed on the same site for more than a thousand years.

¹ If for churches we read altars, the statement would not seem improbable. There were three in each church, and sometimes a separate chapel with a fourth.

In the reign of the Kaliph Hashem, Wissim was still at the height of its prosperity, and had for its bishop Moses, a man respected for his wisdom and sanctity throughout all Egypt. He was too ill to ride when the messengers came from Babylon to entreat his counsel, but he was borne on a litter through the fragrant fields which lie between Wissim and Babylon, and his couch was carried into the church—probably the Moallaka—where the election of the Patriarch was proceeding. The Alexandrian party appear to have insisted on a candidate whom the rest of the country were unable to accept, and refused to listen to any other nomination that was made. Moses did his best to persuade them to hear reason, but in vain; and they became so abusive that the indignant old bishop suddenly rose from his litter, and, laying about him with his staff, drove them out of the church.

That night Moses and his deacon, who shared his chamber, employed themselves in trying to think of a perfectly new candidate who might be acceptable to everyone, and the deacon suggested at last a monk from the convent of Macarius, named Michael, who was not even in Babylon at the time, but whom all knew and respected. The next day, when the quarrelling seemed likely to recommence, Moses proposed Michael ; and the whole party, weary of the dispute, and, let us hope, a little ashamed of themselves, received the nomination with an unanimous shout of applause. The Emir's consent was speedily obtained, and a deputation started for Wady Natron to fetch Michael. On their way they met a procession of monks from that very convent, coming to protest against some illegal exactions of the late governor, and among these monks was Michael. The joyful news was given them that the late governor was disgraced and banished, and the consecration of Michael was at once proceeded with.

The peace, however, was of short duration. Hashem died, and his successor immediately dismissed the Governor of Egypt and appointed another, who recommenced the work of oppressing and persecuting the Christians with zeal. Within the next four years there were four successive Kaliphs and as many different governors appointed in Egypt, all of whom persecuted and oppressed the Christians. Some, after selling all their goods and cattle to discharge the exactions laid upon them, beheld their very children sold into slavery to satisfy the rapacity of the Moslem Government. Many bishops forsook their sees, and concealed themselves in the convents. The unfortunate people became apostates in great numbers, being specially tempted to do so at this time by the offer that if they would only nominally accept the faith of Islam they might remain in truth Christians. The children of such people, of course, became real Moslems.

Twenty-four thousand are recorded to have renounced their Christianity during this time of persecution. Moses of Wissim was foremost in his efforts to encourage and help the sufferers, and was the right hand of the Patriarch Michael through these troubled times. At length Merwan, who successfully rebelled against the reigning Kaliph, made himself master of the Saracen Empire. As a matter of course, he sent a new governor into Egypt, which gave the Christians a short respite. The new governor, Hassan ebn Sohail,¹ showed himself friendly to the Christians, and Michael was now occupied in receiving back, on terms of penance, many of those who had apostatised in the recent persecutions.

Cosmas, the Melkite Patriarch, had kept very quiet during the dark days; but now that the Christians were in favour again, he resumed his efforts to annoy and despoil the National Church. This time he appealed to the Moslem governor to give him the church and endowments of Mari Mena, in the Mareotis, one of the most celebrated in Egypt. It was situated in a town which had grown up around it and bore the same name, in the desert between Alexandria and Nitria. It has long been destroyed, but its ruins may still exist on that now deserted road. The following description of what could be seen some time after its destruction is translated by Quatremère from an Arab manuscript :—

¹ All these Kaliphs and Emirs have two, if not three, different names and surnames; and as the historians often call them indifferently by one or the other, it is a work of some time and difficulty to identify them. The name given in the text is in each case the one which appears to be most generally known.

Mina¹ includes three deserted towns, situated in the midst of a desert of sand, but many of its buildings still remain standing. The Arabs often use them as hiding-places in which to lay an ambuscade for travellers. There are still well-built palaces enclosed within a wall. Most of these buildings are constructed on vaulted arcades, and some of them are inhabited by monks. The supply of water is good, but scanty.

The church of St. Mena is a vast building, decorated with statues and pictures of great beauty. Candles are kept burning in it day and night. At one end of this church there is a great tomb, and two camels sculptured in marble. The marble statue of a man stands upright with one foot on each camel ; one hand is open, the other shut. This statue, they say, represents St. Mena. In the same church are statues of John, Zacharias, and Jesus carved in a great marble pillar ; to the right of the entrance before these figures is a door (? grille) which is kept shut. Also there is a statue of the Virgin Mary behind two curtains, and statues of the Prophets. Outside the church are statues (? bas-reliefs) representing all sorts of animals, and men of all professions. Among others is a slave merchant who holds in his hand a purse upside down.

In the midst of the church there is a building in the form of a dome, under which are eight statues, which, if what they tell me is true, represent angels.

By the side of the church is a mosque of which the mih'rab is turned towards the south, where the Mohammedans come to make their prayers. All the surrounding land is planted with a great number of fruit trees, but, above all, almond and locust trees ; the fruit is very good, and is used for making syrups.

¹ Mina is spelt with an 'i' in all Western writers to this day, but the true sound to be represented is probably that of the 'e' in 'hen.' It should certainly be written in English with an 'e.'

There are also a great many vines, from which wine is made.

The revenues of this church were computed, even in the ruined state of the town, at more than a thousand dinars a year ; so we can understand the anxiety of the Melkites to possess it, though there is no evidence that it had at any time belonged to their party. The governor asked both Cosmas and Michael to draw up a statement of their respective claims, and after some time adjudged that the Melkites had not made good their claim, and that the building must remain with the National Church. Cosmas, however, had managed to amass a considerable treasure by this time, and, in spite of the smallness of his following, appears to have had more command of money than Michael. The latter must have been of a forgiving temper, for, notwithstanding this action on the part of Cosmas, we find both Patriarchs acting in concert later in a vain effort to save their country.

For though during the dynasty of the Ommyades the Saracenic Empire attained its greatest splendour—had overrun Africa, Syracuse, Asia Minor, Carthage, and made good their footing in Spain—the internal divisions had been growing more and more constant, and no really good or settled government had been established anywhere. Merwan, the last Kaliph of the line, was only a successful usurper ; moreover, the battle of Tours had lately given a fatal blow to the prestige of the Arabs and a final check to their victorious career. They were driven back into Spain; and though they maintained their footing in that corner of Europe for centuries, they were never able to advance beyond. Beaten back in the West, Merwan now found himself confronted by a new enemy of his own faith in the East—Abdallah Abbas—who, from his cruelty, afterwards received the name of ‘the Shedder of Blood.’

While Merwan was fully occupied in the struggle with his rival, Abd-el-Melek, the governor who had succeeded Hassam in Egypt, recommenced the persecution which his predecessor had abolished. Michael and Moses of Wissim, with more than 300 Christians of both sexes, were thrown into ‘a dark dungeon,’ where the Patriarch and the bishop did their best to console and strengthen the unfortunate prisoners. While they were expecting the worst, news arrived of unexpected succour from Nubia.

Nubia, though indirectly much the worse for the Arab conquest of Egypt, on account of the necessity for obtaining sufficient slaves to make up the yearly tribute, had not suffered from invasion or persecution, and her state might now compare favourably with the distracted land of Egypt. Her late king, Mercurius, had been much beloved and respected, so that he had received from his subjects the nickname of the Second Constantine.¹ His son Zacharius, on the death of his father, would not himself accept the kingdom; and after two short reigns of Ibrahim and Mark, who were successively assassinated by each other’s partisans, the throne fell to a man whose name is given as Kiriakous (Cyriacus), who was renowned for courage and virtue.

Nubia had at this time several causes of complaint against the Moslem masters of Egypt, besides the standing grievance of the enforced slave trade. The Mohammedans had carried off in their raids a great number of Nubians over and above the stipulated tribute, whom they sold into slavery in Egypt. When Kiriakous heard that civil war prevailed between Merwan and Abu-l-Abbas, and that the Governor of Egypt had begun to persecute the Christians on his own responsibility, he determined to interfere. He sent 'Abrekkes,' one of the principal noblemen of his kingdom, to demand that the Patriarch Michael should be set at liberty. Abd-el-Melek, thinking that he could afford to despise the King of Nubia, promptly arrested Abrekkes, and threw him also into prison. To his dismay, however, he soon learned that Kiriakous had entered Egypt with a numerous army on horses and camels. 'Eye-witnesses have assured me,' wrote the deacon John, who composed a history afterwards of his master the Patriarch Michael, 'that these horses were not bigger than asses, but that in battle they seconded their masters, fighting both with their fore and hind feet.' All the Christian population, who were still far more numerous than the Moslems, welcomed the arms of Kiriakous with joy, and the invaders swept up the country and threatened Fostat. In this emergency Abd-el-Melek hastily liberated Abrekkes on a solemn oath that he would persuade his master to retire, and sent him to make terms with Kiriakous. This prince, on receiving a letter from the Patriarch Michael to say that he had been set at liberty and was now well treated, consented to retire to his own country, taking with him considerable booty from the Moslem inhabitants.

¹ This account is taken from the translation in Quatremère.

Promises of this kind, however, are rarely kept when the compulsion is removed. The tyrannous exactions of Abd-el-Melek soon drove the Christians to fresh thoughts of revolt. The two Patriarchs sank their religious differences, and, making common cause against the infidel, put themselves jointly at the head of the national movement. This gave it a strength and a measure of success never before attained. The scene of the revolt was this time in Upper Egypt, and no doubt hopes were entertained of help from the Nubians. Abd-el-Melek marched with his Arab troops against the native insurgents, and was defeated with great loss. The Egyptians drew together in a strong position, and not only held their camp against the enemy, but obtained constant advantages in the open field. Even the arrival of Merwan in person with fresh troops did not dismay them; indeed, Merwan was himself retreating before the victorious armies of his rival Abdallah Abbas. He found that the rebellion had spread all over Egypt, and gained ground daily. The Copts, in fact, were in a state of semi-independence under their Patriarchs for several years before the death of Merwan. A man called John of Samanhoud was their leader in Lower Egypt, and though Merwan's soldiers ravaged the country, pillaging and sacking all that came in their way, he could not reduce them so long as their leaders remained at their head. Masr¹ itself was set on fire, and all the Christian quarters burnt by the Moslems.

Still Egypt held out, till apparently in one year (about 750) all her men in whom she trusted were taken from her. John of Samanhoud fell in a pitched battle, and most of his men lost their lives with him. In Upper Egypt, in a chance skirmish, both the Patriarchs were taken prisoners, and fell into the hands of Merwan.

¹ Masr, the Semitic name of Egypt, was used by the Arabs to designate the combined cities of Fostat and Babylon, and is in the same manner now applied by them to all the four cities built successively to the north of each other—Babylon, Fostat, Masr, and Cairo.

Cosmas ransomed his life by the payment of a thousand pieces of gold, and he appears to have fled the country, since we do not hear of him again, except an incidental mention in connection with the iconoclastic controversy which some five years later was convulsing the remains of the Byzantine Empire. Michael had no money, so he was scourged, and the order was already given for his execution, when Merwan thought he might be useful in treating with the insurgents, so he was remanded to prison.

Meanwhile the Moslems burnt the crops, pillaged the monasteries, and dragged the nuns to be dealt with at Merwan's pleasure. One of these, Febronia, a woman of such great beauty that she was set apart for Merwan, saved herself from dishonour by a curious expedient. She showed the leader of the party some ointment which she pretended would make a man proof against steel if rubbed upon him, and as an earnest of her good faith she offered to make trial of it upon herself on condition that if she gave him this secret he would respect the chastity of herself and her companions. She rubbed her neck with the ointment, and, stretching forth her head, bade the man smite hard. He did so, and her head rolled upon the floor. Then, says Abu Salih, 'they repented, and were exceedingly sad, and did no injury henceforth to any of those virgins, but let them go.'

In 751 Abdallah Abbas entered Egypt with his victorious army, determined to wrest this last and most important province from Merwan. The Egyptians, deprived of their leaders and hopeless of a successful contention with two armies at once, made terms with the Abbasidæ. The rival Kaliphs encamped in sight of each other on opposite sides of the Nile. But the Patriarch

Michael and Moses of Wissim were still in the hands of Merwan; and Merwan, to revenge himself on the insurgents for joining his enemy, tortured the two men whom they most loved, on the river-bank, in sight of those across the stream. Yet the courage of the two prelates did not fail them for a moment, and, as Merwan could get nothing out of them, he sent them back to their prison for the night, promising them a prolonged death by torture in the same place on the next day.

The day dawned, and all attempts to rescue the beloved bishops had failed. All the Christian clergy in Merwan's hands were brought together on the river-bank, to the number of eleven, and the various instruments of torture were made ready. The clergy embraced each other, and Moses of Wissim asked the Patriarch to pronounce the absolution over them. A breathless hush fell upon the crowded banks—on the one side the frantic shouts and lamentations of the Christians were stilled, on the other the savage troops of Merwan paused in wonder—while the voice of the Patriarch rose unfaltering over the kneeling group in the prayer of absolution: 'O Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son, the Word of God the Father, Who by Thy salutary and life-giving Passion hast burst asunder all the chains of our sins; Who didst breathe on the faces of Thine Holy Apostles, saying unto them "Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose sins soever ye remit they are remitted unto them, and whose sins soever ye retain they are retained;" Thou hast also, O Lord, made choice by the same, Thine Apostles, of them that should always discharge the office of the priesthood in Thy Holy Church, to the end that they may remit sins upon the earth, and loose and relax all the bonds of iniquity. We pray and beseech Thy Goodness, O Thou lover of men, for Thy servants our fathers, our brethren, and our own infirmity, who now bow down our heads before Thy Holy Glory, show us Thy loving kindness, and burst all the chains of our sins. And if we have offended against Thee by knowledge or ignorance, or by hardness of heart, by word, by deed, or by our weakness, do Thou, O Lord, Which knowest the frailty of man, Which art gracious and the lover of men, give unto us the remission of our sins, bless us and purify us, absolve us and all Thy people, fill us with Thy fear, and direct us into Thy Holy and gracious Will; for Thou art our God, and to Thee, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, all honour and glory is now and evermore to be ascribed. Thy servants who this day have the office of the ministry, the priests, the deacons, and clergy, all the people, and my own weakness, are absolved by the mouth of the Holy Trinity—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost—and from the mouth of the one, only, holy Catholic and Apostolic Church; by the mouth of the Twelve Apostles, and by the mouth of the wise Mark, Apostle and Martyr; by the mouth also of the Patriarch St. Severus, and of our holy Doctor Dioscorus, of St. John Chrysostom, St. Cyril, St. Basil, St. Gregory, of the three hundred also that met at Nicea, of the hundred and fifty at Constantinople, of the hundred at Ephesus, and by the mouth of my humility, who am a sinner; for blessed and full of glory is Thy Holy Name—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—now and ever, world without end. Amen.’¹ ranks, and flung himself at his father's feet, entreating him to spare the lives of the prisoners. Knowing probably that motives of mercy would have no influence, he appealed to those of policy. He pointed out that to conciliate the Christian Egyptians was their one chance of safety; that they would always follow their Patriarch; but that if he were now slain in such a manner, every Egyptian who had not yet joined in the insurrection would hasten to the standard of the Abbasidæ, in order to avenge on the Ommiadæ the death of their Patriarch. Merwan, on whom perhaps the scene may also have made some impression, at length yielded to his son's entreaties, and the clergy were remanded to prison. Moses of Wissim revived their drooping spirits by his exhortations and predictions, and in the convents prayers were offered day and night by the monks for their safety.

As the prayer ended, Merwan’s son advanced from the

¹ This prayer is preserved in the Life of Michael, by John the Deacon, who was with his master on this occasion.

At length the crossing of the Nile was accomplished by Abd Allah's army, and the two Kaliphs met at Abusir Kuridis, in the province of Beni-Souef. Merwan was killed, and his army totally defeated.

Abd Allah, the son of Merwan, took refuge in Nubia with the remnant of his followers, and threw himself on the mercy of the King of Nubia. After three days he was informed that the king proposed to visit his camp in person, and hear what he had to say. Abd Allah, who felt his situation to be desperate, spread a carpet, and prepared to receive the Christian monarch with all respect. But when the king arrived, he would not come upon the carpet, but sat on the ground, excusing himself by saying that it was the special duty of a king to humble himself before God, to Whom he owed his greatness.

He then opened the conversation by asking why the followers of Abd Allah drank wine, as he had observed, when it was forbidden by the book which they professed to consider sacred. Abd Allah replied that it was only his slaves and some of his officers who sinned in this way.

‘Why,’ asked the king again, ‘do you permit your soldiers to tread down the harvest under their horses’ feet, when such conduct is forbidden in your sacred book?’

Abd Allah made the same excuse, that he had been unable to restrain some of the officers and their slaves from this offence. But the king asked a third time :

‘Why are you all wearing robes of silk and gold in defiance of the laws of your religion?’

‘Because,’ answered Abd Allah, ‘power has departed from us, and we have been compelled to call in strangers to help us, who, though they have adopted our religion, insist on wearing such garments as you see, in spite of our objections.’

The king lowered his head, and remained in deep thought for some moments. He was heard to murmur : ‘Our slaves, our officers, the strangers who have adopted our religion!’ Then, raising his head, he cried :

‘The thing is not as you have said! No, it is your family who have offended against God. You have broken His laws, in using power to exercise tyranny. For this cause God has taken the authority from you, and for your own crimes has covered you with shame. Who shall tell the day of His vengeance? And if His wrath break upon you while you are in my kingdom, my country will suffer for your sins. The rights of hospitality must prevail for three days; take provisions and whatever else is necessary for your journey, and then depart out of my kingdom.

Abd Allah was powerless to fight, and had no choice but to obey the order. He fell into the hands of the Abbasidæ, and was kept in prison for the rest of his days. El Mansur sent for him one day, to hear his own account of his expulsion from Nubia, which he gave, according to Masudi, in the words which are translated above.

Egypt thus passed under the power of the Abbasidæ, the Patriarch Michael was set at liberty, and the Christians were left in peace and freedom for about four years.

CHAPTER VI

THE OPPRESSION OF THE ABBASIDE DYNASTY

A.D. 751 DURING the next fifty-four years no less than forty-five
 A.M. 467 different governors were appointed in Egypt, under five
 A.H. 133 successive Kaliphs. The cumbrous and uninteresting names of these governors will be found in the chronological table, but without good reason for distinction they will all be referred to in the text as the Emir or prince. Those who ruled during the four years of peace which followed the conquest of the country by the Abbasidæ were tolerant, and sometimes were friendly to the Christians.

Not long after the death of Merwan an incident occurred which was regarded at the time as a miracle. The Nile had only risen fourteen cubits when it should have risen sixteen, and great fear was entertained of a famine. The bishops, who were then at Babylon for the autumn synod, agreed to hold a special service of intercessory prayer, an account of which was written by John the Deacon in his Life of this Patriarch :—

When the 17th of Tut¹ came, which is the festival of the most glorious Cross, the clergy of Gizeh and of distant places assembled, with most of the laity of Fostat, old and young, and walked in procession, carrying the Gospels and censers with incense. Then we entered the great cathedral church of St. Peter, the foundations of which lie in the river ; but the church could not contain the people on account of their multitude, so that they stood in the outlying places. Then the Patriarch raised the cross, while Anbar Mennas, Bishop of Memphis, stood by him with the Holy Gospel, and led us all forth, bearing crosses and books of the Gospel, until we stood on the banks of the river ; and this was before sunrise. And the Patriarch prayed, and Anbar Mennas the bishop prayed, and the laity did not cease crying 'Kyrie, eleison' until the third hour of the day ; so that all the Jews and Moslems and others heard our cries to the Most High God. And He heard us, praise be to His glorious name, for the river rose and increased in height by one cubit, and every man glorified God and gave thanks to Him. And when Nârun heard of this matter he was filled with wonder and fear, both he and all his troops.

¹ September 26.

It is further recorded that the Emir, being unwilling that this miracle should be considered as due to the prayers of the Christians, ordered the Moslems to take the same place the next day and by their prayers secure another cubit. But, on the contrary, as the Moslems prayed, the water sank a cubit, according to the record of the Nilometer ! Then the Emir indignantly ordered that neither Christians nor Moslems should be permitted to pray, and the water remained at fourteen cubits ; till, in despair, the Emir ordered the Christians again to try what they could do, and forthwith the river rose to seventeen cubits, and all fear of famine vanished. It is said that this miracle contributed more than anything else to the relief which the Christians enjoyed from oppression during those four years.

Michael employed some time in a thorough visitation of the kingdom, and his biographer describes the discovery of a settlement of the descendants of the Meletian heretics, to the number of three thousand, living in caves of the rocks and in monasteries. Apparently their very existence had been forgotten in the terrible troubles of the recent centuries; so they were probably in some distant oasis. Michael received them with the charity and wisdom which we should have expected from him, and they became absorbed into the National Church.

The peace was eventually disturbed by the misdoings of a Bishop of Harran, named Isaac, who had won the favour of the Kaliph Abd Allah. The Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch having died, the Kaliph sent orders to the bishops of that country that they should elect Isaac. But, as translations were forbidden by the Oriental canons, the bishops refused to elect the Kaliph's nominee. Isaac therefore, availing himself of the civil powers conferred upon him by Abd Allah, caused the two Metropolitans, who were his principal opponents, to be put to death. Having by this simple expedient secured a majority for his election, he sent the usual synodal letters to Michael of Egypt requesting his communion. The Kaliph at the same time sent orders to the Emir then in possession that, if Michael refused, he was to be arrested and sent to him in Syria.

Michael called a Council of all the bishops of Upper and Lower Egypt at Babylon, and put the case before them. All were well aware that a refusal would probably be followed by a renewal of the terrible oppression from which they had enjoyed so brief a respite, certainly by the torture and death of Michael himself. The temptation was sore to yield the point, and if it had been only one of canon law they would have done so; but it was impossible to clear Isaac from the murder of the two bishops. After nearly a month of delay and deliberation the assembly asked the Patriarch to decide on his own responsibility. Michael immediately announced that neither sword, fire, wild beast, nor exile should compel him to yield to such a demand.

The messengers from Antioch thereupon promptly demanded the arrest of Michael; but the Emir, who liked and respected the Patriarch, declared that there was no hurry, and that Michael must have time to make his preparations. He delayed the start as long as he dared, but at length was compelled to give the order. Moses of Wissim declared his intention of accompanying his master and friend, and John the Deacon also cast in his lot with them. As the three brave men were on the point of setting out for their martyrdom, news was brought of the death of Isaac, and the Emir gladly decided that in that case Michael's presence in Syria could not be required.

The Patriarch lived nearly eleven years after this, and ended his troubled life in peace about the year 767. The Kaliph then upon the throne was the one commonly known as El Mansur (Almansor), who fixed his throne at Baghdad and was the first of the Kaliphs who showed any appreciation of literature and learning, though his character was as little to be admired as any of the rest of them since Omar. The reigning Emir at the time of Michael's death was Yezid ebn Hatem.

Michael's successor was a man called Mena, also from the convent of St. Macarius. The Church had been at peace for eleven years, and continued so still for a while, when the wickedness of one of her own members brought fresh trouble upon her. This was a deacon of Alexandria named Peter, who had asked Mena to make him a bishop, and been refused. Disappointed in his ambition, he went to Baghdad, and laid himself out to gain the favour of the Kaliph. In this he succeeded so well that eventually he returned to Egypt with an order from El Mansur that the Patriarch Mena should be dethroned and Peter elected in his place. Mena called a Council at Babylon, to take the advice of his bishops, when, as they were sitting according to custom in the church, to their amazement Peter, accompanied by a troop of soldiers, entered the sanctuary in Patriarchal vestments. While the Patriarch hesitated how to act in such an emergency, the fiery old Moses of Wissim and Mena, another bishop, rushed upon the intruder and expelled him from the church by main force. But they were, of course, instantly surrounded by the soldiers; all the bishops present were chained and thrown into prison. They expected a speedy death, but some one having mentioned to the Emir that the Patriarch knew what was supposed to be the old Egyptian secret of transmuting baser metals into gold, he sent for him, and demanded that all the gold and silver vessels of the churches throughout Egypt should be given up to the Kaliph. Mena replied that, after all the Church had suffered, he believed there was little left of gold and silver plate; at any rate, the great churches of Alexandria were served with wood and glass. The Emir then demanded that at least the book containing the secret of making gold should be given up to him; and when Mena protested that he knew of no such book, the Emir spared his life in the hope of finally wresting the secret from him. The Patriarch and his bishops were sent to labour as convicts in the docks of Alexandria.

This outrage was more than the Egyptians could endure. Once more the Christians of the Delta rose in rebellion, drove out the Moslem officials, and, as Makrizi expresses it, 'made themselves into a community.' The Emir of Egypt sent his army against them, but the Copts surprised the Moslem troops at night and gained a complete victory, killing a great number and putting the rest to flight. But such successes could never be more than transient, for the Copts were never allowed to bear arms, and the Moslems had an inexhaustible supply of men to draw from, since all the fighting races of the Oriental world had joined the standard of the Prophet, a religion which practically allowed the wildest licence to its followers so that they were but good soldiers and ready to die at a moment's notice. The insurgents were surrounded, and eventually—though, according to Makrizi, they seem to have held out until they had been compelled to eat their dead for food—were reduced to submission. Their churches in Fostat were destroyed, besides the old one of Anbar Shenouda, since rebuilt, and now standing on the same site, between Fostat and Babylon. For one in the ward of Constantine the Christians offered a ransom of fifty thousand dinars to the Emir if he would spare it, but he refused.

Relief came in the person of a new Emir, who liberated the bishops and the Patriarch after they had been employed in convict labour for at least a year. Peter in his turn, as the originator of all the trouble, was thrown into prison. This Emir remained three years in office, and was succeeded by his brother, who also died in a few months. The next man, Moussa, inquired into the cases of the people whom he found languishing in prison, and among others of Peter, who made out such a good story for himself that he was released and allowed to appeal in person to the Kaliph. El Mansur received him with honour, gave him a new name—by which we conclude that he now openly apostatised—and sent him back to Egypt with full power to revenge himself on Mena and the Church of Egypt. The Christians were preparing for another revolt, when news came of the death of the Kaliph, and Peter found himself alike powerless and detested. He threw himself on the mercy of those very bishops whose destruction he had been trying to compass, and applied to be received ‘to penitence,’ but one and all refused, probably because they did not believe in his repentance—for instances of such refusal in the Egyptian Church are very rare.

Mena did not long survive his release, and nearly a year elapsed before his successor was consecrated. There appears to have been again a difficulty in deciding whom they should elect; but instead of quarrelling over their respective candidates they arranged a solemn ceremonial of casting lots, which ever afterwards was practised on all occasions when there was no candidate unanimously accepted. It was called the ‘heikelia’ or ‘heikeliet’—from heikal, the ‘sanctuary,’ because the matter was entrusted to the decision of God Himself within the sanctuary.

One hundred monks were first chosen.¹ These, to be eligible for the Patriarchate, must be free-born, of free parents, and the child of their mother’s first marriage, since the Egyptian Church, though it allows second marriages to the laity, does not thoroughly approve of them. Widows and widowers are not allowed the crown in marriage, therefore it is said that the Patriarch must be the son of a crowned mother. But the law, as usual, was more indulgent to the man than to the woman. The son of an uncrowned (twice-married) father might be chosen as Patriarch, though not the son of an uncrowned mother. A candidate for the Patriarchate must also be sound in all his members, of good health, unmarried, and not less than fifty years old. He must never have shed the blood of man or beast; he must either be a native of Egypt or familiar with the language; he must be well educated, must not be already a bishop, must be of good character and undoubted orthodoxy. Finally, it was declared that the Moslem authorities must be allowed no influence in the selection, and that a candidate recommended by the ruling Emir would be inadmissible.

¹ In the primitive Egyptian Church the Patriarchs were not monks and some of them were married.

By a process of selection and voting, the hundred candidates were thus reduced to fifty, to twenty-five, to ten, and finally to three. When but three were left, a unanimous shout in favour of one of the three would decide the election; but should no such manifestation take place, the election proceeded as follows: Four pieces of parchment were prepared; on three of them were written the names of the three candidates, on the fourth the name of Jesus the Son of God. These were deposited in an urn, and the urn itself was placed under the altar. The Holy Communion was then celebrated, and prayers offered—apparently for at least a day and a night, sometimes longer.

After this a young child was called forward and directed to go and take one of the parchment scrolls from the urn. If it bore the name of one of the candidates, he was forthwith elected; if the name of Jesus were brought out, it was taken as a sign that none of the offered three were acceptable to God, and the whole process had to be gone through again.

On this first occasion of election by the heikelia the lot fell on a monk called John, the fourth Patriarch of that name, who reigned twenty-four years. About the same time Cosmas, the Melkite Patriarch, died ; but whether in Egypt or not, or who was his successor, is not clearly known. Cosmas had taken part in the iconoclastic controversy which was then raging in Europe and Syria, but which does not appear to have affected the National Church of Egypt at all. Image-worship has never been a fault of hers. Those churches of Egypt which contained statues were generally, though not always, Melkite ; and now both branches of the Church in Egypt agree in condemning their use, though both allow pictures.

John employed himself in rebuilding some of the churches which had been destroyed in the late persecutions. He seems to have possessed some private means of his own, though it is difficult to understand how a monk can have done so. Among other churches, he rebuilt the great church of the Archangel Michael at Alexandria. A Melkite Christian observed that the new buildings occupied more ground than the old, and immediately informed against the Patriarch to the Mohammedan authorities, declaring that he had encroached on land belonging to the Kaliph. This, of course, was made an excuse for imposing on the Patriarch a heavy fine, which, however, he was able to pay without suspending his building operations. In his time also a terrible famine oppressed Egypt, and the Patriarch reduced himself to extreme poverty in trying to help and provide for the sufferers. These famines became more and more frequent during the succeeding centuries, owing to the careless and dishonest rule of the successive Mohammedan dynasties. The canals were not regularly cleaned out, and in a very few years became choked and unable to conduct the life-giving water from the Nile. A low Nile therefore did not spread at all, and a famine was the inevitable consequence; for under these rulers the Egyptians were never able to lay up for a bad year. All the poorer people were thus killed off at intervals; the Emirs would order a temporary cleaning of the canals by forced labour; and the process of neglect, famine, and death from the resultant plague was gone through again.

About the beginning of the ninth century we have the first history of Egypt written by a Moslem, who is known as Ibn Abd el Hakam. It is chiefly concerned with the conquest of Egypt by the Moslems, and still exists in manuscript. It was continued by one of his followers and brought down to the third century of the Hegira. El Hakam himself was probably a Copt by nationality, since El Kindi, who wrote at the end of the ninth century of our era, is called the first Arab historian. El Kindi's work was also continued and brought down to the end of the tenth century A. D.

CHAPTER VII

THE LAST GREAT REVOLT OF THE COPTS (831)

A.D. 785
 A.M. 581
 A.H. 168-9

IN 785 (A.H. 168-9) El Mahdi ebn Mansur died, and, his eldest son following him in a few months, the Kaliphate fell to his second son, the celebrated Haroun el Raschid. Haroun had already distinguished himself in battle against the Greeks, as the subjects of the Byzantine Empire are commonly called, and had imposed upon Constantinople an annual tribute of 70,000 dinars. He was a man of more education than his predecessors, equally sensual in his tastes, but less coarse in their display; and he seems to have had a glimmering idea that power brought with it some sort of responsibility for the well-being of others. Still, he could not trust any man to govern the great kingdom of Egypt without fearing that he might try and make himself independent, so, as his father had done, he changed the Viceroy of Egypt almost every year, and rendered any settled system of good government impossible. Actual persecution of the Christians was not allowed during his reign; but the National Church, with its powerful Patriarch, was jealously watched, and when an excuse offered for oppression it was eagerly taken advantage of.

In 795 Abdallah ebn Mahadi, the brother of the Kaliph, was appointed Emir of Egypt, and sent his brother a present of a very beautiful Egyptian as a slave. This girl obtained great influence over the Kaliph, and when shortly afterwards she fell ill he was in despair. The girl assured him that only an Egyptian physician would have skill enough to cure her, and Haroun el Raschid had himself experienced how superior was their knowledge in this science to that of all other nations. He sent orders that the most skilful physician in Egypt should be sent to him at once. This on inquiry proved to be no less a person than the Melkite Patriarch, Politian, who was forthwith despatched to Baghdad to cure the Kaliph's concubine. This he succeeded in doing, and, being told to name his reward, he asked that certain churches should be taken from the National Patriarch John and given to him, which was accordingly done.

In 799 John died, and two years later the Melkite Patriarch died also. The latter was succeeded by a linen manufacturer named Eustathius, who, having dug up a treasure—probably from some old tomb—had become a monk, and devoted his riches to the Byzantine Church. The National Church elected Mark, a man of great ability and sincere religion. In his time another of the many sects which had existed in Egypt since the fourth century signified to the Patriarch, through their bishop, that they desired to be received into the National Church in a body. Mark received the bishop with courteous welcome, and expressed great joy at the proposed reconciliation; but, in order to test their sincerity, informed their delegate that he could not recognise an irregular consecration, and that if the bishop entered the Church it must be as a simple cleric. He readily agreed to this stipulation, and the whole body were received into the Church, their places of worship re-consecrated, and their liturgy revised to bring it into harmony with that of the National Church. After a year or two of probation the Patriarch consecrated the pseudo-bishop to one of his own sees.

In 808 (A.H. 193) Haroun el Raschid died, and civil war at once broke out between his two sons, El Amin and El Mamoun, which lasted with varying fortunes for five years, when El Amin was killed and El Mamoun was recognised as Kaliph. During these five years there was no responsible governor in Egypt, though Shamse el Din gives a list of eight who were appointed. Whether any of them ever went near the country, it is difficult to discover, but they were certainly of no practical use there. The Moslem accounts of this period are hopelessly obscure, but it is clear that a foreign enemy took advantage of the anarchy in Egypt to invade the country from the north-west, and it seems probable that the invaders were the Spanish Moslems, who had now set up a Kaliph of their own, and owed no allegiance to Baghdad.

They landed and ravaged the country, but the Abbaside Moslem troops had hastily reinforced Alexandria, and the Patriarch Mark also went to look after his own people. The Melkite Patriarch Christopher, who had succeeded Eustathius, is not mentioned during this time of trouble; but, as we know that he was a paralytic old man, he was probably unable to do much. Mark cared for all Christians, without distinction of Monophysite or Melkite, and had the courage to seek out the leader of the invaders and offer to ransom all the prisoners he had made in Egypt and intended to export as slaves. It is recorded that in this way he redeemed no less than six thousand Egyptians—men, women, and children. To each of these he presented a deed of freedom, and provided them with necessaries for their return to the homes from which they had been torn. Some who had lost all, and did not care to seek the far-off ruins of their happiness, he provided for in Alexandria. As usual, however, many of the Egyptians joined the invaders, seeking always for greater freedom at the hands of a new conqueror. The Spanish (?) Moslems by their means made themselves masters of Alexandria, but were in their turn surprised by the Egyptian Moslems, and eight hundred of them massacred. They returned, however, to the fight; a second time Alexandria fell into their hands, and was then given up to indiscriminate pillage and massacre. The great church of St. Saviour, which had only recently been restored, was plundered and burnt; and finally the whole city was fired in several places at once. Mark escaped with some of his friends, and lay hid for some time in one of the desert monasteries. He still, though in disguise and at the risk of his life, continued to discharge the duties of his office, and after about five years the then Emir of Egypt gave him a safe conduct, and permitted him to reside openly in the Wady Natron (Nitria). After a short respite, however, the struggles between the Moslems who had but one subject of agreement—to plunder the Christians—broke out again.

A man named Abd Allah ebn Tahir (Zahir?) for a short time acquired the ascendancy in Egypt, and his troops overran the country, sacking the monasteries and burning the churches. The news of this fresh calamity threw the Patriarch into a fever, of which he died. The invading Arabs were still occupying Alexandria and the northern country; Abd Allah ebn Tahir had established himself at Fostat; but another man, Abd el Aziz, had apparently more real power in the country than anyone. He is said to have burnt the granaries and deliberately caused a famine, in order to starve out the invaders. He also tried to interfere with the election of Mark's successor; and when the Egyptians absolutely refused to accept his nominee, he swore to put all the bishops to death and destroy all the churches that were left standing, if the new Patriarch Jacob did not immediately give himself up. Jacob did not hesitate, and was on his way to what must have seemed inevitable torture and martyrdom, when a violent death overtook Abd el Aziz and saved Jacob's life.

At length El Mamoun, having established himself firmly in the Kaliphate, came to Egypt in person to restore order. The Spanish Moslems were driven out, Abd Allah ebn Tahir was bribed with a large sum of money to retire peaceably, and the Kaliph appointed his brother El Mutasem governor of both Syria and Egypt.

We learn from the chronicle of Gregory Bar Hebræus (Abu 'l faraj) that Denys, the Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch, visited Egypt twice during the reign of the Patriarch—or, as Gregory calls him, the Pope—Jacob. The first time he came by sea to Tennis, and all the Christians of the town, in number about thirty thousand, poured out to welcome him, while the Pope and several of his bishops hastened to greet their illustrious guest. Denys must have been somewhat of a pedant, for he records the fact that in welcoming him Pope Jacob inadvertently described his visit as the first which any Patriarch of Antioch had made to Egypt since the days of the great Severus. 'Whereupon,' says Denys, 'we reminded him of the visit of Athanasius when he came to heal the breach which had before taken place between Peter of Antioch and Damian of Alexandria; and we gave him to understand that a neglect of reading leaves one very imperfectly acquainted with history.' Denys had come to protest against the evil doings of Abd Allah ebn Tahir's brother in Edessa, and obtained a letter from the Emir forbidding the destruction of any more churches in that city. He came the second time with the Kaliph el Mamoun, who sent him in company with Pope Jacob to endeavour to put an end to the revolt of the Copts. Denys says of the Pope and bishops of Egypt that he found them 'deeply religious, humble, rich in the love of God. They treated us with all distinction, giving us the same honours all the time we were in Egypt as to their own Pope.' But he deploras two things—that they did not read enough in the sacred books, and that consecration fees to the amount of two or three hundred pieces of silver were always paid by a new bishop; also that they were accustomed to defer baptism until the thirtieth or even till the fortieth day after birth. Denys took great interest in the antiquities of Egypt, and on his return to Syria wrote a description of what he had seen.

But the united entreaties of both Patriarchs were powerless to prevent the Christian Egyptians from making another desperate attempt to throw off the Moslem yoke. Jacob had before attempted to restrain them by letter, pointing out that final success was an impossibility; and that therefore it was better to submit, as the Christians of the Apostolic age were told to do, to 'the powers that be,' and not to risk a useless effusion of Egyptian blood with the certainty of after-persecution. These letters had been sent to the leaders of the insurgent army by bishops, who added their exhortations to submission. But for once the authority of the Patriarch had been defied. The insurgents taunted him and his bishops with cowardice, and announced their intention to die fighting, rather than live as slaves.

They obtained a sufficient measure of success to alarm the Kaliph thoroughly. He sent large reinforcements to the Moslem troops already in Egypt; and finally came in person to reconquer the country, bringing Denys of Antioch with him as a sort of hostage. The two Patriarchs, Denys and Jacob, were sent as ambassadors in the Kaliph's name to treat with the insurgents, offering them a general amnesty if they would now lay down their arms and return home. The Copts, flushed with victory and distrustful of the Kaliph's good faith, refused to listen, and the two Patriarchs¹ returned with the news of their failure to the Kaliph.

El Mamoun, fearing the total loss of one of the richest provinces of the Saracenic Empire, then concentrated all his resources of men and treasure on the subjugation of the insurgents. The latter, fighting desperately, were driven back point by point. They made their way in good order to Babylon, where they entrenched themselves in 'the citadel'² and stood a protracted siege. Eventually, however, the place was carried by storm, every male was put to the sword, and all the women and children carried as slaves to Baghdad.

¹ That is, Denys and Jacob. The Patriarch of the Melkite (or Greek) Church in Egypt at this time was a man named Christopher, who was incapacitated soon after his election by a paralytic stroke, and of whom therefore we hear almost nothing, except the fact that he bore the title from 817 to 848 A.D.

² The only place referred to in Egyptian history as 'the citadel' before the building of the present one above Cairo is the citadel of Babylon, now in ruins; so we are led to conclude that the Egyptians made their last stand in Babylon.

Then the conquerors revenged themselves with pitiless ferocity throughout the length and breadth of Egypt. Many were slain, many were carried away and sold as slaves in other countries, and many of the baser sort saved themselves by apostasy; so that the Christians were left for the first time in a minority in the land. Hitherto the Moslems had only been found in the army and among the residents in the principal towns of Egypt: from this time forth the country population began to fall away from the faith, while the Arabs settled in many of the villages and began to cultivate land.

Some time later the Patriarch had occasion, after repeated remonstrances, to depose the bishops of Tanis and Babylon for maladministration. The two prelates, out of revenge, sought the Emir Afshin, who had been employed to crush the recent rebellion and was now in command of the army. They informed him that the Patriarch Jacob, though he had pretended an attempt to avert and suppress the rising, had been in fact its author. Afshin, without inquiring into the truth of the story, sent soldiers at once to the church where the Patriarch was intending to officiate that day, with orders to fall upon him and kill him. But the Patriarch was warned in time, and, instead of going to the church, he went boldly to the Emir and proved the falsity of the accusation. Afshin then turned his anger against the traitorous bishops, but the Patriarch again interposed and entreated for their pardon.

Such forgiveness was incomprehensible to the Emir, who related the whole story to the Kaliph. The latter, desiring to show some signal mark of favour to Jacob, issued an edict forbidding any appeal on the part of a Christian from the judgment of his Patriarch. For the short remainder of his life Jacob was protected, though his heart must have been wrung with grief at the desolation of his people, and he did not long survive the rebellion.

El Mamoun, unlike most Moslem rulers of Egypt, endeavoured to acquire some knowledge of the ancient literature and civilisation which his forefathers had done their best to destroy. He caused many important works to be translated from Egyptian, Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek—some of which the European world afterwards received as Arab originals. Unfortunately, however, his scientific and literary studies gave great offence to the stricter Moslems, the orthodox view being that traditionally taken by Omar when he ordered the burning of the Alexandrian library. El Mamoun was not wholly free from intolerance himself. He persecuted those Mohammedans who held the tenet that the Koran was divine and uncreated, and even went so far as to declare by public edict that the Koran ranked third in the list of creatures—after Mohammed and Ali!

The exact date of El Mamoun's death is uncertain, but he was succeeded by his brother, El Mutasem, whom he had made governor of Syria and Egypt. This Kaliph, though son to Haroun el Raschid and brother to El Mamoun, is said to have been an Arab of the old type—illiterate, unable even to read or write, passionate, sensual, but a great warrior and careless of bodily privation or fatigue. At that time all the Saracenic Empire was full of slaves, taken for the most part in battle, or drawn as tribute from the unhappy countries which produced them. Among these slaves were a great quantity of Turks, who were exclusively employed in fighting, since, like their Arab masters, that was their strong point. They were not even, like the Arabs, capable of assimilating to a certain degree the civilisation of the older world. The Arabs, though originating nothing, have sometimes produced men of great learning and cultivation; the Turks hardly ever, except with so strong an admixture of foreign blood that the original Turk is almost lost in their composition. El Mutasem in particular valued his Turkish slaves highly, and equipped a special regiment of them. These favoured troops eventually abused their privileges to such an extent that the Kaliph dared not continue to live with his Turkish guards in Baghdad. One of these slaves was a man named Touloun, whose son afterwards played an important part in Egypt.

CHAPTER VIII

THE EMBASSY OF GEORGE OF NUBIA

A.D. 881
 A.M. 547
 A.H. 216

DURING the terrible reprisals which followed on the last attempt of the unhappy Egyptians to throw off the yoke of their Moslem oppressors, the Patriarch Jacob died sorrowing, and was succeeded by a man named Simon, who only survived him a few months. On the death of Simon there was a strong party in favour of choosing a married man as Patriarch, and the feeling on both sides ran so high that the Patriarchal throne remained vacant more than a year. Zachary, Bishop of Wissim, and Theodore of Babylon, desired Isaac—a man who was rich and of noble birth, but whose marriage rendered him canonically ineligible. Unfortunately none of the bishops seem to have been aware, any more than the Copts of the present day, that in primitive times their bishops and Patriarchs had been married men; so the only precedent to which the reform party could appeal was that of Demetrius, about whom the legend had by this time grown that his continence in the married state had been proved by a miracle. On the other hand, Michael of Pelusium and John of Bana, the two bishops who headed the conservative party, had a good deal to say on their side. According to canons which had now been in force for some centuries, marriage clearly incapacitated a man from being made Patriarch ; to violate them would be to give a handle to the Melkite Church, which its members would not be slow to use, and a cause of needless offence to the Church of Antioch and others in communion with them. The conservatives ultimately prevailed : Isaac was rejected, and a man named Joseph, the abbot of the monastery of St. Macarius, was chosen. But the petty tyrant who acted as the Emir's deputy in Lower Egypt wished Isaac to succeed, because a rich man irregularly chosen would have been a mine of wealth to him ; so he refused to allow Joseph to be enthroned unless he were given a bribe of a thousand pieces of gold. Fortunately this man's authority did not extend to Babylon, so the bishops on this occasion were able to set the official at defiance by removing to that city for the consecration.

For some time the Christian kingdoms of Nubia and the Soudan had been increasing in importance, and either during the Kaliphate of Mamoun or of Mutasem—for there is the same confusion of dates among the historians about this event as about the Coptic war—they determined not to continue the slave tribute which had been imposed upon them by the Moslems, and which kept them in a constant state of war with their neighbours, besides being a reproach to their Christianity.

These arguments were strongly insisted upon by the heir to the northern throne, George (or Girghis,¹ as the name is spoken in the East) ; and while the war with the Copts kept the Moslems fully occupied, his father, Zacharias, listened readily enough and stopped the tribute. But when news came of the terrible vengeance which had fallen upon the Christian Egyptians, it became a serious question whether they could continue to defy the Moslem power. George was urgent to do so, but his father shrank from the responsibility. Eventually he determined to send George on an embassy to the Kaliph, that he might see for himself the condition of the Saracen Empire. He was to observe particularly the state of the country, the condition of the army and the fortified towns, the evidence of wealth or poverty ; in short, he was to report fully to his father. If there seemed any reasonable chance of success, Zacharias promised to take up arms against the Moslems immediately on his son's safe return ; but if he judged the case hopeless, he was to present himself before the Kaliph as a suppliant vassal, and promise the continuation of the tribute.

¹ Quatremère, by an odd corruption of Girghis, calls this man Kirky.

He was provided with a cause of appeal to the Kaliph in the latter case : King Zacharias was much troubled by the fact that great numbers of Moslems were settling in his country ; and doing so, not by violence, which he would have prevented, but by purchase. The Nubian Christians—tempted by large offers, and becoming more and more unsettled themselves, owing to the petty wars which the slave tribute rendered necessary—sold large tracts of the richest land in Nubia to the Moslems from Assuan, and these foreign settlers were becoming, as Zacharias felt, a serious danger to the country. Whether the argument which he put forward to the Kaliph against it was a just one, or merely a pretext to avoid speech which might offend Moslem ears, is not stated ; but it amounted to this—that such sales were invalid because the vendors were ' serfs ' of the Nubian king, and had no right to alienate the land, only to cultivate it on condition of paying their taxes.

The news of this appeal seems to have filled the Moslem syndicate of Assuan with dismay. By bribes and entreaties they persuaded the Nubian Christians who had sold them the lands to deny absolutely, when the case came on for trial, that they had owned their lands on any such conditions, or that they could in any sense be called the serfs of their king. The judge, who was a Mohammedan, at once decided, against the king, that the sales were legal, and that the land should remain in the possession of the Moslems.

The case of these lands went with the general question of rebellion or submission, and George saw enough on his long journey to Baghdad to convince him reluctantly that Nubia had no chance of defying, single-handed, the whole force of the Saracen Empire. The Kaliph, moreover, guessed pretty well how affairs stood, and considered it well worth his while to conciliate Nubia. George was received with the greatest honour and loaded with presents. The excuse that the country of Egypt had been too much disturbed of late years for the Nubians to send their tribute was at once accepted, no arrears were demanded, and the concession was even made that the slave tribute should only be sent once in three years instead of every year to the Kaliph. He even granted George the boon of freedom for 'all the prisoners'—presumably all those Christians taken in the late war, to whom the King of Nubia could make out a claim. Among other presents the Kaliph gave George a house at Gizeh and another at Fostat 'in the quarter of Benou-Wail.'

George found the houses useful, for he remained some time in Egypt on his return journey, as he had many things to settle with the Patriarch Joseph. Among other things he requested the Patriarch to consecrate a portable wooden altar, which could follow the King of Nubia in his constant journeys—the ordinary altars of the Egyptian Church being solid and immovable erections. The Patriarch accompanied George for some distance on his return to Nubia, and the project of rebellion against the Moslems was definitely abandoned.

During the Patriarchate of Joseph, the Metropolitan of Abyssinia, who had not long been sent to that country, returned to Joseph as a fugitive. He had in some way incurred the displeasure of the queen, who was acting apparently as regent in the absence of her husband on a military expedition. The queen caused an attempt to be made on the archbishop's life, and he fled the country, returning to his monastery in Egypt. When, however, the King of Abyssinia returned defeated to his country, and discovered what had been done in his absence, he blamed his queen severely. He at once despatched a messenger to the Patriarch with earnest apologies and an entreaty that the archbishop might come back to them. Both the Patriarch and the archbishop were ready to forgive, and the latter returned to his diocese; but, though well received by the king, he never seems to have succeeded in winning the affections of the Abyssinians.

Joseph was evidently a man of great power, and imbued with the spirit of true Christianity. For his sake the Kaliph had ceased at length his terrible reprisals on the Christians; his influence had composed the quarrels of Abyssinia; he had won the strong personal friendship of the Melkite Patriarch, Sophronius; and now he occupied himself in creating new sees in the remote parts of his diocese outside Egypt proper, and strengthening the Church after its recent heavy trials.

He did not altogether escape persecution, however, and it was the misconduct of one of his own priests that brought it upon him. This was a man named Theodore, who had been the right-hand man of Isaac, Bishop of Wissim, and who had set his heart on succeeding Isaac in the bishopric. The Patriarch, however, refused his application, on the ground that the Christians of the diocese greatly desired some one else. Theodore thereupon appealed to the Emir; and the Emir, seeing a chance of plunder, issued a mandate to the Patriarch to consecrate Theodore. Joseph refused, and the Emir at once issued an order for the destruction of all the churches in Fostat and Babylon. They began with those in the ruined fortress of Babylon called by the Arabs Kasr el Shamma,¹ and had already done considerable damage when, unable to resist the entreaties of his people to spare them this persecution, Joseph consented to consecrate Theodore. The Emir further demanded a sum of three thousand pieces of gold, which was subscribed by the wealthiest among the Christians, and the persecution was stopped.

Another ecclesiastic, the Bishop of Babylon, behaved very badly. He wished to raise his bishopric—always one of the most important—to the rank of a Metropolitan see, which should owe no allegiance to the Patriarch of Alexandria,² and asserted his claims in the Mohammedan

¹ In all probability this was originally Kasr el Khemi ('Castle of Egypt').

² About this time the Melkite Patriarch had, in fact, raised four of his few bishoprics to the rank of Metropolitans; and of these four, Babylon was one. The object of this was probably to give precedence to the Melkite bishops over those of the more important National Church in the principal cities of Egypt. As Babylon, from its nearness to Fostat, the seat of the Mohammedan government, was the most important see in the eyes of the Moslems, it is easy to understand why the Bishop of court of law. Fortunately Joseph, instead of pleading Christian tradition, was able to produce an authority which no Mohammedan could deny—the decree of the late Kaliph that no Christian in Egypt was exempt from the authority of the National Patriarch. Incidentally we learn that Joseph could not speak Arabic, and was compelled to give his evidence through an interpreter.

The second son of El Mutasem, El Mutiwakeel, was now Kaliph, and had appointed his own son, El Montaser, Governor (or Emir) of Egypt. Both the Kaliph and his son detested the Christians, and though they were constantly obliged to employ them as architects, as physicians, as accountants—in any capacity, in short, which needed learning or probity—they lost no opportunity of insulting and oppressing them. Unfortunately many of the Christians whom they did so employ, in serving their masters well, forgot the prior obligations they owed to their God and their country. They tried to serve God and Mammon, in fact; and Mammon got the best of it. A Melkite architect, named Eleazar, came into Egypt with authority from the Kaliph to confiscate from the National churches whatever marbles and columns he needed for some building operation. The marbles of the church of St. Mina in the Mareotis, which has been previously described, were the most beautiful in Egypt; and notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of the Patriarch Joseph—Sophronius, who was the architect's own Patriarch, being apparently too timid to interfere—Eleazar removed all the marble pillars from this church. Joseph did what he could to save the church from consequent destruction by substituting other supports, probably piers of masonry ; and it is recorded that long afterwards Eleazar bitterly repented of his action, and sent a large sum of money to the Egyptian Patriarch's successor as compensation for the mischief he had done.

Babylon (National Church) desired to take equal rank with his rival, though the means he employed were indefensible.

El Montaser did not stay long in Egypt, but the deputy whom he appointed cherished a particular spite against the National Patriarch, and during the closing years of the latter's life he suffered much. When the Patriarch of Antioch died, his successor sent the usual synodal letter of information and greeting to the National Church of Egypt, and Joseph came to Alexandria from Masr to receive the legates with due honour. But the Emir chose this moment to arrest him on a false charge, and without trial to have him publicly scourged before the prelates of Antioch. If this were intended, however, to lower Joseph in their eyes, it did not succeed, for they recorded their admiration of the patience with which he had borne the cruel injustice.

The Emir, however, did not stop here. He insulted the Patriarch by entering his room with some of his concubines and polluting the very oratory with their debauchery. Finally, he accused Joseph of a treasonable correspondence with the Byzantines, and on this perfectly unfounded charge threw him into a prison so narrow that he could not sleep, and caused him to be scourged daily. The Christians understood that, as usual, money was the Emir's object, and hastily collected a thousand pieces of gold, which the Emir accepted as ransom. But the Patriarch was now an old man, and his recent sufferings had been too much for him. He died about three weeks afterwards, 849 A.D., thanking God that he had been able to accomplish three things on which his heart had been set : That he had renewed communion with the Church of Antioch ; that he had been able to reform and strengthen the Church of Egypt ; and that he had preserved peace and regulated the ecclesiastical affairs of Abyssinia and Nubia. The Emir who had tortured him preceded him to the grave by several days.

CHAPTER IX

AHMED EBN TOULOUN

A.D. 849
A.M. 565
A.H. 235

JOSEPH'S successor was Michael II., from whom so large a backsheesh was demanded by the Moslem authorities on his accession that he had to sell some of the Church plate before he could make up the sum. And as he died in little over a year, the unfortunate Church of Egypt had hardly paid for one Patriarch before it was called upon to pay for another. This was also a monk of the convent of St. Macarius, named Cosmas, who reigned about seven years. The persecution which had begun before the death of Joseph grew yearly more severe. The Kaliph Mutiwakil issued edict after edict against the Christians, not only in Egypt, where persecution hardly ever ceased entirely, but in all other parts of his dominions as well. Some of these decrees were merely vexations, and seem to the modern reader to involve no great hardship, but it is evident that they were in some way marks of special humiliation. It was the custom, for instance, that no man should wear a girdle and that no woman should be seen without, the girdle or zone being a special mark of feminine modesty. Therefore all Christian women were forbidden to wear girdles, and all male Christians were commanded to appear in them. No Christian was to use any stirrup but one of wood, nor any bridle save a rope. No beast might be ridden by them save an ass or a mule, and even their saddles were to bear a distinguishing mark. Every Christian was to wear a patch, not less than four inches long, sewn on his dress, of a different colour; and his sleeves, no matter what the colour of his dress, were to be honey-coloured. The women were also to wear honey-coloured veils;¹ though it was only to pass in the street undistinguished from Mohammedan women, and therefore safe from insult, that the Christian women had adopted the use of veils at all. Every Christian was to place over his door the wooden figure of an ape, a dog, or a devil. No lights or processions were allowed to them, the use of the cross in their churches and services was forbidden, and no Christians might light a fire without doors—a common practice for cooking purposes among the poorer classes of the East.

The Egyptian bishops did their best to persuade the people to obey these vexatious rules cheerfully, and give no unnecessary offence to their Moslem rulers. They had most difficulty about the girdle, which seems to have been regarded as a peculiarly shameful humiliation. The bishops therefore exhausted their ingenuity in finding symbolic and honourable meanings in the girdle, and ordained that it should be worn even at prayer. Doubtless, too, they reminded the men that our Saviour had ridden upon an ass, and that horses were associated with pomp and war. But other edicts were productive of very real suffering, not to be explained away, such as wholesale dismissal of all the Christians employed in Government offices. This measure was often adopted in times of persecution, but though it entailed a great amount of misery to the individual Christians thus suddenly deprived of employment, it never remained in force many years, for the simple reason that no Moslem Government found itself able to get on without the Christians.

¹ I infer, from various indications, that the yellow or honey-coloured veil was the garment worn by prostitutes, but have not been able to ascertain.

All churches recently erected (the limit of time is not stated, it may have been since the rebellion) were pulled down, and all Christian tombs throughout the country were razed to the ground. The Christians were a prey to the lawlessness and spite of their Moslem neighbours throughout the country, and their condition seemed sufficiently miserable; but the limit was not yet reached. Whether by order of the Kaliph himself, or of the local Emir, a decree was issued which it was hoped would destroy Christianity entirely in Egypt. No funeral service was allowed to the Christian dead, no public prayer to be offered in any church or any place at all throughout the land of Egypt. In order to give full effect to this last prohibition, the growing of grapes and the buying and selling of wine throughout Egypt were forbidden, and the law was carried out so strictly that wine became for the time absolutely unprocurable. In this extremity, since not even the fear of slavery or death could prevent the clergy from celebrating the Holy Communion, they imported grapes, and made a kind of wine in secrecy as it was wanted. By the time the grapes arrived in Egypt they were so dry as to deserve the name of raisins; but they were pressed in water, and the liquid thus obtained either did not, or was not allowed time to ferment. This custom, which a similar persecution about a hundred and fifty years later renewed and caused to endure for some centuries, gave rise to the statement in some modern writers that the Copts made use always of unfermented wine in the administration of the Sacrament. It is true that they did so, on compulsion, for long periods of time; but so far from recommending the practice, they always acknowledged that only necessity could excuse it, and some ecclesiastics doubted whether the validity of such a Sacrament could be maintained. About this time (852 A.D.) the Byzantines made an attempt to regain possession of Egypt, and did occupy Damietta for a time; but instead of helping the Egyptian Christians, this unsuccessful expedition only served to irritate the Moslems yet more, and the laws against Christianity were still more stringently enforced. In the midst of these miseries Cosmas II. died, and was succeeded by Shenouda I. (Sanctius). There had been much discussion about a successor, but finally all the bishops agreed to send for Shenouda as a candidate. It so happened that he entered the Church where they were in session while the service was going on and the words 'He' ('it'—there is no neuter gender) 'is meet and worthy' were being sung. This was taken as a sign that he was the candidate approved of Heaven.

The Emir seized the occasion to exact more money from the Christians, and ordered Shenouda to be arrested; but the newly elected Patriarch escaped, and made a visitation of the monasteries in the remoter parts of his diocese, so that the Moslems could not discover his whereabouts. The goods of the clergy were seized, and the churches of Babylon and Fostat with one exception remained closed. It was probably the news that his clergy were suffering for his sake which determined Shenouda, when at length he heard of it, to return and give himself up. About four thousand pieces of gold were exacted from the Church, and the same amount was to be paid annually to this Emir.

Not long afterwards the Kaliph Mutiwakil was murdered by his son Montazer, who only reigned six months on the throne which he had gained by parricide. On his death a state of great confusion prevailed in the Saracenic Empire. His two sons Moustain and Mutazzi took up arms against each other, while the Turkish guard, which like such bodies in all ages now began to arrogate to itself the privilege of making Kings and Kaliphs at its pleasure, was in favour of Mutasem's grandson. During the short Kaliphate of Moustain, however, the Egyptian Christians experienced a wonderful reverse of fortune. Two of the principal men among them, after solemnly asking the sanction and blessing of their Patriarch, set out for Baghdad to represent the condition to which the recent Emirs had reduced Egypt and to entreat the new Kaliph to do them justice. They succeeded beyond their wildest hopes. Moustain, who was shortly afterwards imprisoned and murdered by his successful brother, saw the importance of conciliating the Egyptian Christians at this juncture, and gave them a deed by which the lands, churches, monasteries, and Church plate which had been taken from them in the recent persecution should be restored to them. This mandate they brought to Shenouda, and he caused copies of it to be despatched to every bishop, from one end of the country to the other, with a letter of consolation and congratulation. 'Thus from Farma to Assuan,' says Severus, 'the churches were rebuilt and religion re-established.' Nor did Egypt suffer from the anarchy which prevailed in other parts of the Empire after the imprisonment of Moustain. A Turk named Muzahem was nominated by Mutazzi, who soon made himself too powerful to be interfered with. He brought with him a large army of Turkish troops, who despised the Arab Moslems almost as much as the latter despised the Christians; and under Muzahem therefore a certain rough justice was meted out to Christian and Mohammedan alike, brigandage was put down, and industry protected. Shenouda profited by this time of peace to carry out much-needed repairs all over the country; but the principal action by which he is remembered is the gift of a good water-supply to the inhabitants of Alexandria. He built an aqueduct, had cisterns constructed in the town, and pipes laid down by which the water was brought into the houses.

Muzahem unfortunately only lived two years, and his son, who took over his duties in Egypt, was soon recalled. A Turk named Babbak was named Governor of Egypt (868), but, instead of going himself, he appointed a financial administrator and a military commander in that country. The latter was Ahmed ebn Touloun, though some historians have doubted whether he were the real or only the adopted son of Touloun. He seems in any case, however, to have been a Turk, and had all the military qualities of the Turk, with a much better education than is usual among men of his nationality. His ambition was unbounded, and he began by depriving his financial coadjutor of his military guard, that it might be quite clear with whom the real power in Egypt should remain. He seems to have restrained the exactions of the financial administrator, whose name was also Ahmed, and who in the short time by which he had preceded Ebn Touloun to Egypt had managed to make himself universally detested. He had doubled the taxes for both Christian and Mohammedan alike—for the first time since the coming of the Moslems putting them on any sort of equality—and had made the sale of natron and the fishery of the country into Government monopolies.

Ahmed ebn Touloun had not been long in Egypt before the Kaliph Mastadi, who had succeeded Mutazzi barely a year before, was murdered, like his predecessor. A son of Mutiwakil, named Mutamid, was then chosen Kaliph by the Turkish troops. The Governor of Syria, however, refused to acknowledge the new Kaliph, who sent orders to Ahmed ebn Touloun to reduce him to submission. Considering that the Syrian Emir openly announced his intention of forming Syria, Armenia, and Egypt into an independent kingdom under himself, and that Ahmed ebn Touloun had similar ambitious views in his own breast, he was very ready to try conclusions with his rival. He left most of his own Turkish troops to garrison Egypt, and brought an army of slaves—negroes, Abyssinians, and Greeks—with whom he marched into Syria. But finding that the Kaliph had already sent another governor into Syria, who was driving the recalcitrant Emir before him without any difficulty, Ahmed concluded that Syria could wait, and returned after two months' absence to Egypt. Finding the palace and barracks too small to contain his Turkish followers, he determined to build a new city to the north of Fostat, which should be as much the peculiar habitation of the Turks as Fostat of the Arabs, and Babylon of the Copts. It is this city of Ahmed ebn Touloun which is the only true 'Masr Antika,' though that name is used by the mediæval and modern Egyptians to include the ruins of Fostat and Babylon. Before Touloun's time there was, properly speaking, no city of Masr, though the name was sometimes applied by the Arabs to Babylon and Fostat collectively. Masr was the Semitic name for Egypt, but Babylon was the name still best known to Europe.¹ The Sultan of Egypt was known to the Franks as the Sultan of Babylon, even after that city had been reduced to the charred heaps among which the old fortress now stands alone.

Ahmed proceeded much on the same plan as the Khedive Ismaïl when he built the recent addition to the modern city known as the Ismaïlieh. He first selected all the sites he was likely to want for his own and Government buildings, and then parcelled out the waste ground into lots, which he gave to his principal retainers on condition that they built and inhabited houses of a sufficient value. He chose a spot farther from the river than Fostat and to the north-west of that city, under the Mokattam hills. Apparently this district had been for centuries the burial-place of the Jews, and more recently of the Christians; but this presented no obstacle to Ahmed ebn Touloun. He gave orders that all tombs were to be demolished, and the material was used in his own constructions. He surrounded the new town with walls and gates, and built himself a magnificent palace by the side of a great meidan.²

The fame of Ahmed's proceedings reached the court of the Kaliph, and excited some suspicion there. Intrigues were not wanting on the part of Ahmed, the financial administrator, who had been an enemy of his great military colleague from the first; and, in the midst of his building, Ahmed received a peremptory order to quit Egypt and come to Samarra, where the Kaliph now resided. Ahmed knew himself strong enough in Egypt to defy the Kaliph, if necessary, and did not obey the order, but he sent his secretary with a rich present and bribes in his stead. The embassy was so successful that Ahmed was not only confirmed in his irregular government—Babbak being all this time the nominal ruler of Egypt—but Ahmed's wife and children, who had been detained for nearly two years at Samarra, were allowed to join him in Egypt. The next year the nominal appointment was taken from Babbak and given to Barkuk, another freed slave, who was Ahmed ebn Touloun's father-in-law, and the financial administrator was dismissed. No one was appointed in his place, and the Emir who under Babbak had ruled in Alexandria and the sea-coast provinces being also dismissed, Ahmed found himself absolute master of Egypt, though still his official title was the deputy of the Governor Barkuk.

¹ Ahmed's new city was also called El Katai. There was already a quarter on the site occupied by soldiers, and called El Askar.

² This word is always translated by the French as manège, or riding-school. Very likely that is the true rendering of the word meidan, but in the vulgar Arabic of to-day it means only a public place or square.

His first care was to regulate and lessen the enormous burden of taxes under which the country groaned. This task entailed the greater sacrifice because Ahmed meted out a rough justice to Christian and Mohammedan alike for the most part, though for very obvious political reasons he favoured the Turk among Moslems and the Melkite among Christians. In the Patriarch of the National Church he saw his only formidable rival, and he took every possible occasion of exacting money from that Church in order to keep it in a state of impotent poverty; but he did this in the shape of arbitrary demands upon the Patriarch, and not so much by special taxes upon the Christians. In the first year alone he remitted taxation to the extent of one hundred thousand dinars, so that his secretary remonstrated with him on this sacrifice of revenue when money was so much needed for his building and other projects. Ebn Touloun was encouraged, it is said, by a dream in which a holy man whom he had known at Tarsus (where he had been educated) appeared to him and assured him that when a prince abandoned his rights (?) for the good of his people, God would send a recompense.

Shortly after, so runs the tale, Ebn Touloun was riding across a desert towards Upper Egypt, when the horse of one of his attendant slaves stumbled and fell with him. He had put his foot into a hole, and the shock of the fall caused the ground to cave in, and disclosed a subterranean excavation—probably a tomb of Pharaonic times. On exploring the place, they found treasure which was valued at a million dinars (about 600,000*l.*).

The news of this marvellous discovery spread quickly through the East, and Ebn Touloun found it necessary to write and ask the Kaliph's permission—which he was not in a position to refuse—to retain the money in Egypt and expend it on public works. Naturally the finding of one such treasure set the Moslems digging for more, and one man in particular, it is said, demolished a considerable part of the abandoned city of Heliopolis in search of treasure, but he found nothing, though Ebn Touloun, who also continued to dig in likely places, afterwards found another treasure of even greater value than the first.

Ebn Touloun made a liberal distribution to the poor, and spent the rest on his new town. He built a mosque on an elevated spur of the Mokattam, and others, besides a hospital, in the town. He devoted much care to the water-supply of his new city, which, considering its position, must have presented some difficulties. There was but one spring, which was known by the name of 'the Fountain of Abu Kaled.' When Ebn Touloun built his reservoir he was advised to fill it from the source of Abu Kaled, but refused, on the ground that if he did so the reservoir would always keep the old name of Abu Kaled, whereas he intended it to bear his own, and be a perpetual memorial to posterity of himself.

The architects and mathematicians of Egypt have always been Copts, and Ebn Touloun's workmen were no exception to the rule. His principal architect was a Christian of great renown for his talents in that line, and to him Ebn Touloun committed the task of bringing water into the new city in a form which should be at once beautiful, substantial, and lasting. The Christian sank a shaft to a great depth in the Southern Desert, and brought the water in on a lofty aqueduct of innumerable arches, much like the one which, in later times, Saladin constructed to bring water to his citadel. Both aqueducts exist to this day; the later one is known to every Egyptian tourist, the earlier one is rarely visited. It crosses the desert to the east of Masr, Fostat, and Babylon, and could be seen, by those who knew where to look, from the old line of the Helwan railway.

This aqueduct was considered one of the greatest wonders of its day, and when it was finished Ebn Touloun rode out in state to see it and compliment the builder. But one of the workmen had carelessly left a heap of loose building material in the wrong place; the Emir's horse stumbled and fell with him. Ebn Touloun does not seem to have been hurt, but the circumstance was a very bad omen for him, and he was proportionately angry. Instead of paying the Christian the sum agreed upon, Ebn Touloun had him immediately arrested and thrown into prison, where he remained some time.

Ebn Touloun had the canal of Alexandria cleaned out and repaired, and constructed additional cisterns in that town, besides rebuilding the upper part of the great lighthouse. He had previously repaired the Nilometer in the island of Rhoda; he built a hospital in Fostat, and public baths; and himself inspected these establishments to see that they were carried on properly. On one occasion one of the madmen confined in the hospital attempted his life, but this did not deter him from his regular visits. In short, Egypt had not been so well cared for since the Arab conquest; but though the ordinary population rejoiced in him, the National Patriarch and the semi-military bands of Moslems who under different leaders had plundered and oppressed the country at their pleasure for generations had both reason—though very different reason—to complain.

CHAPTER X

THE ADVENTURES OF EL OMARI

ONE of these Mohammedan adventurers stands out from the rest by reason of his greater talent and the mischief that he wrought in Nubia. Makrizi traces his descent from the Kaliph Omar, and gives his name as Abu Abderahman el Omari el Edoui el Karshi,¹ but he is better known by his nickname of El Omari. This man was born and brought up at Medina, but had studied at Fostat. He had fought under Ibrahim, another of the robber chiefs who gave Ebn Touloun so much trouble, and received from him a large sum of money, with which he returned to Fostat. In the course of conversation with Egyptians who had preserved some knowledge of their ancient country, he heard them speak of the gold mines in the south which used in old times to yield so great a revenue. El Omari at once determined to go in search of these gold mines and appropriate them. He kept his design, of course, a profound secret, and gave out that he was about to undertake a great trading expedition to the south. He bought slaves, with whom he intended to work the mine, and travelled first to Assuan, where he managed to obtain trustworthy information concerning the whereabouts of the ancient mines.

¹ Another writer calls him Abd el Hamid el Omari.

At last he reached the place where one of them was said to be, but found a tribe of Arabs encamped there. There had been some trouble between them and the Arabs of Rebiah, owing to the murder of one of the former; but the matter was amicably arranged, and peace was sworn between the two tribes. This did not suit Omari at all, and he persuaded the tribe of Modar, notwithstanding their agreement, to fall on the Arabs of Rebiah. The battle, however, went against El Omari and his allies, and he was obliged to leave the place, but made his way south to another mine. This was much farther from the Nile, and his followers suffered greatly from thirst. They do not seem to have known at first in what direction to seek the Nile, but a flight of birds showed them the way, and El Omari despatched some men to bring water.

He was now, however, well within the Christian kingdom of Nubia, and it may be imagined that the Nubians looked with hostile eyes upon his invasion of their territories. They retained his men as prisoners, and though El Omari came in person to negotiate with them, they positively refused—by the simple expedient of withholding the water-supply, and killing those who persisted in coming for it—to allow him to settle himself in their neighbourhood. El Omari had no intention of giving up his plans, and calling his men together he marched from the desert into Nubia.

He struck the Nile at a place which Quatremère called 'Shenkir,' to the south of Dongola, took the Nubians by surprise, and gained a complete victory, killing great numbers of them and taking a quantity of prisoners, to be sold as slaves. Makrizi says: 'So great was the number that when one of the conquerors wanted his head shaved, he would pay the barber by the gift of a slave.'

The Nubians who succeeded in escaping took to their boats, and, taking their goods with them, crossed the Nile. El Omari had no boats, so they fancied themselves secure ; but their enemy was a man of resource. He caused the leathern waterskins of his company to be inflated with air, and a picked body of men were told off to cross the Nile on these under cover of the night, and to capture all the boats of the Nubians. In this enterprise they were entirely successful. It is recorded that when the passage of the river was successfully achieved, one of Omari's men whispered to his nearest companions to draw him out of the water, as he was helpless. A crocodile had bitten off his foot as they crossed the Nile, but he had restrained himself from uttering a cry, for fear of giving the Nubians notice of their approach.

By this time the King of Nubia had heard of El Omari's proceedings, and sent an army to drive the Moslem adventurer out of his country. The reigning king was the same George, son of Zacharias, who had given up the idea of repudiating the slave tribute after his journey to Baghdad. He was now an old man, and seems to have been much respected in his kingdom. His picture was long preserved in the ancient church of 'Dermes,'¹ a town on the Nile, which also enclosed a splendid temple, still in good preservation in the time of Abu Selah. This picture represented King George at the age of eighty years, seated upon a throne of ebony, inlaid with ivory and covered with plates of gold. The royal crown is on his head, enriched with precious stones and surmounted by a golden cross.

Niouti, the general whom King George sent against

¹ Otherwise spelt Darmus or Termus ; it was a cathedral city.

El Omari, was his son-in-law and at the same time apparently his nephew. Several fights took place between El Omari and Niouti, without either side obtaining much advantage. At length Niouti turned traitor, and, making a treaty with El Omari, turned his arms against his king. George then despatched his eldest son with fresh troops, but he was defeated in the unequal combat with El Omari and Niouti, and, not daring to return to his father, fled to the southern kingdom (also Christian) of Alouah, and sought refuge at that court.

The unhappy George of Nubia had a younger son named Zacharias, who now offered to rid the country of both the Moslem Omari and the traitor Niouti, if he were allowed a free hand. The king gave him the necessary powers and a third army.

Zacharias began by opening negotiations with El Omari, to such good purpose that the latter agreed to remain neutral while Zacharias punished his traitorous brother-in-law. Zacharias then attacked Niouti, but after a hard struggle was defeated, his army scattered, and he himself sought refuge in flight. He went straight to Omari, representing himself as an ambassador from Zacharias, who wished for a personal interview with him, and demanded a safe-conduct for that purpose, assuring him that Zacharias had full powers from the king, and was ready to make favourable terms. Having obtained the safe-conduct, he revealed his identity, and, says the Moslem historian, El Omari 'was filled with esteem for a prince at once so young and so prudent'!

Zacharias remained with El Omari till he had entirely won his confidence and lulled his suspicions. He betrayed to this Moslem invader the secrets of the tombs which the Christian descendants of the old Egyptians had till then preserved inviolate, and allowed El Omari to plunder them at his will. When he had acquired complete ascendancy over El Omari, he unfolded to him a part of his further plan. Niouti, he suggested, was their joint enemy; if he were only disposed of, El Omari and himself could share the kingdom. Niouti's widow, who was sister to Zacharias, should be given to El Omari to wife, which would win him favour in the eyes of the Nubians.

El Omari objected that Niouti was a good general, and that his army was the larger and better. Zacharias assured him that he had no notion of fighting; but would manage it by a stratagem. El Omari, who had evidently unbounded confidence in the young rascal's power of intrigue, bade him do as he liked, and put four of his best and bravest officers under his orders.

Zacharias embarked on the Nile in a small boat, and gave his companions their instructions on the way, which they promised faithfully to carry out. They left him bound and helpless, on an island opposite Niouti's camp; and then rowed within speaking distance of the enemy on the bank, calling out that they desired to speak with the general. Niouti came to the shore, and the four officers, saluting him in the name of El Omari, informed him that they had brought Zacharias according to his desire (for Niouti appears to have written to El Omari, asking him to deliver his enemy Zacharias into his hands), and were ready to give him up in return for money and slaves.

After some bargaining, a large sum was agreed upon, but Niouti stipulated that he should see Zacharias, and be satisfied of his identity before paying anything. The officers had expected this, and readily agreed, but when Niouti began to embark with a large number of his followers they objected. They pointed out that they were only four, and that they did not choose to run the risk of his murdering them, and making off with their prisoner without paying the ransom. Niouti thereupon commanded his followers to remain behind, and rowed to the island with only two or three attendants. Carpets had been spread, and a throne prepared for him, and when he had taken his place, Zacharias was dragged before him, having before instructed the four officers that when he gave the signal by bursting into tears, they were to kill Niouti.

Niouti certainly rushed upon his fate. He began by striking his bound and helpless young relative, and pouring out a volley of abuse; Zacharias affected to plead with him for some time, and then burst into tears. The four officers promptly fell upon Niouti and killed him. Then Zacharias was hastily unbound, and, with some courage, went at once with his small following across the river, and called upon the soldiers of Niouti's camp to return to their allegiance; promising them an amnesty for the past. Being joyfully welcomed, he summoned a secret council of the principal officers, and confided to them what he intended to do. In public, on the contrary, he affected still to be a friend of El Omari's, and ordered that the four Arab officers should be treated with all honour.

He wrote to El Omari, telling him of his complete success, and begging him to prepare for the reception of the splendid troops he was about to bring him. Having sent off this message he threw off his mask, and put to death the four Arab officers who had accompanied him, and gave the word for a march upon El Omari.

He crossed the river close to the camp of El Omari, and marched on in such guise, that one of El Omari's companions began to feel suspicious. 'This Infidel,' he pointed out, was entering their very camp, and that at the head of a larger army than their own. El Omari assured him there was nothing to fear, but the next moment Zacharias gave the signal, and his army fell upon the Moslems. A great number were killed; but El Omari himself, with some of his troops, hastily took refuge in the boats and went down the river. However, Zacharias had foreseen this move, and posted one of his subjects whom he could depend upon, a well-known river pilot, with instructions what to do. As he expected, this man was impressed by El Omari, with the promise of a large sum if he took them safely down the cataracts. The pilot ordered them to tie all their boats together, and took his place in the first. Then he guided them into a perfectly impracticable passage; and when the fatal moment came, flung himself into the water and saved himself by swimming. Every boat in the flotilla was whirled down and smashed to atoms; and no man of the soldiers who had embarked in them was left alive. El Omari himself, however, had not embarked with this first contingent of his army; and though much weakened by so heavy a loss, he managed to maintain his position in Nubia for nearly a year longer. Little by little Zacharias, by bribes and intrigues, managed to detach from him some of the Bedouin tribes who had joined El Omari, and finally marched against him with a large army. El Omari did not venture to meet him, and retreated towards Egypt, but about a day's journey from Assuan, he found himself confronted by a new enemy.

One of the powerful robber chiefs who had tyrannised over Egypt for so long was a man called Ibrahim Soufi, who had made himself master of Esneh, where he devastated the whole district, and put to death anyone who ventured to dispute his authority. The first expedition that Ahmed ebn Touloun sent against him, he defeated, but Ebn Touloun hastened to send a stronger force, which routed Ibrahim entirely, near Akmim. Ibrahim himself escaped, and took refuge with the remnant of his followers in the Oasis. Here he had gathered strength, probably from the remains of the robber bands who were one after another being dispersed, and now, like Omari, he proposed to conquer a fresh stronghold for himself in the fertile country of Nubia. Meeting El Omari in retreat from Zacharias, he at once attacked him; but El Omari, driven to desperation, fought so well that he defeated Ibrahim, who fled to Assuan, where he fell into the hands of a third Moslem army, commanded by Shabah el Babeki; whom Ahmed ebn Touloun had sent to recall El Omari, and put a stop to his proceedings in Nubia. The remains of Ibrahim's army deserted him, and seemed to have joined the standard of El Omari, against whom Shabah el Babeki next marched. El Omari, after endeavouring in vain to treat with him, joined battle, and drove him back into Egypt, following him as far as Edfou, and fighting another battle north of Assuan with the troops of Ahmed ebn Touloun.

Zacharias rejoiced to be thus rid of his enemy, but he reckoned without his host. Egypt, under Ahmed ebn Touloun, was less safe for a robber chief than Nubia, and next year we find El Omari again trying to establish himself at the Mines in spite of the Bedouin tribes, who were not much more anxious for his presence. After a long series of bloody fights, one of the principal sheikhs of the tribe of Modar swore to rid the country of the fellow, laid a trap for him, and murdered him.

Two of El Omari's slaves thought to make money by their master's death, and, cutting off his head, took it to Ahmed ebn Touloun, declaring that they had killed him. Ebn Touloun, after satisfying himself that it was really the head of El Omari, asked the slaves if their master had treated them badly, and what was their cause of complaint. They answered that they had none, but desired to gain the favour of the Emir. Ahmed ebn Touloun assured them that, on the contrary, their crime had justly aroused the wrath of God and of himself. He then ordered El Omari's murderers to be scourged and crucified, 'after which their heads were cut off!'

CHAPTER XI

THE NEW CITY AND MOSQUE OF EBN TOULOUN

A.D. 880
A.M. 596
A.H. 266

BESIDES the Moslem robber chiefs of Egypt, Shenouda, th Patriarch of the National Church, was regarded with suspicion, as a possible rival, if allowed to become formidable, by Ahmed ebn Touloun. He did not at first openly persecute the Church, but on a false charge of embezzling money being brought by an unworthy deacon against the Patriarch, he immediately seized on a pretext for extortion. Not only Shenouda, but all his prelates, were arrested and dragged to Masr. They were stripped of their bishops' robes, set upon asses without saddles, and dragged in a ribald procession through the streets of the Moslem city, a mark for every insult. Shenouda himself was kept for thirty days in prison, suffering severely from gout at the time; but when brought at length to trial, he clearly proved the falsity of the accusation against him. The indignation of the Christian population against his slanderer was so great that the unhappy man threw himself on the mercy of the very man whom he had just endeavoured to ruin. Shenouda not only forgave him, but gave him money enough to reach Sais, his native place, besides a beast of burden and three changes of raiment, though his secretary remonstrated with him on his leniency. Indeed, he seems to have been justified in the remonstrance, for some time afterwards the deacon again attempted to get money by falsely accusing Christians to the Moslem authorities, but was arrested by the Emir's order in Sais, and scourged so severely that he nearly died of the effects. From this time it was not an uncommon thing for renegade or nominal Christians to curry favour with the Mohammedan Emirs by falsely accusing their countrymen, and giving the authorities the pretext they wanted for extortion.

Shenouda was a great collector of old manuscripts. On one occasion, when the usual accusation of amassing treasure was made against him, and Ebn Touloun sent to examine his chests, they were found full of these manuscripts. He is also accused by the Moslems, and probably with truth, of making converts from them to the Christian religion, in spite of the fact that fresh orders had been received from the Kaliph 'to exterminate the Christian religion in Egypt.' This order does not seem to have been immediately followed by an increase of persecution, and not long after Ahmed ebn Touloun openly rebelled against the nominal authority of the Kaliph, and proclaimed himself Sultan of Egypt and Syria.

Expecting the invasion of an army sent by the Kaliph to punish him, he hastily strengthened the defences of Fostat, and built a new fortress in the Island of Rodah to command the river, which was also defended by a line of a hundred armed galleys. Signal stations were established, and carrier pigeons were kept in readiness to give the earliest intelligence. The export of grain was prohibited, and the citadel which Ahmed had been constructing for the defence of his new city was completed in a marvellously short space of time by men working in relays, day and night.

Fortunately for Egypt, his power was not put to the expected test. The troops sent against him mutinied against their commander, and broke up in disorder before ever they reached the frontier of Egypt, and Ebn Touloun was left in undisputed possession of the country. He won popularity with his people by distributing great largesse on this occasion, and paid liberally for the overtime of his workmen; so that Moslem writers compute the total cost of these defensive preparations against an invasion which never took place at more than 80,000 dinars.

Being now firmly established on the throne of Egypt, Ebn Touloun determined to build a mosque for his new city, which should surpass in size and magnificence all others in Egypt. It had not yet become the fashion to copy the domes and minarets¹ of the Christian churches, though we know that the Moslems already admired them, since we learn that Abd el Aziz gave the Patriarch leave to build two churches in his city of Helwan, on the ground that such buildings would be an ornament. The mosque of the first few centuries of the Moslem era was a plain unroofed court, which, though rich materials were sometimes used in the construction, had no pretensions to architectural beauty. They soon, however, began to build cloisters round them with pillars taken by force from the Christian churches, which no Arab was capable of carving for himself. There are Saracenic pillars of late date now existing, but it is not difficult to tell the difference. There is a fine mosque of early date in Mohalleh el Kebir, which contains about one hundred columns, not less than seventy-four of which have manifestly been taken from Christian churches. It is the same with almost all of the columns of El Azhar, and with every mosque of any age throughout the country. If, in visiting Egyptian villages known to have possessed fine churches in the early centuries, you find no church still occupying the ancient site, you have only to look into the village mosque, and you will find the pillars of its nave looking sadly out of place, and very often upside down.

¹ The first to build a mosque with minarets like a church was a governor of Egypt, who ruled from 668 to 682 A.D.; but it was not usual till much later.

Ebn Touloun, however, desired his mosque to be accepted as a thankoffering and a sin offering by Allah; it was, therefore, necessary that it should be in strict accordance with the rules laid down in the Koran. The Koran was solemnly brought and read before the Sultan that there might be no mistake. But when the command was read which absolutely forbade any stolen material whatever to be used in the construction of a mosque, Ebn Touloun rent his clothes and cried out that the thing was impossible. Did anyone ever hear of a beautiful mosque being built without the pillars for its colonnade being taken from the Christians? Where else was it possible to obtain them—this one infraction of the law must needs be forgiven.

The news of the Sultan's perplexity soon spread, and, doubtless, the Christians feared that a Moslem authority would soon be found to persuade him that spoliation of the infidels was not theft, and might safely be indulged in. But the famous Christian architect,¹ who had languished in prison ever since the Sultan's horse had stumbled over his workman's rubbish, was quick to seize the opportunity.

¹ The name of this architect was probably Ibn Katib el Farghani. If so, he was a martyr in a later persecution.

He sent to assure the Sultan that, if the latter would release him, he would undertake to build a larger mosque, with a finer colonnade than any before seen, and yet to observe faithfully the right condition that no stolen material should be used. Ebn Touloun liberated him on trial, and the architect, by the simple expedient which apparently had occurred to no one else, of building piers instead of stealing pillars, produced the desired effect. The mosque exists to this day, with comparatively little alteration, though it has often been restored,¹ and was partly rebuilt by Sultan Khamil. In Ismail's time it was used as a temporary prison for the incurables, who had before begged in the streets, but were not to be allowed to do so during the visit of the Empress Eugenie. The chief peculiarity about the mosque is the shape of its arches, which are believed to be the earliest pointed ones known. They also give the earliest example of the inward curve above the capital which later developed into the 'horse-shoe' arch. The design of the minaret is said to have been furnished by Ahmed himself, and the anecdote of its conception is known even to the Cairo dragoman. All the primitive churches in Egypt had the fountain for ablutions which has now become pre-eminently the characteristic of a mosque, and, in addition to the exterior basin, Ebn Touloun's architect constructed a beautiful fountain with a mosaic pavement in the midst of the great court of the mosque. The inscriptions which were placed on the arcade giving an account of the building of the mosque still exist; or did so a few years ago. New government offices were constructed on one side of the mosque, and a public school, where once a week the Moolla appointed to that post explained the 'traditions' of the Moslems—not an alarming amount of education, though it seems to have been unusual among Turkish families to learn even so much. Ahmed enforced the regular attendance of his own sons and the sons of his courtiers. The new mosque was solemnly dedicated with great ceremony; and the architect, instead of being sent back to prison on some fresh trivial pretext, was clothed with a robe of honour, paid the full sum due to him, and a pension besides assigned to him for the rest of his natural life.¹

¹ Since this passage was written the mosque has been again restored.

Having finished the building of his city, Ebn Touloun next proclaimed a holy war against the Greeks, as the subjects of the Byzantine Empire were called.² He marched through Syria, receiving the submission of the governor of that country on his way, and began a career of conquest in Asia Minor. Antioch, Mopsuestia, Adana, and Tarsus had already fallen when he received news that his eldest son Abbas, whom he had left his deputy in Egypt, had revolted against him and declared himself independent.

Ebn Touloun finished the work he had immediately on hand, and then, leaving the greater part of his forces in Asia Minor under Loulu, he marched to punish his son. Abbas, on the approach of his father, left Fostat and took refuge in Gizeh, taking with him, however, all the money in the treasury, about 2,000,000 dinars, and Ahmed el Wasati, whom his father had left him as assistant. El Wasati had refused to join in the rebellion and was loaded with chains to prevent his escape.

¹ There is good reason to believe that he was beheaded a few years later, on his refusal to renounce his faith and become a Mohammedan.

² We must again point out that the actual word used in Arabic for the subjects of the Byzantine Empire is Roumi, i.e. Roman. But they always translate it into European languages by the word 'Greek,' and the Byzantines are commonly called Greeks by the medieval and later writers. Strictly speaking, to translate Roumi by 'Greek' is even more inaccurate than to translate Agupti by 'Copt.' To talk of Romans and Egyptians, however, would but unnecessarily confuse the ordinary reader in such a connection.

Ebn Touloun wrote letters of affectionate remonstrance to his son, desiring him to return to his allegiance; but the Turks who had at first persuaded Abbas to rebel now withheld him from accepting his father's offer of pardon, well knowing that it would not be extended to themselves. The rebel party retreated towards the north, and took refuge in Leptis Magna, as the Governor of Kirouan (the ancient Cyrene) had refused to receive them. After many losses Abbas fell into the hands of his father in the autumn of the year 881, and was brought a prisoner to Fostat.

Three months afterwards Ebn Touloun brought his son out of prison, and, confronting him with his companions in rebellion, desired him to cut off their hands and feet with his own hand. Abbas obeyed, whereupon Ebn Touloun overwhelmed him with reproaches for such mean and unworthy compliance, and such ready desertion of his friends. Abbas was severely scourged and returned to prison.

Ahmed ebn Touloun soon conceived vaster and more ambitious projects still, but he wanted money, for his rebellious son had emptied the treasury, and he had not lately found any rich tombs to yield him treasure. In this difficulty he turned to the usual resource of plundering the Christians; and again it must be confessed that a renegade from their own number suggested the way.

The Patriarch Shenouda had died during Ahmed's war against his son, and apparently his successor Michael had not yet been called upon to pay the usual fine. While Ahmed's attention had been distracted from the Christians they had also begun again to build churches, and among them the Patriarch was called to preside at the consecration of one to St. Ptolemy at Denuschar, a town in the diocese of Xoïs (modern name Saka, in the northern Delta). The Patriarch, with several bishops and a large body of the principal laymen of the diocese, arrived at the time appointed and found no Bishop of Xoïs to receive them. They gathered in the church and waited some time, but the bishop did not appear, and at length a messenger was despatched to his house to make inquiries. The reply came back that the bishop had not yet finished breakfast, at which he was entertaining a large party of his friends.¹ Indignant at the discourtesy, the assembled bishops begged the Patriarch to begin the service without him, and after some hesitation Michael did so. The service was more than half way through when the Bishop of Xoïs entered and furiously demanded why, in his own diocese, another prelate had dared to celebrate the Holy Eucharist. Advancing to the altar, he seized the offered, although not consecrated, bread, flung it to the ground, and went out. The Patriarch again going through the office of Oblation with another Host, finished the Liturgy and distributed the Communion to the people.²

On the following day, before dispersing, the Patriarch and the bishops who had witnessed this disgraceful scene

¹ This incident shows that even at this time fasting communion was not a rule absolute, since no one present appears to have advanced the argument that the bishop had thus disqualified himself from taking his proper part in the service.

² Michael of Tanis, as quoted by Neale.

held a synod, in which the Bishop of Xoïs was unanimously condemned. He was at once deposed and another consecrated in his place. The unworthy bishop, furiously angry, went straight to Masr and complained of the Patriarch to Ahmed ebn Touloun, who received him—and the pretext which he had so anxiously sought against the Church—with great satisfaction. Michael was summoned, and the Sultan demanded that everything used in the service of all the churches except the vestments—everything, that is, capable of being turned into coin—should be given up to him throughout the land. Michael refused, and was at once thrown into prison.

Here he remained for a year, till Ahmed ebn Touloun was reluctantly compelled to recognise that neither imprisonment nor the fear of death would make the Patriarch yield to such a demand. The Christian officials of the Court were, as usual, earnest with the Sultan in behalf of their Patriarch, and at length the following compromise was arrived at. John, the chief secretary of the Sultan, with his son Macarius, gave bail for the Patriarch to the amount of 20,000 pieces of gold, which the unhappy Michael promised to collect, hoping thus to save the country from the miseries of a fresh persecution. Half of the sum was to be paid within one month, the remaining moiety within four months.

Michael began by selling some of the houses belonging to the Church, and some land outside Fostat, which seems to have been formerly occupied by a colony of Abyssinians. Seeing his difficulties, the Jews of Babylon thought it a favourable time to bargain with him for a ruined Melkite church, now in the hands of the National Church, but apparently unused, which was to the Jews the most sacred spot in Babylon, as they claimed, and declare to this day, that it contains the tomb of the Prophet Jeremiah. It was certainly the site of an ancient Jewish synagogue built in pre-Christian times, and had apparently become a Christian church through the conversion of the old Jewish colony in the first century of our era. Hidden there, in a place the secret of which was known only to the Jews, and transmitted by them from one generation to another, was an ancient roll of the Law, which they claim to have been written by Ezra, and which was never to be opened even by themselves, so terrible was the curse laid upon anyone who should tamper with it.¹ Michael, tempted by his sore need, and probably attaching but little sanctity to a ruined Melkite site, sold the long-coveted spot to the Jews, in whose hands it has remained ever since.

The bishops met in synod, and determined that each one should in his diocese levy a small contribution on every member of his flock, but still the amount collected was very far from enough; the month was passing swiftly, and Michael was almost in despair. He had shown that he was ready to meet torture and death himself; but he knew what the result would be to John, Macarius, and the whole Church if he failed to meet his bond.

In this extremity Michael took a step which he bitterly regretted all his life, and which has covered his name with obloquy. During the year of his imprisonment no less than ten bishoprics had fallen vacant which must now be filled up. In spite of being the first to suffer in times of persecution, the office of a bishop was still greatly desired by the Egyptians; presumably, for the sake of the great power which they possessed over their own countrymen, since it is impossible to discover any other inducement, except to such sincere and zealous Christians as were not likely to accept Michael's terms. These were that each bishop elect should pay a heavy contribution on his consecration towards the sum due to the Sultan. Ten such men were readily found and the money paid down. Michael thus earned for himself the reproach of being the first Patriarch who practised simony. Without attempting to justify his conduct, it yet seems fair to point out that he had far more excuse than is usually allowed by ecclesiastical historians, and also that our English Church is hardly in a position to condemn the Egyptian. No one has ever accused Michael of consecrating unworthy bishops for the sake of the money they could offer, or of applying the money so obtained to his personal uses, any more than our own authorities allow any consideration of money to influence their choice, or pocket the ordination fees paid to the officials. Still, it should be remembered that the Egyptian bishops paid heavy fees to make up the ransom demanded by a Moslem for the safety of their Church; while English bishops, in profound peace under a Christian ruler, to this day pay fees to officials of the Crown and the archbishop, amounting in many cases to nearly 300*l.*, on their consecration.

¹ A Scotchman and an American, by means which I do not justify, saw and handled this roll in its hiding-place about eighteen years ago. The alarm was given, and it has since disappeared. Its real age and history can only be guessed.

Even this strong measure proving insufficient, Michael next invented the system of 'pew rents.' Monks who had been always in the habit of occupying the same seats in the parish churches, were now made to pay a certain sum for the use of them to the Patriarch, the money so obtained being paid over like the rest to the Mohammedan authorities. Still the sum was not sufficient, and, as a last resource, Michael went to the collegiate body, or Chapter, of Alexandria, and asked that the ornaments of the Alexandrian churches might be sold to avert the threatened persecution.

The Alexandrian clergy positively refused at first, but in the end agreed to raise the rest of the sum on condition that Michael should bind not only himself, but his successors, to pay an annual sum of 1,000 pieces of gold to the Alexandrian Church. By these expedients the 10,000 pieces of gold were raised within the month, and paid to Ahmed ebn Touloun.

But in the height of his successes Ahmed's career was ended by his death in the prime of life. He was pushing his victories in Asia Minor when he fell seriously ill, owing, it is said, to his having drunk an enormous quantity of buffalo's milk. The Christian physician, Said Theophilus, who accompanied him, in vain assured him that the strictest regimen was necessary for his restoration to health. Ahmed absolutely refused to obey orders, and in consequence became so ill that he determined to return to Egypt, leaving the conduct of the war to one of his generals. He was carried through Syria in a litter, and was brought by water through Egypt to Fostat. Finding that he grew rapidly worse instead of better, he called before him all the doctors of the town, and threatened them with death if they did not cure him. By his orders, a solemn litany of supplication was performed in his behalf, in which all the religions of the country joined. First a great company of Moslems bearing the Koran ; then the Jews with the Pentateuch and the Psalms ; then the Christian bishops and clergy bearing the Gospels, followed by the school-masters of the town at the head of their pupils, passed out of the town, and took their way to the heights of the Mokattam in solemn procession, appealing to the one God whom they all acknowledged for the recovery of their ruler. Abundant alms were given to the Moslem poor, and in all the mosques prayers were offered without ceasing night and day. At length, finding that he grew worse instead of better, and that the end drew near, Ahmed ordered the liberation of a man whom he had unjustly confined, and made his peace with God, dying with the Moslem confession of faith upon his lips.

CHAPTER XII

THE DYNASTY OF EL IKSHID

A.D. 884 AHMED EBN TOULOUN left thirty living children behind him,
 A.M. 600 of whom Khamarayeh, the second son, succeeded him;
 A.H. 270 Abbas, the eldest, having forfeited his natural rights by his rebellion. It is said that his father forgave him before his death and released him from prison, though confirming the succession to his second son. It is certain, however, that Abbas was put to death almost immediately after, but most authorities agree that the warrant for his death was extorted with great difficulty from Khamarayeh by his councillors. The new Sultan immediately conciliated the National Church by remitting the 10,000 gold pieces still due of the sum demanded from Michael, and returning to him the bond. Khamarayeh paid a regular tribute to the Kaliph, but was absolutely independent master of Egypt, Syria, and a great part of Asia Minor during his reign, which lasted barely twelve years. He built a second palace for himself in the new town commenced by his father, the Arab accounts of which surpass all belief. Among other wonders they relate that statues of the Sultan and his wives were placed in the gardens of the palace, and that a basin of nearly twenty-nine metres in diameter was filled with a lake of quicksilver. The first point is noteworthy because up to this time no Christian architect had been allowed to introduce statues or paintings of human beings in the buildings which they erected for their Moslem masters.

A few years afterwards the Kaliph Mutamid died, and the Sultan of Egypt thought to strengthen his alliance with the new Kaliph, who might prove a less feeble man, by offering his daughter in marriage to the Kaliph's son. The Kaliph (Mutadid) accepted the offer for himself, and the bride was brought to Damascus by her father with the greatest pomp and ceremony. But shortly after the wedding, and while Khamarayeh was still at Damascus, a conspiracy in his hareem, of which different accounts are given by the Christian and Moslem writers, brought about his assassination in the thirty-first year of his life.¹ He was succeeded by two sons, Geysh and Haroun, in rapid succession, the latter of whom maintained a precarious independence in Egypt until late in the year 904 (A.H. 292), when a new Kaliph (Muktazi) sent an army into Egypt under Mohammed ebn Sulieman to recover control of the country. Haroun died on the field of battle; his uncle Sinan or Shaban, as he is indifferently called, made a last attempt to retrieve the fortunes of his family, but was assassinated by his own people within the month. All the descendants of Ahmed ebn Touloun were arrested, their property confiscated, and ten of the principal members of his family were sent in chains to Baghdad. A man named Issa el Nushari was appointed Governor of Egypt, but the country suffered much during this process of change, and both the Patriarchs of the Egyptian Churches seem to have perished during these troubles. Nor did either Church venture to elect a successor for some years. The great confusion of the annals of the country at this time prevents any positive statement being made, but it seems probable that the Egyptian Patriarchate remained vacant about fourteen years, and the Greek eleven. Of the Greek Patriarch Michael nothing is known during his reign of thirty-seven years, which covered the rise and fall of the Toulounide dynasty, save a letter in which he congratulated Photius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, on his reinstatement. This Patriarch had been condemned and deposed by the eighth Ecumenical Council, but was now restored by another Council at Constantinople, to which both Rome and the Greek Church in Egypt sent legates. It is in this letter that we find mention of the newly created Metropolitans of that Church: Zachary of Tamianthus (Damietta), James of Babylon, Stephen of Thebes (Luxor), and Theophilus of Bari.

¹ Khamarayeh was favourable to the Christians, and it is said that he used to spend hours in silent adoration before the picture in the Melkite church of El Kosseir. He was on the most friendly terms with the monks there, and built a loggia in their precincts that he might enjoy the scenery on his visits to them.

The Greek Church, however, was the first to receive a new Patriarch, under Mekni, the Emir who succeeded Issa el Nushari. This Patriarch, like so many of his predecessors and successors, was a foreigner imposed upon the Egyptians from without. He was a native of Aleppo, and was elected and consecrated Patriarch for Egypt by the Patriarch of Jerusalem in 907. On his arrival in Egypt the Melkites indignantly refused to acknowledge him unless he would go through the forms of re-election and consecration at their hands, to which he readily agreed. His name was Christodulos, but he seems to have been more generally known in Egypt by the Arabic equivalent—Abd-el-Messiah.

A year or two later, probably in 910, Gabriel, a monk of the monastery of Macarius, was elected Patriarch of the National Church. He was a devout and tolerant, but not a very energetic man, and continued the practice, which Michael had begun, of imposing consecration fees upon the elected bishops in order to raise funds for the yearly payment to Alexandria to which his predecessor had committed himself in his difficulties. Nor was the tax which had been levied on all members of the Church to meet the exorbitant demands of Ahmed ebn Touloun remitted by Gabriel.

Shortly after his accession fresh troubles came upon the unhappy land. In the year 893 (A.H. 280) a strong body of Arabs, known as the Fatimite party because their head claimed descent from Fatima, the daughter of Mohammed, had made themselves masters of Pentapolis and the surrounding districts, and sixteen years later their leader assumed the title of Kaliph in opposition to the Ommiyad Kaliph in Spain, and the Abbaside Kaliph at Baghdad. The Fatimite Kaliph fixed his capital at Cyrene, or Kerwan as it was pronounced by the Arabs. The ancient city of Cyrene had been destroyed by the Moslems in their first invasion of Pentapolis (A.H. 46), and the Arab city, though called by the same name, was built at some little distance from the ruins of the ancient city, which probably served the Arabs as a quarry.

Having consolidated his power, the Fatimite Kaliph determined to conquer Egypt, always the richest prize of the Oriental world. In the year 913 (A.H. 300) he marched into that country at the head of 40,000 men, seized Alexandria, and laid siege to Fostat. He was, however, driven back from the interior with great loss, and, though he held possession of Alexandria for some time, he was ultimately forced to retire to his own country. The Christians suffered, as usual, and the great church of the Cæsareum in Alexandria was burnt down. Some years later the Fatimites made a second expedition into Egypt and contrived to make good their footing both in Alexandria and in the Fayoum.

In 921 Gabriel died and was succeeded by Cosmas III. The constant troubles and wars of the last century had broken off all communication between Egypt and her daughter Church of Abyssinia for nearly one hundred years. It seems probable that the functions of the Metropolitan of Abyssinia had been exercised by the kings of that country during this time. Abu Salih expressly tells us that they considered themselves invested with the supreme power in the Church as well as in the State, and that on solemn occasions they celebrated the Holy Communion. But during the reign of Cosmas in Egypt, an embassy arrived from Abyssinia requesting that a new Abuna or Archbishop might be sent them. The king, it seems, was old and in ill-health, his two sons were not of an age to govern, and the fittest guardian for them would be found in reviving the suspended archbishopric. Cosmas, in answer to this appeal, consecrated a man called Peter, who was received with great honour in Abyssinia, and on the death of the king was appointed regent of the kingdom, with charge of the two young princes. On his death-bed the king had solemnly charged Peter not to regard the accident of birth, but to crown as his successor that one of his two sons who should prove most fitted to govern the kingdom. As the youths grew to manhood the younger showed himself far superior to his brother, and Peter consequently caused him to be proclaimed king. The elder brother acquiesced in the decision and lived happily in private life, until a melancholy incident plunged the country into civil war. Two wandering monks, or begging friars as they would have been called later in the West, arrived in Abyssinia, and applied to the Abuna for money. Whether he had some foreknowledge of their character or no we cannot tell, as only the fact of his refusal is recorded. These two monks, therefore, Menas and Victor, concocted a plot to revenge themselves and make their fortunes.

Menas began by forging letters purporting to be from the Patriarch Cosmas, to the effect that he was grieved to hear that an impostor named Peter, professing to have been ordained by him and sent as Metropolitan to Abyssinia, had succeeded in deceiving the late Emperor and establishing himself in that office. The letter went on to say that the said Peter was neither ordained by, nor in communion with, him; that Menas, the bearer of the epistle, was the true Archbishop sent by him, and all good sons of the Church were exhorted to expel both intruders, the impostor Peter and the new Emperor whom, contrary to every principle of justice, Peter had raised up in opposition to his elder brother, the rightful heir.

This letter Menas delivered to the elder prince, who was not slow to accept the excuse for asserting his own claims at the expense of a civil war. In a battle between the two brothers the younger was taken prisoner and kept in close confinement. Menas was proclaimed Abuna or Archbishop, and Peter was driven into exile. Victor, who up to this time appears to have acquiesced in the crimes of his companion Menas, found himself in danger, but managed to escape from the country, and, returning to Egypt, laid the whole matter before the Patriarch Cosmas.

Cosmas at once pronounced sentence of excommunication against Menas, and the new Emperor made his peace with the Patriarch by putting the impostor to death. He gave orders for the recall of Peter, but the latter had already perished in exile, and a disciple of his who had accompanied him was summoned to Axum in his stead. Instead of sending to Cosmas for a new Archbishop the Emperor announced to the late Peter's chaplain that he was elected Abuna of Abyssinia, and requested him at once to take over the duties of his office. The man, whose name is not given, entreated permission to go to Egypt to obtain confirmation and consecration from Cosmas; but this the Emperor absolutely refused to allow. The unfortunate Abuna seems to have been kept as a sort of state prisoner, allowed to exercise all the functions of the office to which he had been thus arbitrarily appointed, but compelled to acknowledge no superior except the new Emperor, who perhaps feared that Cosmas, before consecrating the Abuna, would insist on the kingdom being given up to his younger brother. This state of things continued for about seventy years in Abyssinia, during which we do not find that any Metropolitan was sent them by the Mother Church of Alexandria. Cosmas died in 933 (A.H. 321), and was succeeded by a man named Macarius, who does not seem to have been a monk. He was living at Alexandria up to the time of his election; but forsook that city as soon as he became Patriarch, and would never live there again. He was devoted to his mother, and is said to have been most carefully trained and educated by her. She was still alive at his accession, and, thinking to give her pleasure, he made a visit in some state to his native village, accompanied by several of his suffragan bishops, to greet her.

On his arrival, however, his mother burst into tears, declaring that she would rather have seen him in his grave than thus appavelled and surrounded, for in his former state he would be required to answer only for his own sins; as Patriarch, he must answer for all the errors of his people.

In 935 (A.H. 323), on the accession of a new Abbaside Kaliph at Baghdad, the Emir of Egypt, a man named Ahmed ebn Kylag, was, as generally happened, deposed to make room for the new Kaliph's nominee—Abu Bekr Mohammed, commonly called El Ikshid. Ahmed ebn Kylag fiercely resented his recall, and went to the Fatimite Kaliph at Baghdad, whom he urged to invade Egypt. Nothing loth, the latter lost no time in doing so; again Egypt was overrun, Alexandria was seized, and a great part of Said was held by the Fatimites. Abu Bekr, however, though taken by surprise, successfully repelled the intruders, though he was never able to dislodge them from Alexandria. He would, however, no longer consent to pay allegiance to the helpless Kaliph of Baghdad, and in the year 936 (A.H. 324) he declared himself the independent Sultan of Egypt. His reign, which lasted till 946, was a perpetual succession of campaigns against other Moslem adventurers for the possession of Syria and Asia Minor; and the hapless Christians of Egypt were heavily taxed on various pretexts to obtain money for these expeditions. El Ikshid was also an indefatigable treasure-hunter among the ancient tombs of Egypt; for the fortune of Ahmed ebn Touloun in this respect fired the emulation of most of his successors. Masoudi says of him that he dug deeply all over the country for treasure among the tombs. In one place he found several tombs together, which were vast halls magnificently painted, and in them statues of old men and young men, of women and children, of marvellous workmanship ; their eyes were of precious stones, and their faces of gold or silver.

Revised: /

Two celebrated writers lived in Egypt during the reign of El Ikshid—Masoudi the Moslem historian, and Eutychius the Christian annalist. The latter was also a learned doctor of medicine, a science the knowledge and practice of which was still almost confined to Christians or Jews, but pre-eminently to Egyptian Christians. The father of Eutychius was named Patrick, and his son's real name was Said or Seith, but he preferred to be known by the Greek Eutychius, which has the same signification of blessed, or fortunate. He wrote other books besides his 'Annals of Alexandrian History,' one a medical work, and another on gems. He was born in Cairo in the year 876 ; and in the year 933 (A.M. 549 and A.H. 321) he was elected to succeed Abd-el-Messiah as Patriarch of the Greek (or Melkite) Church in Egypt, being the first man of any distinction who had occupied that post since the Arab conquest. He only held the office seven years and a half, during which time both the Churches suffered much at the hands of the Moslems. In particular the city of Tanis, for some reason not given, appears to have incurred the enmity of El Ikshid. Twice within a recent period the Moslems had pulled down the Melkite church there, but both times the Christians succeeded in rebuilding it. Not long afterwards El Ikshid sent one of his officers and a company of soldiers to Tanis, with orders to close the Melkite churches and bring to him all the gold and silver vessels to be found in them. The Bishop of Tanis, by great exertions and the sale of some of the property belonging to his Church, raised 5,000 dinars, with which he bribed the Sultan to desist from his purpose. After the death of Eutychius the Greek Church in Egypt sank into complete insignificance. For the next 500 years, though the names of her Patriarchs are preserved, little else is known of them, and even the dates given for their accession are hopelessly contradictory.

The town of Mansoura, now one of the most important in the Delta, was founded during the reign of El Ikshid, but before it was finished the Sultan died, leaving no heir but an infant, whom he entrusted to the guardianship of a freed slave. This man, who is known as Kafur, was a Soudani of great ability and high character. He brought the young prince Abu-el-Kasim from Damascus, where his father had died, to Egypt, and at once began the much needed work of organisation and reform. But he was speedily recalled to fight for the possession of Damascus and Syria with Seyf-el-Doulah, El Ikshid's old enemy; notwithstanding the fact that a solemn peace had been made before the death of the latter, and his daughter given in marriage to Seyf-el-Doulah. Kafur suppressed the rebellion in Syria, but hardly had he returned again to Egypt when war broke out in the south. Immediately after the death of El Ikshid the King of Nubia had seized the Great Oasis and taken away a number of prisoners, and the Nubians were a standing menace to the Moslem power in Egypt all through the regency and reign of Kafur.

In 953 Macarius died, and was succeeded by a man called Theophanius, who was already old. The annual tribute of 1,000 pieces of gold which the unfortunate Michael III. had bound himself and his successors to pay for ever to the Church and Chapter of Alexandria, weighed more and more heavily on the Egyptian Patriarchate.

The majority of the Egyptian population had been Moslem since the failure of the last rebellion in 832 (A.H. 216) and the terrible reprisals which had followed it; and the Christian minority was yearly becoming smaller. Upon them, however, fell by far the larger share of the Government exactions, even when no actual persecution was going on; and the additional tax which was necessary to furnish the annual subsidy to the Alexandrian Church was felt as a grievous addition to their burdens. The Alexandrian Church had by this time received back tenfold their original loan to the Patriarch Michael, and Theophanius, observing that this exaction, more than any other, was felt by the members of the Church and caused many of the lukewarm to fall away from Christianity, determined on making an appeal in person to the Chapter of Alexandria. Alexandria was already in the possession of the Fatimite Arabs, and there was probably some risk in the expedition of Theophanius, but he reached Alexandria in safety and called a general meeting of the Alexandrian clergy, to whom he set forth his case, and entreated them either to cancel the bond and remit this tribute, or at least, if this were too great a sacrifice, to lower the yearly sum. The Alexandrian Church has always occupied a unique position in the Church of Egypt, and though nominally under the Patriarch, the College or Chapter lost no opportunity of asserting their dignity and insisting on their special rights and privileges. In the present case their behaviour was a disgrace to the religion they professed. They insolently refused even to consider the proposals of the Patriarch, and stood by the letter of their bond.

Theophanius, already the victim of unsuspected brain disease, rebuked their greed and disloyalty in no measured terms. A painful scene ensued, and some of the Alexandrian clergy were insolent enough to say to their Patriarch that he had no right to take upon himself to rebuke those who were his equals in all except the Patriarchal vestments, which he owed to no merit of his own, but to the votes of those who had elected him.

In his passion Theophanius tore the Patriarchal robes from his shoulders and flung them at the feet of the Alexandrians. The shock was too much for his reason, and in the same moment he was seized with raving madness. The Alexandrians fell back in horror and affright, his clergy tried to restrain him, but for his own safety it became necessary to bind him. A synod of bishops was hastily convened in Alexandria to determine what could be done in this emergency. It was agreed to take him for medical treatment to Babylon by water as the safest and easiest route. A ship was chartered and the unfortunate Patriarch was conveyed on board in chains, accompanied by several of his clergy and one or two bishops. It was hoped that the quiet of the voyage would soothe him, but storms came on and the Patriarch grew worse and worse. Then, as so often happens, his malady took a different form, compelling him to utter the most terrible blasphemies against all that was most sacred to him. And when he began to revile and deny Christ his escort could bear it no longer. To them he was evidently possessed of devils, and lest his terrible ravings should be overheard, they thrust him down into the hold. Evening drew on, and the clergy, sitting sadly about the vessel, heard the ravings grow more and more furious. In the silence of the night his words were heard all over the ship, and the bishops could bear it no longer. One of them descended alone into the hold where the madman was confined. What passed between them was never accurately known ; probably Theophanius in his madness tried to murder the bishop, who never seems to have been called to account for his deed ; but whether in self-defence or in some attempt to exorcise the devil, the bishop killed the Patriarch that night. So strong was the feeling of horror which the blasphemies of the poor madman had excited, that they did not dare even to give him Christian burial, but his dead body was thrown overboard like a dog's.

He had occupied the Patriarchal throne barely three years ; and several months, some say two or three years, elapsed before a successor was chosen. One aged monk was elected, but refused to undertake so great a responsibility, and recommended a man named Mena, who, however, was objected to by the more rigid observers of canon rule on the ground that, though he was now a widower, he had been married. It was not difficult to persuade them that Mena, in this respect, was on the same level as Demetrius (in the second century), and he was eventually consecrated Patriarch as Mena II.

During the eleven years of his Patriarchate, the state of things in Egypt went from bad to worse. One son of El Ikshid died and was succeeded by another, but the real power was in the hands of Kafur, whose strong personality alone retarded the collapse of the short-lived dynasty of El Ikshid. The Turkish and Arab elements bitterly resented his dominion, both Moslem and Christian were in a state of disaffection throughout the country. The Christians looked towards Nubia, the Moslems to Kerwan, where a new Kaliph of much greater ability, and bearing the variously spelt name of Moez, Muaz, and Muazzi, besides several others, had recently succeeded to the throne. He, or rather a Greek whom he had bought as a slave, and whose intelligence, courage, and probity had won for him in course of time freedom and the supreme command of all the military forces of Moez, had pushed his conquests far and wide, till now the whole of Northern Africa, excepting Egypt, acknowledged his dominion. In Egypt his subjects occupied Alexandria, part of the Fayoum and part of Said, and Moez intended from the first to make himself master of the whole of Egypt. The known ability of Kafur, however, and the entreaties of the mother of Moez, who had been well received and loaded with presents by the politic Kafur when she passed through Fostat on her way to Mecca, induced Moez to postpone his invasion for a time. He continued his preparation, however, and in particular caused wells to be dug at camping intervals all along the desert route between Kerwan and Egypt.

In 956 (A.H. 344-5) the King of Nubia again invaded Egypt proper, and seized Assouan, which was pillaged by his soldiers. Kafur, however, no longer hampered by a war in Syria, sent at once to check the further advance of the Christian king. One division was sent up the Nile, another was sent speedily and secretly by the Red Sea with orders to cut off the retreat of the Nubians from behind. This plan succeeded so well that though the main body of the Nubian army fought their way back to their own country, they did so with great loss, and were compelled to abandon to the Moslems their own fortress of Deyr Ibrim,¹ about fifty leagues south of Assouan. The general of Kafur brought back to Fostat 150 prisoners and 'many heads.' Again in 967 (A.H. 357) the Nubians invaded Egypt, recovered all they had lost, and overran the country as far as Akmim.

¹ Till recent years—perhaps to this day, though I have been unable to obtain exact information—there existed a church at Deyr Ibrim, dating from the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century. Deyr Ibrim is now a postal station for steamers on the Nile.

In 963 (A.H. 352) Egypt was afflicted with a terrible famine which lasted for seven, or as some say for nine, years. The Nile scarcely rose, and subsided quickly, year by year; a plague of rats destroyed the scanty crops which had withstood the drought; and a terrible pestilence, as usual, followed in the wake of famine. Many Egyptians fled the country, and those who remained were reduced to the most abject poverty. The Moslem historians record that 600,000 persons perished in Fostat and the neighbouring towns of Babylon and Masr alone, 'not counting the corpses which were thrown into the river.' The Christians relate that several episcopal sees remained vacant or ceased to exist, because all the Christians in the villages and towns of their dioceses were dead. Mena took refuge on the country estate of a wealthy lady of his communion whose name was Dinah, and who lived at Mohalleh-Daniel, in Lower Egypt. In this village he remained all through the invasion of the Fatimites and change of suzerainty from the Black Kaliphs to the White.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME

Spottiswoode & Co. Printers, New-street Square, London.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LETTERS OF ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

Edited, with Biographical Additions, by FREDERIC G. KENYON. In 2 vols. With Portraits. Crown 8vo. 15s. net.

DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE. By the Rev. W. H. FITCHETT, With 11 Plans and 16 Portraits. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT: being an Outline of the History of the Egyptians under their successive Masters from the Roman Conquest until now. By E. L. BUTCHER, Author of 'A Strange Journey,' 'A Black Jewel,' &c. In 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s.

THE LIFE OF SIR JOHN HAWLEY GLOVER, R.N., G.C.M.G. By Lady GLOVER. Edited by the Right Hon. Sir RICHARD TEMPLE, Bart., G.C.S.I., D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S. With Portrait and Maps. Demy 8vo. 14s.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ARTHUR YOUNG. With Selections from his Correspondence. Edited by M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. With 2 Portraits and 2 Views. Large crown 8vo. 12s. 6d.

THE WAR OF GREEK INDEPENDENCE, 1821-1835. By W. ALISON PHILLIPS, M.A., late Scholar of Merton College, Senior Scholar of St. John's College, Oxford. With Map. Large crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

TWELVE YEARS IN A MONASTERY. By JOSEPH McCABE, late FATHER ANTONY, O.S.F. Large crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

STUDIES IN BOARD SCHOOLS. By CHARLES MORLEY. Crown 8vo. 6s.

FRANCE UNDER LOUIS XV. By JAMES BRECK PERKINS, Author of 'France Under the Regency.' In 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s.

A BROWNING COURTSHIP; and other Stories. By ELIZA ORNE WHITE, Author of 'The Coming of Theodora' &c. Small post 8vo. 5s.

THE POEMS OF ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. New Edition. Complete in 1 volume. With Portrait and Facsimile of the MS. of a 'Sonnet from the Portuguese.' Large crown 8vo. bound in cloth, with gilt top, 7s. 6d.

. This Edition is uniform with the Two-volume Edition of Robert Browning's Complete Works.

THE GREY LADY. By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN, Author of 'The Sowers,' 'With Edged Tools,' 'In Kedar's Tents,' &c. With 12 Full-page Illustrations by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Crown 8vo. 6s.

MARCELLA. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. Cheap Popular Edition. Crown 8vo. bound in limp cloth, 2s. 6d.

FRIENDSHIP'S GARLAND. By MATTHEW ARNOLD. Second Edition. Small crown 8vo. bound in white cloth, 4s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS.

IN KEDAR'S TENTS. By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN, Author of 'The Sowers,' 'With Edged Tools,' &c. FOURTH EDITION. Crown 8vo. 6s.

ONE OF THE BROKEN BRIGADE. By CLIVE PHILLIPPS-WOLLEY, Author of 'Snap,' 'Gold, Gold in Cariboo,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

JAN: an Afrikaner. By ANNA HOWARTH. Crown 8vo. 6s.

DEBORAH OF TOD'S. By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of 'A Toy Tragedy,' 'The Little Squire,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE MILLS OF GOD. By FRANCIS H. HARDY. Crown 8vo. 6s.

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 Waterloo Place.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

BY LORD ARMSTRONG, C.B., F.R.S., LL.D.

With Autotype Plates. Imperial 4to. £1. 10s. net.

ELECTRIC MOVEMENT IN AIR AND WATER. With Theoretical Inferences. By LORD ARMSTRONG, C.B., F.R.S., LL.D., &c.

'One of the most remarkable contributions to physical and electrical knowledge that have been made in recent years. . . The illustrations are produced in a superb manner, entirely worthy of so remarkable a monograph.'—TIMES.

GABRIELE VON BULOW, Daughter of Wilhelm von Humboldt. A Memoir Compiled from the Family Papers of Wilhelm von Humboldt and his Children, 1791-1887. Translated by CLARA NORDLINGER. With Portraits and Preface by Sir EDWARD B. MALET, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., &c. Demy 8vo. 16s.

'Miss Nordlinger's excellent translation gives English readers an opportunity of becoming acquainted with a very charming personality, and of following the events of a life which was bound up with many interesting incidents and phases of English history.'—TIMES.

ISABELLA THE CATHOLIC, QUEEN OF SPAIN: her Life, Reign, and Times, 1451-1504. By M. LE BARON DE NERVO. Translated from the Original French by Lieut.-Colonel TEMPLE-WEST (Retired). With Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

'Neither too long nor too short, not overladen with detail nor impoverished from lack of matter, and is at the same time ample and orderly enough to satisfy the ordinary student.'—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

POT-POURRI FROM A SURREY GARDEN. By Mrs. C. W. EARLE. With an Appendix by Lady CONSTANCE LYTTON. Seventh Edition. Crown 8vo.

'Intelligent readers of almost any age, especially if they are concerned in the management of a country household, will find these pages throughout both suggestive and amusing.'—TIMES.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF 'THE RENAISSANCE IN ITALY.'

In 7 Volumes, large crown 8vo. with 2 Portraits.

THE RENAISSANCE IN ITALY. By JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. THE AGE OF THE DESPOTS. With a Portrait. Price 7s. 6d. Ready. | 4 & 5. ITALIAN LITERATURE. 2 Vols. Price 15s. [In November. |
| 2. THE REVIVAL OF LEARNING. Price 7s. 6d. [Ready. | 6 & 7. THE CATHOLIC REACTION. With a Portrait and an Index to the 7 Vols. Price 15s. [In December. |
| 2. THE FINE ARTS. Price 7s. 6d. [Ready. | |

THACKERAY'S HAUNTS AND HOMES. By EYRE CROWE, A.R.A. With Illustrations from Sketches by the Author. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

NOTE.—The Edition of the Work for sale in this country is limited to 260 copies.

THE ANNALS OF RURAL BENGAL. From Official Records and the Archives of Native Families. By Sir W. W. HUNTER, K.S.C.I., C.I.E., LL.D., &c. New, Revised, and Cheaper Edition (the Seventh). Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

'One of the most important as well as most interesting works which the records of Indian literature can show.'—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

FROM GRAVE TO GAY: being Essays and Studies concerned with Certain Subjects of Serious Interest, with the Puritans, with Literature, and with the Humours of Life, now for the first time collected and arranged. By J. St. LOX STRACHEY. Crown 8vo. 6s.

'Undeniably clever, well-informed, brightly written, and in many ways interesting.'—TIMES.

COLLECTED CONTRIBUTIONS ON DIGESTION AND DIET.

With an Appendix on the Opium Habit in India. By Sir WILLIAM ROBERTS, M.D., F.R.S. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 Waterloo Place.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S RECENT BOOKS.

HISTORY IN FACT AND FICTION. By the Hon. A. S. G. CANNING, Author of 'Lord Macaulay: Essayist and Historian,' 'The Philosophy of Charles Dickens,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

An intensely interesting book. . . . I do not think that I ever saw the difficulties of the Eastern question in so clear a light as I did after reading the short chapter which Mr. Canning devotes to it.—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

THROUGH LONDON SPECTACLES. By CONSTANCE MILMAN. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

'Altogether a very pleasant and companionable little book.'—SPECTATOR.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE LIFE AND WORKS OF DR. ROBERT WATT, Author of the 'Bibliotheca Britannica.' By JAMES FINLAYSON, M.D., Physician to the Glasgow Western Infirmary and the Royal Hospital for Sick Children; Hon. Librarian to the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, Glasgow, &c. With a Portrait. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SIR CHARLES HALLÉ'S LIFE AND LETTERS. Being an Autobiography (1819-60), with Correspondence and Diaries. Edited by his Son, C. E. HALLÉ, and his Daughter, MARIE HALLÉ. With 2 Portraits. Demy 8vo. 16s.

'The volume is one of the most interesting of recent contributions to the literature of music. . . . A strong sense of humour is manifest in the autobiography as well as in the letters, and there are some capital stories scattered up and down the volume.'—TIMES.

THE MEMOIRS OF BARON THIÉBAULT (late Lieutenant-General in the French Army). With Recollections of the Republic, the Consulate, and the Empire. Translated and Condensed by A. J. BUTLER, M.A., Translator of the 'Memoirs of Marbot.' 2 vols. With 2 Portraits and 2 Maps. Demy 8vo. 28s.

'Mr. Butler's work has been admirably done. . . . These Memoirs abound in varied interest, and, moreover, they have no little literary merit. . . . For solid history, bright sketches of rough campaigning, shrewd studies of character, and lively anecdote, these Memoirs yield in no degree to others.'—TIMES.

PREHISTORIC MAN AND BEAST. By the Rev. H. N. HUTCHINSON, Author of 'Extinct Monsters,' 'Creatures of Other Days,' &c. With a Preface by Sir HENRY HOWORTH, M.P., F.R.S., and 10 Full-page Illustrations. Small demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

'A striking picture of living men and conditions as they once existed. . . . It combines graphic description with scientific accuracy, and is an admirable example of what a judicious use of the imagination can achieve upon a basis of established facts.'

KNOWLEDGE.

A YEAR IN THE FIELDS. Selections from the Writings of JOHN BURROUGHS. With Illustrations from photographs by Clifton Johnson. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

'The book is an excellent example of its kind, pleasant, chatty, and readable. . . . Fresh and graphic, instinct with country sights, scents, and sounds.'—LAND AND WATER.

'The book is pleasant reading, and Mr. Burroughs is a true lover of Nature.'

ATHENÆUM.

THE MONEY-SPINNER, and other Character Notes. By H. SETON MERRIMAN, Author of 'The Sowers,' 'With Edged Tools,' &c., and S. G. TALLENTYRE. With 12 Full-page Illustrations by Arthur Rackham. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

'We have many bad books, and many goody-goody books, but few good books; this is one of them.'—Mr. JAMES PAYN, in the Illustrated London News.

SELECTED POEMS OF WALTER VON DER VOGELWEIDE THE MINNESINGER. Done into English Verse by W. ALISON PHILLIPS, M.A., late Scholar of Merton College, and Senior Scholar of St. John's College, Oxford. With 6 Full-page Illustrations. Small 4to. 10s. 6d. net.

'There is in the outpourings of the famous Minnesinger a freshness and a spontaneity that exercise an irresistible charm. . . . Mr. Phillips deserves thanks from all lovers of poetry for bringing him before the world again in so acceptable a form.'—TIMES.

A HISTORY OF THE HEBREW PEOPLE FROM THE DIVISION OF THE KINGDOM TO THE FALL OF JERUSALEM IN 566 B.C. By CHARLES FOSTER KENT, Ph.D., Associate-Professor of Biblical Literature and History, Brown University. With Maps and Chart. Crown 8vo. 6s.

•• This Second Volume completes the Work.

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 Waterloo Place.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

MY CONFIDENCES: an Autobiographical Sketch addressed to my Descendants. By FREDERICK LOCKER-LAMPSON. Edited by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, Q.C., M.P. Second Edition. With Two Portraits. 8vo. 15s.

THE LABOUR PROBLEM. By GEOFFREY DRAGE, M.P. Demy 8vo. 14s.

THE MAMELUKE OR SLAVE DYNASTY OF EGYPT, 1260-1517 A.D. By Sir WILLIAM MUIR, K.S.C.I., LL.D., D.C.L., Ph.D. (Bologna), Author of 'The Life of Mahomet,' 'Mahomet and Islam,' 'The Caliphate,' &c. With 12 Full-page Illustrations and a Map. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

COSMIC ETHICS; or, the Mathematical Theory of Evolution: showing the full import of the DOCTRINE of the MEAN, and containing the PRINCIPIA of the SCIENCE of PROPORTION. By W. CAVE THOMAS, F.S.S. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

THE SPAS AND MINERAL WATERS OF EUROPE. With Notes on Balneotherapeutic Management in various Diseases and Morbid Conditions. By HERMANN WEBER M.D., F.R.C.P., Consulting Physician to the German Hospital and to the Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor, &c.; and FREDERICK PARKES WEBER, M.D., M.R.C.P., Physician to the German Hospital. Crown 8vo. 6s.

* * The purpose of this book is to give a description of European Mineral Waters and Spas, and to indicate the complaints for which the Waters are likely to prove beneficial.

THE BROWINGS FOR THE YOUNG. Edited by FREDERIC G. KENYON, late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Small fcp. 8vo. cloth, 1s.; or with gilt edges, 1s. 4d.

THE APOSTOLIC GOSPEL. With a Critical Reconstruction of the Text. By J. FULTON BLAIR, B.D. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

RENAISSANCE FANCIES AND STUDIES: being a Sequel to 'Euphorion.' By VERNON LEE, Author of 'Euphorion, Antique and Mediæval in Renaissance' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE RENAISSANCE IN ITALY. Taken from the work of JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS. By Lieut.-Col. ALFRED PEARSON. With a Steel Engraving of a recent Portrait of Mr. Symonds. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

HYPNOTISM, MESMERISM, AND THE NEW WITCHCRAFT. By ERNEST HART, formerly Surgeon to the West London Hospital, and Ophthalmic Surgeon to St. Mary's Hospital. Second Edition, Enlarged, with Chapters on 'The Eternal Gullible,' and Note on 'The Hypnotism of Trilby.' Crown 8vo. 5s.

JOHANNESBURG IN ARMS, 1895-6. Being the Observations of a Casual Spectator. By CHARLES G. THOMAS. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

OFF THE MILL. By the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, D.C.L., Bishop of Stepney. With 2 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

FIFTY YEARS; or, Dead Leaves and Living Seeds. By the Rev. HARRY JONES, Prebendary of St. Paul's, Author of 'Holiday Papers,' 'East and West London,' &c. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A MILITARY LIFE. By General Sir JOHN ADYE, G.C.B., R.A., late Governor of Gibraltar. With Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo. 14s. net.

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 Waterloo Place.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

- ENGLISH PROSE: its Elements, History, and Usage. By JOHN EARLE, M.A., Rector of Swanswick, formerly Fellow and Tutor of Oriel College, Professor of Anglo-Saxon in the University of Oxford. 8vo. 16s.
- THE HISTORIC NOTE-BOOK; with an Appendix of Battles. By the Rev. E. COBHAM BREWER, LL.D., Author of 'The Dictionary of Phrase and Fable,' 'The Reader's Handbook,' &c. Crown 8vo. over 1,000 pp., 7s. 6d.
- GEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE VOLCANIC ISLANDS AND PARTS OF SOUTH AMERICA, visited during the Voyage of H.M.S. 'Beagle.' By CHARLES DARWIN, M.A., F.R.S. Third Edition. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- THE STRUCTURE AND DISTRIBUTION OF CORAL REEFS. By CHARLES DARWIN, M.A., F.R.S., F.G.S. With an Introduction by Professor T. G. BONNEY, D.Sc., F.R.S., F.G.S. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- HAYTI; or, the Black Republic. By Sir SPENSER ST. JOHN, G.C.M.G., formerly Her Majesty's Minister Resident and Consul-General in Hayti, now Her Majesty's Special Envoy to Mexico. Second Edition, revised. With a Map. Large crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA: a Survey of Fifty Years of Progress. Edited by T. HUMPHRY WARD. 2 vols. 8vo. 32s.
- A COLLECTION OF LETTERS OF W. M. THACKERAY, 1847-1855. With Portraits and Reproductions of Letters and Drawings. Second Edition. Imperial 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- A JOURNAL KEPT BY DICK DOYLE IN THE YEAR 1840. Illustrated by several hundred Sketches by the Author. With an Introduction by J. HUNGERFORD POLLEN, and a Portrait. Second Edition. Demy 4to. 21s.
- THE INGENIOUS GENTLEMAN, DON QUIXOTE OF LA MANCHA. By MIGUEL DE CERVANTES SAAVEDRA. A Translation, with Introduction and Notes, by JOHN ORMSBY, Translator of 'The Poem of the Cid.' Complete in 4 vols. 8vo. £2. 10s.
- SHAKESPEARE. Certain Selected Plays Abridged for the Use of the Young. By SAMUEL BRANDRAM, M.A. Oxon. Fourth and Cheaper Edition. Large crown 8vo. 5s.
- * * * Also the 9 Plays separately, crown 8vo. neatly bound in cloth limp, price 6d. each.
- SHAKESPEARE COMMENTARIES. By Dr. G. G. GERVINUS, Professor at Heidelberg. Translated, under the Author's superintendence, by F. E. BUNNETT. With a Preface by F. J. FURNIVALL. Fifth Edition. 8vo. 14s.
- THE STORY OF GOETHE'S LIFE. By GEORGE HENRY LEWES. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- THE LIFE OF GOETHE. By GEORGE HENRY LEWES. Fourth Edition, Revised according to the latest Documents, with Portrait. 8vo. 16s.
- UNDERGROUND RUSSIA. Revolutionary Profiles and Sketches from Life. By STEPNIAK, formerly Editor of 'Zemlia i Volia' (Land and Liberty) With a Preface by PETER LAVROFF. Translated from the Italian. New Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- SEA AND LAND: Features of Coasts and Oceans, with special reference to the Life of Man. By N. S. SHALER, Dean of the Lawrence Scientific School of Harvard University. With Illustrations. Royal 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
- By the same Author.*
- ASPECTS OF THE EARTH: a Popular Account of some Familiar Geological Phenomena. With 100 Illustrations. Royal 8vo. 16s.
- DOMESTICATED ANIMALS: their Relation to Man and to his Advancement in Civilisation. With Illustrations. Royal 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
- NATURE AND MAN IN AMERICA. Crown 8vo. 6s.

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 Waterloo Place.

W. M. THACKERAY'S WORKS.

THE ÉDITION DE LUXE. Twenty-six Volumes, imperial 8vo. Containing 248 Steel Engravings, 1,620 Wood Engravings, and 88 Coloured Illustrations. The steel and wood engravings are all printed on real China paper. The NUMBER of COPIES PRINTED is LIMITED to ONE THOUSAND, each copy being numbered. The work can only be obtained through booksellers, who will furnish information regarding terms, &c.

THE STANDARD EDITION. Twenty-six Volumes, large 8vo. 10s. 6d. each. This Edition contains some of Mr. Thackeray's writings which had not been previously collected, with many additional illustrations. It has been printed from new type, on fine paper; and, with the exception of the Edition de Luxe, it is the largest and handsomest edition that has been published.

THE LIBRARY EDITION. Twenty-four Volumes, large crown 8vo. handsomely bound in cloth, price £9; or half-russia, marbled edges, £13. 13s. With Illustrations by the Author, RICHARD DOYLE, and FREDERICK WALKER.

••• The Volumes are sold separately, in cloth, price 7s. 6d. each.

THE POPULAR EDITION. Thirteen Volumes, crown 8vo with Frontispiece to each volume, scarlet cloth, gilt top, price £3. 5s.; or half-morocco, gilt, price £5. 10s.

••• The Volumes are sold separately, in green cloth, price 5s. each.

CHEAPER ILLUSTRATED EDITION. Twenty-six Volumes, crown 8vo. bound in cloth, price £4. 11s.; or handsomely bound in half-morocco, price £8. 8s. Containing nearly all the small Woodcut Illustrations of the former Editions and many new Illustrations by Eminent Artists.

THIS EDITION CONTAINS ALTOGETHER 1,773 ILLUSTRATIONS

By the AUTHOR; LUKE FILDES, A.R.A.; Lady BUTLER (Miss Elizabeth Thompson); GEORGE DU MAURIER; RICHARD DOYLE; FREDERICK WALKER, A.R.A.; GEORGE CRUIKSHANK; JOHN LEECH; FRANK DICKESS; LINDLEY SAMBOURNE; F. BARNARD; E. J. WHEELER; F. A. FRASER; CHARLES KEENE; R. B. WALLACE; J. P. ATKINSON; W. J. WEBB; T. R. MACQUOID; M. FITZGERALD; W. BALSTON; JOHN COLLIER; H. FURNISS; G. G. KILBURNE, &c., &c., &c.

••• The Volumes are sold separately, in cloth, price 3s. 6d. each.

THE POCKET EDITION. Twenty-seven Volumes. Bound in cloth, with gilt top, price 1s. 6d. each; or 1s. in paper cover.

••• The Volumes are also supplied as follows:

THE NOVELS. 13 volumes, in gold-lettered cloth case, 21s. | THE MISCELLANIES. 14 volumes, in gold-lettered cloth case, 21s.

W. M. THACKERAY'S LETTERS.

A COLLECTION OF LETTERS OF W. M. THACKERAY, 1847-1855. With Portraits and Reproductions of Letters and Drawings. Second Edition. Imperial 8vo. 12s. 6d.

BALLADS. By WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY. With Portrait of the Author, and 56 Illustrations by the Author; Lady BUTLER (Miss Elizabeth Thompson); GEORGE DU MAURIER; JOHN COLLIER; H. FURNISS; G. G. KILBURNE; M. FITZGERALD; and J. P. ATKINSON. Printed on toned paper by Clay, Sons, & Taylor; and elegantly bound in cloth, gilt edges, Burn. Small 4to. 16s.

W. M. THACKERAY'S SKETCHES.

THE ORPHAN OF PIMLICO, and other Sketches, Fra-ments, and Drawings. By WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY Copied in process that gives a faithful reproduction of the originals. With a Preface and Editorial Notes by Miss Thackeray. A New Edition, in a new style binding, bevelled boards, gilt edges, royal 4to. price One Guinea.

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 Waterloo Place.

THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

VOLUME II.

DT94
B983
v. 2

186125

YRABU NIVON 88

CONTENTS

OF

THE SECOND VOLUME

PART II. (continued)

CHAPTER	PAGE
XIII. THE CONQUEST OF EGYPT BY THE FATIMITES	1
XIV. THE BUILDING OF CAIRO	8
XV. THE PERSECUTION OF EL HAKIM	20
XVI. SHENOUDA AND CHRISTODULOS	34
XVII. BEDR EL JAMAL, THE ARMENIAN	47
XVIII. EFFECTS IN EGYPT OF THE FIRST CRUSADE	69
XIX. THE SCHISM OF MARK EBN KUNBAR	82
XX. THE BURNING OF BABYLON	91
XXI. THE KURDISH CONQUEST	99
XXII. THE REIGN OF SALEH-ED-DIN.	103
XXIII. DISSENSIONS OF THE EGYPTIAN AND ABYSSINIAN CHURCHES	118
XXIV. THE CRUSADERS IN EGYPT.	127
XXV. AN INFAMOUS PATRIARCH	139
XXVI. ST. LOUIS IN EGYPT	152
XXVII. THE FATE OF A MOSLEM QUEEN	159
XXVIII. TWO INVASIONS OF THE SOUDAN	173

viii THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

CHAPTER	PAGE
XXIX. THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CHURCHES	183
XXX. THE LONGEST PERSECUTION	205
XXXI. THE CIRCASSIAN SLAVE-SULTANS	219
XXXII. THE OTTOMAN CONQUEST	228
XXXIII. FROM BAD TO WORSE	239
XXXIV. INFLUENCE OF THE REFORMATION IN EGYPT	249
XXXV. EGYPT IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY	258
XXXVI. M. DE MAILLET IN EGYPT	285
XXXVII. THE TYRANNY OF THE MAMELUKE BEYS	302
XXXVIII. ALI BEY	319
XXXIX. THE FRENCH INVASION.	336
XL. MOHAMMED ALI	358
XLI. THE ENGLISH OCCUPATION	378
XLII. THE CHURCH OF EGYPT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY	392
XLIII. SOCIAL LIFE AND CUSTOMS	412
INDEX	431

6

THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

PART II.—continued.

CHAPTER XIII

THE CONQUEST OF EGYPT BY THE FATIMITES

A.D. 964 IN 964-5 (A.H. 355) the second son of El Ikshid died, and A.M. 680 Kafur at once assumed the sovereignty in his own name.
A.H. 355 But within two years he died also, and Egypt, wasted with famine and pestilence, and with a child of eleven (grandson of El Ikshid) on the throne, presented an easy prey to the Fatimite Arabs.

Indeed, there was no attempt at resistance. The Greek general, who had of course been educated in the faith of Islam, and is known by the Arab name of Johar (also spelt Djauher), simply marched through the country and took possession of Fostat in 968-9 (A.H. 358). The Christians, as usual, looked with relief and hope on any change of masters. The Turks and Arabs, who had writhed under the yoke of a Soudani and a Jew (the most trusted instrument of Kafur), welcomed the general of the great Kaliph Moez with ready submission. There remained only the Nubian kingdom, which refused to acknowledge the new Moslem usurper; and Johar was not insensible to the dangers of an invasion from the south. He wrote a letter to George, King of Nubia, inviting him, with politely veiled hints of what might follow a refusal, to embrace the faith and resume the neglected payment of the slave tribute to the present master of Egypt. This letter he despatched by the hands of three ambassadors, the chief of whom was a man named Abdallah Ahmed ebn Solaim, who was a native of Assuan. This man afterwards wrote a history of Nubia, describing what he had seen upon this journey and all that he had been able to learn from others. His testimony to the state of the Christian kingdoms at this time is so important that certain extracts are here given, taken from the French translation of M. Quatremère.

After carefully describing the southern limits of the Moslem power he speaks of the province which reached from a fortress six miles south of Assuan to the second cataract. This, he says, was governed by the Viceroy of the King of Nubia, and in this province Moslems were allowed to settle and trade freely. He mentions that hardly any of these Moslems, who had long been settled among the Christians, could speak Arabic properly. He speaks of it as a well-watered, carefully cultivated country abounding in vineyards. In fact Nubia, though it had indirectly suffered much from the Arab conquest of Egypt and the enforced slave trade, evidently seemed to the Moslem ambassador a haven of peace and plenty after the ruined and famine-stricken Egypt, through which he had travelled. Beyond this province no one, Moslem or otherwise, was allowed to pass into the southern provinces without the express permission of the Viceroy. Any infringement of this rule was punished with instant death. But indeed the next stage of the journey, the ambassador pathetically complains, was a natural barrier of terrible rocks, far-reaching desert, and roads along which it was impossible for a man to ride. However, he says, it is from this district that the Nubians draw the precious stone with which they polish jewels. From the third cataract southward Ahmed ebn Solaim has nothing but praise for both the Christian kingdoms of Makorrah and Alouah. Almost all through his description he calls the King of Nubia the King of Makorrah, which was the name of the southern half of his kingdom. The capital of the kingdom, he informs us, is called Dongola,¹ and it is fifty days' journey from Assuan. The further he penetrated, the more the fertility and the safety of the country astonished him.

Within the space of less than two days' journey (he exclaims) we passed through nearly thirty towns with fine houses, churches, monasteries, numberless palm groves, vineyards, gardens, and wide-spreading fields, besides herds of camels of great beauty and breeding. From Dongola to the frontier of the kingdom of Alouah the distance is greater than from Dongola to Assuan (he evidently followed all the windings of the Nile); and through all this territory the towns, the villages, the flocks and herds, the fields of grain, the vineyards, and the palm groves are infinitely greater in number than in the province which borders on the Moslem territories.

He remarks that in this province, from Shenkir several roads lead to Suakim and Massowa and other places on the Red Sea. He was told, he says, that the Nile, which further south divides itself into two rivers, the White and Blue, came from great lakes in the country of the blacks; but he reserves his opinion about the great lakes. The division into two rivers he saw himself, for he explains that 'Souiah,' the capital of the kingdom of Alouah, was situated at the confluence of the two rivers. He speaks of this town, which has since been rebuilt and is known in modern times under the name of Khartoum, in the following terms:—

¹ This refers to old Dongola.

This town is adorned by magnificent buildings, great houses, churches enriched with gold, and gardens. It has one quarter in which live a great number of Moslems. The King of Alouah is more powerful and has more numerous armies than the King of Makorra; also the country is larger and more fertile. It does not, however, produce many palms or vines.

He alludes to the manufacture of beer and the cheapness of meat, besides the excellence of horses and camels. He mentions the fact that all the Christians belonged to the Jacobite (or National) Church of Egypt, and that their bishops, like the bishops of Abyssinia, were subordinate to the Patriarch of Egypt. Their books were written in Greek, but they translated them into their own language. He remarks that the authority of the King of Alouah is absolute. Whatever he orders, whether just or unjust, is obeyed. 'This king,' he adds, 'wears a crown of gold, for this metal is very abundant in his dominions.' The 'brownies' were apparently well known in the Soudan at that time, for he records a curious story told him about the sowing of the crops, which, he assures his readers, does not depend on the report of the country folk. 'All the Moslem merchants who trade in this country assured me that it was true.'

At the time of sowing (he says) they go into the fields, mark out the plot to be sown, throw a little of the seed in each corner, and pour the rest in a heap in the middle, by which they set a cup of beer. On the morrow they find the field sown and the beer drunk. In the same way at the harvest they cut a few blades, leave them with beer in the field, and on the morrow all the grain will be cut for them. But if by mistake in weeding the fields they root up some of the grain and leave it, on the morrow all the grain will be pulled up. The people say they are genii, and that some of the inhabitants of the country can make them do anything they choose.¹

Ahmed ebn Solaim relates that at the Court of Alouah he saw several men from far-distant countries who were neither Mohammedan nor Christian. Most of them, he said, believed in a God, but also in the sun, moon, and stars; some were fire-worshippers, and others adored a tree or even an animal.

One day (he says) at an audience of the king I saw a man whom I asked of his country. He told me that it was three months' journey from this place. I asked him of his religion, and he replied that there was but one God, who was equally mine, that of the king, and all created men.

Being further questioned, he said that God lived in heaven, and that when any misfortune threatened them in their country, such as pestilence or cattle disease, they went up solemnly into a mountain to pray, and their prayers were always heard. Ahmed ebn Solaim asked if they acknowledged no Prophet; and on his replying in the negative, spoke to him of the missions of Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed, and the wonders that they had worked. 'If what you say is true,' replied the old man, 'it deserves to be believed. For myself I would believe what they taught if I had seen the works which they did.'

¹ M. Quatremère finds nothing incredible in this story. He suggests that the supposed genii were probably monkeys.

Ahmed ebn Solaim says nothing of the way his proposals were received at the southern Court, and we may conclude that they met with no success. Nor did the embassy effect much at the Court of Dongola, though in both places they were received with the greatest politeness. The King of Nubia assembled all the bishops and wise men of his kingdom to meet the Moslem ambassadors, and permitted perfect freedom of discussion; but for himself, he read in the assembly the answer which he had already written to Johar, inviting him to become a Christian, and saying nothing about the slave tribute. He pointed out that his father and his ancestors had always faithfully observed their treaties with the Moslem conquerors of Egypt, and intimated that he was ready to consider the terms of a fresh alliance with the new invaders.

Whereupon Ahmed ebn Solaim made a long speech, which he afterwards wrote down, asking the King of Nubia whether he really supposed that he could stand against the power of Islam, and enumerating the great things that had been done by the Moslems since the coming of their Prophet. It is evident, however, that he could make no impression on the king, and that the report which he carried back to Johar convinced that general that he would do wisely not to attempt the conquest of the Soudan.

Ahmed ebn Solaim further relates that while he was at the Court of the King of Nubia the great day of sacrifice arrived. He called to him the Moslems of Dongola, to the number apparently of about sixty, and went out in solemn procession, with beat of drums and sound of trumpets, to keep the feast. The king's courtiers, he says, tried to persuade their king to forbid this public performance of Mohammedan rites in his country, but the king rebuked their intolerance. 'This man has, for good motives, left his country and his family,' he reminded them. 'This day is a solemn feast in his religion; if he wishes to celebrate it with as much pomp and ceremony as possible, I will not refuse him the satisfaction.'

This act of Christian courtesy is the last we hear of King George. The Moslem ambassador returned to his own country, and for the rest of the century the Christian kingdoms were left in peace.

CHAPTER XIV

THE BUILDING OF CAIRO

A.D. 971 FOR nearly a hundred years the Fatimite Kaliphs governed
 A.M. 687 Egypt in person, and at first, as usual, the unfortunate A.H. 361 inhabitants, especially the Christian minority, found relief in their change of masters. The Mohammedan Greek who ruled for three years in his master's name relieved the taxes, enforced public order and safety, and above all cleared out the long-neglected canals and gave the famine-stricken country a chance to recover itself. In 971 (A.H. 361) the Nile rose once more to its full height, and this was regarded by the Egyptians as a sign of God's favour towards the new dynasty.

There now existed on the east bank of the Nile three cities—distinct, yet almost touching one another. To the south lay Babylon, occupied almost entirely by those Egyptians who clung to the Christian faith and had no more dealings than they could help with the Moslem.
 Already they had made the old Roman fortress their peculiar stronghold, and built their cathedral on one of its bastions, whence it dominated and still dominates the whole town. Though the oldest, and in Moslem estimation the least important city, Babylon was still the only capital of Egypt known to the Western world.

Next came the Arab city of Fostat, built for his followers by the politic Amr; and north-east of that the Turkish city founded by Ahmed ebn Touloun, which was farther from the river and nearer to the Mokattam hills than the other two. This was more like a huge barrack, and was generally called Masr-el-Askar¹ ('of the Soldiers'), whereas the term Masr employed alone signified properly the country of Egypt, but was often loosely applied to designate the two Moslem cities together. In bidding farewell to his successful general the Kaliph Moez, turning to the sheikhs who were to accompany the expedition, had uttered the following prophecy:—

By God, if Johar were to march alone he would conquer Egypt. You shall enter Fostat in your ordinary clothes, you shall have no need to give battle to the inhabitants thereof, you shall inhabit the forsaken palace of the children of Touloun, but you shall found another city, surnamed El Kahirah ('the Victorious'), to which the whole world shall own submission.

Johar, having carried out the first part of this programme, lost no time in undertaking the second. The foundations of the new town—the nucleus of the present Cairo—were laid in 970 (A.H. 359), and the original walls were made to include Masr-el-Askar. The most solemn ceremonies were observed on the occasion, the materials were laid ready, the workmen ranged in their places, and then all waited in silence the signal of the astronomers, who watched the Star of Victory. At the precise moment the order was given, and with loud cries the men fell simultaneously to work. The building was carried on so rapidly that within two years the Kaliph was able to come and take possession. He did not come direct from Kirwan, but spent several months in Sicily and Sardinia, which were now part of his dominions; then returning to Tripoli he came to Alexandria, and in the year 972-3 (A.H. 362) he arrived in Cairo, bringing with him great treasure, the spoils of the various countries which he had conquered.

¹ It is this city, Masr-el-Askar, which was afterwards known to the Egyptians as Masr-el-Antika, or the Old Masr. The name of Old Cairo is absurdly inaccurate in itself, and totally misapplied by the street authorities and the dragomans of the present day to Fostat and Babylon.

A new mosque of course was to be built, superior in magnificence and sanctity to the great mosques of the older cities—Amr and Ebn Touloun. The Gama el Azhar, still the most important university of the Moslem world, was founded in the same year of the Kaliph's arrival. But the Kaliph Moez had not the religious scruples of his predecessor Ebn Touloun, and of the forest of clustering pillars in this far-famed mosque there is scarcely one that has not been taken from some Christian church. They are not however good specimens, and there are hardly any beautiful capitals amongst them.

Owing to the influence of Johar, this mosque was endowed far beyond any previous one with facilities for learning. It was provided with a valuable library, and professors of grammar, of literature, of 'theology,' jurisprudence, medicine, astronomy, mathematics, and history were endowed from its revenues. Pupils thronged from all the countries in the Saracen dominions, and through this medium much of the learning of the ancient Egyptians was spread abroad and, not unnaturally, attributed to the Arabs themselves by the Western world.

In the same year (975) the Kaliph and the Patriarch of Egypt died, and the former was succeeded by his son, who rejoiced in the names of Nasr ebn Moez Abu Mansur el Aziz il dyn Allah, but who may be briefly referred to as El Aziz. One of his wives was a Christian Egyptian of the Greek Church, who acquired great influence over him, even to the extent of ordering that by his mandate alone her two brothers Arsenius and Jeremiah should be received as Patriarchs by the Melkite Churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria. Under similar circumstances the National Church had chosen persecution rather than submission, but not even a protest is recorded from the Greek Church in consequence of this indignity.

On the death of the National Patriarch Mena II, the bishops and the Alexandrian clergy called a synod in the church of St. Sergius and St. Bacchus¹ at Babylon, to consider the appointment of his successor. A Syrian merchant of high character named Ephraim, who was also known to have influence with the Kaliph, happened to enter the church while their deliberations were still proceeding, and was at once unanimously greeted as the person marked out for the Patriarchate. He was a layman, and in the conditions of Eastern society it is not possible that he was unmarried, though he may have been a widower; but his character fully justified the instinctive choice of the bishops. He only governed the Church for three years, but during that time he abolished the practice of simony—as the reception of ordination and consecration fees has always been called among the Egyptians—and set himself earnestly to reform the morals of the Church, which had suffered greatly from association with the Moslems. Concubines seemed to have become almost as common among the nominal Christians as among the Mohammedans, particularly among those who held office under Government, and whom therefore it was more dangerous to offend. Ephraim, however, made no distinction of persons, and fell a martyr to his righteous zeal for reform. One of the most powerful officials at Court kept several concubines, and Ephraim, having remonstrated with him to no purpose, pronounced against him the solemn sentence of excommunication. Abu el Serur had not apparently believed that the Patriarch would proceed to extremities against him, and in his rage he added the sin of sacrilegious murder to that of adultery by causing the Patriarch to be poisoned.

¹ This is the church to which all the tourists are taken, with the tiny church of Sitte Miriam underneath it.

This Patriarch Ephraim¹ won so much upon the favour of the Moslem Kaliph during his short reign that El Aziz desired him to ask some favour and it should be granted. Ephraim asked for leave to resume the site and rebuild the church of St. Mercurius,² which in a former persecution had been ruined and seized by the Moslems; and the Kaliph at once commanded that the church should be given up. Abu Salih gives the following account of the restoration :—

When the Patriarch was about to begin to work upon this church, the common people of the Moslems attacked him. For the church had fallen into ruin, and nothing was left to mark it except the walls, which were also in a state of decay; and it had been turned into a storehouse for sugar canes. So the command was issued that it should be restored by the Patriarch, and that money should be allowed him from the treasury—as much as he should ask for. The Patriarch, however, took the decree, but returned the money with apologies, saying : ‘God, to Whom be praise, Who has shown his great power, is able to assist in the erection of houses for His worship, and has no need of this world’s money.’ And he begged Al Aziz to restore the money to its place and not to force him to accept it ; so the Kaliph consented to his request. And when the Patriarch was hindered, by those who attacked him, from restoring the church to its original state, and when they raised disturbances and showed their indignation at the matter, news was brought to the Prince of the Faithful, Al-‘Aziz-bi’lláh, that the common people would not allow the Patriarch to carry out the decree for the restoration of the church. Then Al-‘Aziz commanded that a body of his troops and his Mamelukes should go and stand by during the rebuilding of the fabric, and should repulse any who tried to hinder it, and punish them as they deserved for opposing ‘that we have decreed to them.’ When the people saw this, they refrained from their attacks. Thus the work was begun.

¹ In some lists of the Patriarchs this man is called Abraham instead of Ephraim. As far as I can make out, the two names appear to be the same in Coptic, and the nearest resemblance to the pronunciation would be Aphrahem.

² Abu Sefayn.

Later on, Abu Salih informs us that a very large sum of money was brought to the Patriarch Ephraim by a member of the Church as a thank-offering, and thus funds were supplied for the completion of the work. At this time lived the celebrated historian Severus, who was Bishop of Ashmounayn (Hermopolis Magna). Unfortunately hardly any of his voluminous writings have been printed ; and of his historical chronicle, which was continued after his death by Bishop Michael of Tanis and by later Coptic writers, only one entire copy, I believe, is known to exist, though much of it has been preserved in the Latin work of Renaudot. Severus was probably appointed to his bishopric during the brief Patriarchate of Ephraim, whose successor Philotheus, a monk of the monastery of St. Macarius, by no means bore the same high character.¹

It is, however, during the Patriarchate of Philotheus that more than one conversion is recorded of Moslems to Christianity, and the story of one of these converts is given at some length and on good authority by Neale:—

Among the councillors of the Kaliph was a Mohammedan of noble birth, who had taken great pains with the education of his son Vasah. This son had a special turn for theology, had committed the Koran to memory, and was a bitter opponent of the Christians. One day his attention was attracted by a crowd which accompanied a criminal to execution, and he inquired of what crime the prisoner had been convicted. Being told that it was a Mohammedan who had embraced Christianity, and who was in consequence condemned to be burnt alive as an apostate, he pushed through the crowd and loaded his former co-religionist with reproaches for his madness in forsaking the pure religion of his fathers and acknowledging three Gods. The martyr calmly replied that he did not worship three Gods, but one in three persons, and further prophesied that Vasah himself would one day see the truth, acknowledge it, and suffer for it. Vasah, enraged beyond control at this prediction, drew off his slipper and followed the man to his death, beating him over the head and loading him with insults. He remained to watch the execution, but the bearing of the martyr made such an impression upon him that he was unable to shake it off. In the hope of doing so, and at the same time strengthening his own convictions, he shortly afterwards went on a pilgrimage to Mecca ; but even on the way his dreams were thrice disturbed by the vision of an aged monk who called him, if he valued the salvation of his soul, to rise up and follow him. Vasah confided his dream to his companions, who assured him that such diabolical illusions must not be considered for a moment.

¹ Neale and Renaudot both talk of 'the crimes of Philotheus.' But on investigation we find that the worst charges his enemies could bring against him were that he was careless about church-going, fond of good dinners, and that he bathed twice a day.

The pilgrimage was accomplished, and Vasah was not far from Cairo, on his return home, when he got separated from his companions and lost his way. In this extremity, as evening drew on and he began to fear the wild beasts with which the deserts then abounded, a solitary horseman appeared and asked what he was doing alone in the desert. Vasah explained, and the horseman desired him to get up behind and he would take him to a place of safety. Vasah gladly availed himself of the offer, and the stranger took him to one of the Christian deyrs or strongholds between Fostat and Babylon, and left him for the night in a place which Vasah knew must be a Christian church.¹ At dawn of day the Sacristan came to prepare the church for morning prayer, and was alarmed to find a Mohammedan concealed in the building. At first he suspected him to be a thief; but when he heard the confused account which was all Vasah could give of himself, and observed that the treasures of the church were safe, he began to think the newcomer must be mad. Vasah asked the name of the church, and was told it was dedicated to St. Mercurius. The Sacristan readily showed the picture of the Saint, relating the story of his sufferings. Vasah either saw or fancied he saw a likeness between the picture and the horseman who had come to his rescue on the preceding evening, and at once intimated to the astonished Sacristan his intention of becoming a Christian. The Sacristan, unprepared for the emergency, urged Vasah to withdraw from the church before the service began, and conceal himself in a secret hiding-place for the time. He promised, however, to send the priest to him; and was as good as his word, though he feared greatly the evils it might bring upon the church of St. Mercurius, since it was evident that Vasah was a Mohammedan of rank.

¹ This church was the one just restored by Ephraim. It still exists, and is one of the most interesting to be seen near Cairo. It is now called by the Arabic nickname for St. Mercurius—Abu Sefayn.

Vasah was safely concealed in the Deyr until his baptism, the more easily that his friends and relations probably supposed him to have perished in the desert. After his baptism the priest who had received him into the church desired to send him to the convent of St. Macarius in Nitria for further instruction. Before he could depart, however, he was seen and recognised, in spite of his altered appearance, by some of his former friends, who told his father of their suspicion that he was not dead, but had become a Christian. Vasah's father at once caused search to be made, and Paul—as Vasah was called after his baptism—was arrested and taken to his home, where every effort was made to induce him to return to the Moslem religion. All their entreaties were in vain, however, and confinement without food for three days produced no results. In the end his relations, who loved him and besides dreaded the public disgrace that must fall upon them if they denounced him as an apostate, were induced to let him go. He retired at once into a monastery in Nitria, where he remained some time. But one of the monks having declared in his presence that the man who did not openly profess his faith in the same city where he had once been known as an unbeliever could not be acceptable to God, he returned to Cairo and made public acknowledgment there of his Christianity. He was at first left to his relations, who were bitterly angry at his conduct, and left no stone unturned to secure a recantation. He was thrown into a dungeon for six days, and then exposed to the endearments and entreaties of the young wife whom he had married before his conversion, but who, with his only child, had been kept from him since. As he still remained firm, his poor wife was subjected in his sight to the insults of his brother, and as a last resort his father brought into his presence Paul's child, who was yet an infant. Once more he called upon Paul to give up his faith, and on his refusal Paul's father slew Paul's son with his own hand in Paul's presence.

Eventually he was given up to the authorities as an apostate. But great influence was exerted in his favour; his own pleadings did much to move the Kaliph, whose favourite wife was a Christian; and finally he was cast out unhurt. He retired into Upper Egypt, and formed a close friendship with the learned Bishop of Ashmounayn, but did not remain there. He is said to have withdrawn himself to the most distant part of the Soudan, and built a church to the Archangel Michael on the borders of Abyssinia. Eventually, however, he returned to seek admission into priest's orders at the hands of the Patriarch Philotheus. The latter demanded the now usual ordination fee, which Paul, from religious scruples, absolutely refused to pay. The unseemly dispute was only ended by the liberality of a man who happened to be present at the audience, and who himself paid the fee for Paul. When the father of Vasah, or Paul, heard that his son had taken this further step his rage knew no bounds, and he hired a band of Arabs to pursue and murder him. Paul, however, was warned by the Christians, and retired to a place called Sandafa, in Lower Egypt. Here he was made treasurer of the church of St. Theodore, and died two years afterwards. The Moslems of the neighbourhood disturbed his dying hours with threats and curses, and he entreated the Patriarch's secretary to protect his dead body from their insults. This the secretary succeeded in doing, and it was he who afterwards related Paul's story to the chronicler, Michael of Tanis.

These conversions of prominent Moslems, though they must have rejoiced the hearts of all faithful Christians, did not make things easier for the Egyptian Church; but during the reign of El Aziz there was no persecution, though the Melkites were allowed to oppress the Monophysites, and their Patriarch Arsenius claimed and obtained one of their principal churches.

Abyssinia had been of late the scene of bloody civil wars, owing to the usurpation of the throne by two successive women, who had put to death all the descendants of the rightful line but one. This one was now pushing his fortunes in a desperate attempt to recover the throne of his ancestors, and thought it well to begin by making his peace with the Church. Apparently, all the ports were in the hands of the usurper, and he sent his appeal by the long and difficult land route to the King of Nubia, begging him to forward it to the Patriarch of Egypt. In this letter, part of which is still preserved, he sets forth in moving words the miseries of his country:—

These things, my brother (he writes in conclusion), I have written to you, in hope that the Christian religion may not be utterly destroyed and perish from among us. There have now been six Patriarchs¹ of Alexandria who have taken no care of our country, which has therefore remained desolate and without a pastor. Our bishops and our priests are dead, our churches are laid waste. Nor can we deny that we suffer these evils justly, on account of our crimes committed against our Metropolitan.

This letter was forwarded by the King of Nubia to the Patriarch, and a monk named Daniel, of the monastery of St. Macarius, was consecrated and despatched to Abyssinia. Here he was received with great joy, and shortly afterwards the young king's efforts were crowned with success, the usurping queen being deprived at once of her crown and her life.

¹ This number is incorrect. Cosmas was the last who had sent a Metropolitan into Abyssinia, between whom and Philotheus were only four—Macarius, Theophanius, Mena II., and Ephraim.

CHAPTER XV

THE PERSECUTION OF EL HAKIM

A.D. 996 IN 996 (A.H. 386) El Aziz died and was succeeded by El
 A.M. 712 Mansur Abu Ali el Hakim be amr Illah, commonly known
 A.H. 386 as El Hakim.¹ This prince was only eleven years old when he succeeded to the throne, and the first ten years of his reign were days of peace and prosperity to the Christians, owing doubtless to the influence of El Hakim's Christian mother. But as El Hakim grew up to manhood, it became apparent that this state of things could not last. The prince was a man of weak intellect and unbounded vanity, with that absence of self-control which was natural to the circumstances. As he grew towards manhood he fell under the influence of the leader of a new sect among the Mohammedans, which had recently become popular in Egypt. This sect, it is said, forbade the special observance of Friday, the feasts of the greater and less Bairam, and even the pilgrimage to Mecca.
 Under this influence El Hakim built the mosque which still bears his name, and has been lately (1894) known as the Arab Museum. He also gave himself out to be a new and greater prophet, to whom Christians and Moslems alike should pay honour. He believed himself to be in direct communion with God; some say, indeed, that he claimed to be, not, like Mohammed, the Prophet of God, but, like Jesus, the Incarnation of God. He was in the habit of ascending the Mokattam hills before break of day, without escort, to hold converse, as he said, with God. The Mohammedans appear to have more or less acquiesced in his pretensions, but the Christians regarded him as the most terrible form of Anti-Christ. In the preceding reign, and during the minority of El Hakim, a generation of Christians had grown up in greater freedom and security than they had known since the Arab conquest. The Christian influence at Court appears to have sheltered Melkite and Monophysite alike, the vexatious and humiliating restrictions on the Christians had fallen into disuse, and Christians were now to be seen riding horses, splendidly attired, owning slaves, and enjoying equal privileges with the servants of the Prophet. Conversions to Christianity indeed were not infrequent; the Christians had always been indispensable to the Government, and now it was apparently not an unknown thing for a Moslem to be compelled to sue for favour to a Christian. All this, of course, made the hatred of the Moslems burn more fiercely than ever against the despised race; but so long as the Sultan and his mother were well disposed towards them, nothing could be done. After the death of his mother, however, and the conversion of the Sultan to the new form of Islam which gave him divine honours, this state of affairs changed suddenly and terribly.

¹ The 'i' is long, as if it were 'ee.'

Before the persecution broke out, the Patriarch Philotheus, who had reigned twenty-four years, died in peace. He was celebrating the Holy Communion when he became suddenly silent. His attendant clergy, supposing that he must have forgotten himself for the moment, supplied the next words; but the Patriarch remained incapable of speech, and the service was finished by another. Philotheus was supported to his house and died shortly afterwards. The Alexandrians were anxious to recommend another layman and merchant, but the bishops strongly disapproved; and finally Zacharias, treasurer of the monastery of St. Macarius, was chosen. As, however, the merchant Abraham had already been named to the Sultan as the next Patriarch, and was apparently anxious in any case to take holy orders, he was ordained, and shortly afterwards raised to the bishopric of Memphis.

Zacharias was a peace-loving man and hardly equal to the management of a bench of bishops who had unhappily deteriorated in character in these years of Court favour and free association with the Moslems. Under Philotheus the amount of the ordination fee offered had, it must be feared, been more considered than the character of the applicant; and owing to the curious custom of the Egyptian Church that no parish priest can be made a bishop, there was not even the safeguard of previous trial or experience. Zacharias retained constantly about him a sort of perpetual council of bishops, some of them his own relations, upon whom he leaned far too much. One of them, it is said, by falsehood and extortion amassed a sum of no less than twenty thousand pounds during his bishopric; and though Zacharias himself would not receive the ordination fees, which were so great a scandal, especially in a time of peace, his council of bishops invariably managed to extort them. A particularly disgraceful case of this kind led to disastrous consequences.

John, the parish priest of a village named Abu Nefer, near the monastery of St. Macarius, being ambitious of a bishopric, went in person to the Patriarch and requested that he should be appointed to one then vacant. Zacharias laid the request before his council, who unhesitatingly rejected it.¹ John, whose actions show him to have been unworthy, went off to the Court at Cairo, where he apparently had influence, intending to complain to the Kaliph Hakim. But the Kaliph was rapidly approaching that state of religious frenzy which was soon to bring such fearful calamities upon the country; and the Christians of the Court, who knew well how critical their position was becoming, persuaded the angry priest to forego his complaint, and sent him back with letters to Zacharias. In these they warned the Patriarch of the coming danger, and begged him for the sake of peace to grant John the bishopric which he coveted. The Patriarch, being absent in Wady Habib, committed the charge of John to his nephew Michael, Bishop of Saka or Xoïs, to be entertained till he should return and decide the matter. But Michael of Xoïs, fearing that the Patriarch would yield, and being determined that John should not be promoted, was wicked enough to hire a party of Arabs to waylay his guest, fling him into a dry well, and stone him. It so happened, however, that there was a cave at the bottom of the pit, into which John crept, and was therefore unhurt by the shower of stones which his assailants poured upon him. Eventually he escaped and made his way to the Patriarch, to whom he narrated his wrongs.

¹ It is implied that they did so because John offered no money. But they had a canonical ground of refusal. A man to be a parish priest must be married; to be eligible for a bishopric he must be a monk.

Zacharias was so much moved by the wicked conduct of his nephew that, apparently as some sort of atonement, he promised John the coveted bishopric on the next vacancy. Shortly afterwards two were at his disposal, but, yielding to the remonstrances of his council, he again passed over the priest of Abu Nefer. John would no longer forego his revenge; but it is curious to observe that, instead of denouncing Michael for an attempt at murder, he drew up a memorial in which he acknowledged the Divine Commission which was claimed by Hakim, and invented a long string of crimes which he laid to the charge of the Patriarch!

Hakim immediately gave orders that Zacharias should be thrown into prison, and after three months he was brought out to be thrown to the lions. But the united testimony of both Moslem and Christian writers declares that the lions refused to touch him, and that a second trial was made with like result. Zacharias was therefore left in prison, and meanwhile the persecution broke out all over the country to a degree unequalled since the days of the Patriarch Alexander II.

Hakim proclaimed that all men, on pain of death, should acknowledge his divinity. It is said that he actually opened a register, in which every inhabitant of the four towns—Cairo, Masr, Fostat, and Babylon—was to sign his name in acknowledgment of this blasphemous demand. We are told that sixteen thousand of the population actually did sign, but we are left to infer from the context that the Christians refused to a man, and no doubt many Mohammedans did also. But the fury of the tyrant fell upon the Christians, not only in Egypt, but all through his empire. The town—Babylon is evidently intended¹—was set on fire, and that which was not burnt was given over to the pillage of the soldiers.

All swine throughout the country were to be publicly sacrificed. The stringent laws against wine and the cultivation of the grape were revived, in order to render the celebration of the Holy Communion impossible. The principal officers of the Court were the first to fall victims to the Kaliph's rage, and but few instances of recantation are recorded among them. Two were beheaded; a third, to whom are given the names of Gabriel and Abu Negiah—by which latter he was probably known amongst the Moslems—was summoned by Hakim, and offered the post of Supreme Wuzir throughout the whole empire if he would renounce Christianity. Gabriel requested the delay of one day, promising to give an answer on the morrow. Then, going to his house, he called all his friends together, and assured them that he had not asked for this day because he had even for a moment hesitated about his answer, but because he wished to take leave of them all, and exhort them to be steadfast in the coming trial. He entertained them all at a farewell banquet that evening, and on the morrow returned to the Court and informed the Kaliph of his resolution. Neither threats nor persuasions being able to move him, Hakim ordered him to receive one thousand lashes. Gabriel died under the torture after eight hundred strokes; but the remainder, by the tyrant's order, were inflicted on his lifeless body. Eight of the principal Christian secretaries were next seized; four remained firm, four apostatised. Of the four latter, one died suddenly; the remaining three were received back into the Church as penitents at the close of the persecution. In Syria the church of the Holy Sepulchre was, with many others in the country, levelled to the ground. The Patriarch Jeremiah, who was an Egyptian and uncle to Hakim, was brought to Cairo, tortured, and beheaded. Arsenius seems to have made good his escape.

¹ There are marks of twelve different burnings in the Babylonian heaps, before the final destruction of the city.

The following extracts are from the history of the persecution, written by the Moslem historian Makrizi :—

He then further oppressed the Christians by obliging them to wear a distinct dress and a sash round their loins; he forbade them to hold any procession or games at the Feast of Hosannas, or at that of the Cross, or of the Epiphany, as it was their wont to do at those festivals. He then burnt the wood of a great many crosses, and forbade the Christians to buy men or maid servants. (This restriction one reads with pleasure.) He pulled down the churches that were in the street Rashida, outside the city of Masr. He then laid in ruins the churches of El Maks, outside El Kahira (Cairo), and made over their contents to the people, who plundered them of more goods than can be told. He threw down the convent of El Kosseir,¹ and gave it to the people to sack.

¹ This convent was founded by Arcadius on the Mokattam hills east of Toura in memory of Arsenius, the tutor of his sons, who became a monk in Egypt, and spent the last three years of his life, it is said, in a rock-cut cell or cavern on the Toura hill. Arcadius built a church which became the nucleus of one of the most celebrated monasteries in Egypt. The name of El Kosseir is an abbreviation of the full name Deyr Johannis el Kasir—or the Convent of St. John the Dwarf, the latter being a well-known saint in Egypt. It was rebuilt after Hakim's persecution, and called the Convent of the Mule, because of a curious circumstance which spread the fame of the convent. The monks at one time (so runs the story) trained a mule so that every day it went down alone to the

He then forbade the Christians to celebrate the Feast of Baptism on the banks of the Nile in Egypt, and put an end to their gatherings on these occasions for the sake of recreation.

He then obliged every man among the Christians to wear, hanging from his neck, a wooden cross of the weight of five rotl (about five pounds), and forbade them to ride on horses, but made them ride on mules and asses, with saddles and bridles on which no gold or silver trimmings were allowed, all of black leather. He also proclaimed publicly, at the sound of the bell, in Kahira and Masr, that no livery-stable proprietor should let out a steed to any of the dependent population (the Christian Egyptians), and that no Moslem should let them sail in his boat. He also ordered that the turbans of the Christians should be black, that their stirrups should be of sycamore wood, and that the Jews should wear on their necks outside their dress a round piece of wood weighing five rotl.

He then set about demolishing all churches, and made over to the people, as prey and forfeit, all that was in them, and all that was settled on them. They were then all demolished, all their furniture and chattels were plundered, their endowments were forfeited to others, and mosques were built in their places. He allowed the (Moslem) call to prayer from the church of Shenouda in Masr, and built a wall round the church of Moallakah in Kasr-el-Shamma (the Roman fortress of Babylon). Then many people sent up letters to request to be allowed to search the churches and monasteries in the provinces of Egypt. Their request was hardly received before a favourable answer was returned; so they took the vessels and chattels of the churches and of the monasteries, and sold them in the market-places of Egypt, river, waited till its water-skins were filled by the man who worked there, and then returned alone to the convent. The ruins apparently still exist, and there are cells cut in the face of the cliff which were probably also inhabited by the monks.

together with what they found in those churches of gold and silver vessels and things of the kind, and bartered their endowments.

But they found enormous wealth in the church of Shenouda, and in that of Moallakah a very great endless quantity of gold fabrics and of silken vestments. The Emir also wrote to the intendants of the provinces to support the Moslems in their destruction of the churches and monasteries. And the work of demolition in Egypt was so general in the year 403 (A.D. 1013) that, according to statements on which one can rely, as to what was demolished at the end of the year 405, both in Egypt and Syria and in the provinces thereof, of temples built by the Greeks, it amounted to more than three thousand churches.¹ All the gold and silver vessels in them were plundered, their endowments were forfeited—and those endowments were splendid, and bestowed on wonderful edifices.²

¹ So in Malan's translation. But it is evidently a misprint; the number is elsewhere given by Makrizi himself at 30,000.

² Among the churches which were first plundered, and then turned into mosques by El Hakim, besides those in Cairo and the suburbs, Abu Salih particularises the following as having been specially beautiful: The church and monastery of the Nestorians, near Al Adawiyah or Miniet-es-Soudan (about 18 miles south of Cairo); the church of Our Lady at Assouan; the church of Our Lady at Ashmounayn. These were turned into mosques. The celebrated monasteries of El Kosseir and Nahya were also burnt to the ground by order of Hakim, but were restored soon after the persecution ceased. A particularly beautiful church of St. Pachomius at Fau (Bafu, in the district of Dashna), whose measurements are given as 150 cubits (225 feet) long and 75 cubits broad, whose walls were covered with glass mosaics, and whose pillars were of fine marble, was wrecked by El Hakim, besides several churches in Nubia, in the course of an expedition into that country. The King of Nubia who reigned in the time of the Kaliph Hakim was named Raphael, and Abu Salih says that he built himself in his royal city of Dongola a lofty palace with domes of red brick, which 'resembles the buildings in Al Irak.' Dongola is described in this reign as 'a large city on the banks of the blessed Nile, and contains many churches and large houses and wide streets.'

He further obliged the Christians to hang on their necks a cross when they went into the bath ; but he made the Jews hang bells on their necks on the same occasion. And, lastly, he ordered all Jews and all Christians to depart out of the land of Egypt and to go to the cities of Roum.¹ But they all gathered together under the castle of El Kahira (Cairo), beseeching and imploring mercy from the Prince of the Faithful, until he let them off being banished. Under these circumstances a great many Christians became Moslems.

The persecution continued with steady, relentless severity for nine years. Almost the whole of this time Zacharias was kept in prison, constantly threatened with being burnt alive, and on the other hand offered gifts and promotion if he would set the example to his people of renouncing Christianity. But neither threats nor persuasions had the smallest effect upon him, and after some years he was allowed to escape, and retired into the Nitrian desert. The last three years of the persecution were the worst of all ; and it is said that, except in the remoter monasteries, Divine service ceased to be held in the churches throughout Egypt. In some of the provinces, however, the governors were bribed to allow the services to be held in private houses. As time went on, indeed, some of the Christians had their private chapels consecrated ; and this fact, being reported to Hakim, seems to have struck him more than anything else with the impossibility of that which he had so lightly undertaken—to stamp out the Christian religion from his empire.

A certain monk named Yemin² had in the first shock

¹ This threat of banishment must, I think, have applied to the Jews only. The Christians were mostly anxious to escape, but were forbidden to move even from one district to another.

² This was probably the name given him by the Moslems.

of persecution become an apostate from the Christian religion, and consented to embrace the peculiar faith of the Kaliph. He had been retained near Hakim, and contrived to acquire great influence over his crazy intellect, so that after a time he openly recanted his recantation, and extorted from the Kaliph a letter of amnesty both for himself and others. He then retired to the monastery of St. Mercurius (Abu Sefayn); but Hakim came even there to visit him, and at length Yemin persuaded the Kaliph to give permission and safe-conduct for the Patriarch to return to Babylon. Zacharias returned, and was sitting in the monastery of St. Mercurius with several other bishops and clergy, among whom was the monk Yemin, when the Kaliph in person descended upon them. Yemin rose to the occasion, and introduced the Patriarch to the Kaliph, who does not appear to have ever seen him before, although he had been his prisoner for years.

His astonishment was great when a little old man in shabby dress rose up to receive him with quiet dignity; and he could not conceal his wonder at the deference shown, not to him, but to this insignificant old man, by all the surrounding prelates and dignitaries. He demanded of them how far the authority of their Patriarch extended, and was told that it was acknowledged all through Egypt, Abyssinia, Nubia, and Pentapolis; and that, without any military force or paid officials, a mere letter of the Patriarch signed with the cross would ensure instant attention to his orders.

‘Then,’ said Hakim, ‘it seems to me that Christianity has a firmer hold on the mind of man than any other religion, since we, though with bloodshed and marshalled armies and exhaustion of our treasure, cannot effect what one contemptible old man can do by his bare word.'

Eccentric always, he instantly commanded the Patriarch and his bishops to remain where they were till he came back, and rode off to Cairo without giving any hint of his intentions. A crowd had collected outside the walls of the Deyr. Both the people without and the bishops within waited in suspense for what was to come. All must have known how likely it was that the mad Kaliph would return with a force of soldiers to surround the place, and order a general massacre. To their astonishment, the next person to arrive was John, the priest of Abu Nefer, for whose sake Zacharias had at first been imprisoned, and who had recommended himself to the Kaliph by hailing him as the Vicar of God. He saluted the Patriarch as if nothing had happened, congratulated him on his return from exile, and then and there asked to be raised to one of the vacant bishoprics!

His incredible effrontery raised a tumult among the clergy even at that moment of suspense, especially as Zacharias received the man kindly, and it was not known how far his love of peace might lead him. Some say, indeed, that the Patriarch promised to grant his request; but the remonstrances of the bishops, and especially the menacing attitude of Michael of Xoïs, so alarmed John that he left their presence, and appealed to the crowd outside the Deyr for protection. Some of the bishops, however, interfered between Michael and John, pointing out the extreme impropriety of such a scene at such a time, and John was brought back among them. He was even pacified by being raised to the rank of Hegoumenos—the highest to which he could aspire by canonical rule.

The hours wore on, and at length word passed from one to another that the Kaliph was returning. The bishops drew together and prepared for the worst. There was the clash and clamour of the arrival, and then Hakim himself entered with a paper in his hand which he gave to the Patriarch.

It was an edict for the restoration of the ruined churches, the restitution of the timber, pillars, and stones which had been taken from them, and of the landed property which had belonged to them. Moreover, it abrogated the humiliating restrictions imposed on the dress, &c., of the Christians; and restored them, so far as it could be done, to the status they had occupied at the beginning of his reign.

Thus strangely ended one of the worst of the many persecutions which the ill-fated Egyptians have had to endure. The Kaliph did not long survive his change of policy. A conspiracy (in the palace, it was believed) caused him to be assassinated on one of his nocturnal expeditions to the Mokattam heights. His garments were found, his ass, and the dead bodies of his two companions; but the corpse of the Kaliph was never discovered, and the followers of his sect declared that he had been caught up into heaven, and would reappear on the earth at some future time.

This opinion is still held by the Druses of Mount Lebanon, who represent all that remains of the curious religion of the mad Kaliph Hakim.

During his reign he founded an academy, which was opened in the year 1005 (A.H. 395). It contained an excellent library; and professors of all the sciences were attached to it, besides a regular staff of scribes for copying manuscripts.

This academy was probably always regarded with suspicion by the orthodox Moslems, on account of the heretical tenets of its founder, and about the year 1122 it was suppressed by Alfdal on account of its heretical teaching. A little later it was reopened on orthodox lines and continued until the Fatimite dynasty came to an end in Egypt.

CHAPTER XVI

SHENOUDA AND CHRISTODULOS

A.D. 1020 HAKIM was succeeded by his son Ali ebn el Hassan Zahir
 A.M. 786 el Azaz din Allah, commonly known as Zahir, but even A.H. 411 this name may be spelt Daher and Taher. The government was really carried on by his aunt, the sister of Hakim, till her death, and though this Kaliph reigned sixteen years there is little to record of him.

Zacharias survived the persecution of Hakim about twelve years. On his death a man named Shenouda, a monk of St. Macarius, was elected to the Patriarchate. On this occasion the Wuzir, who was friendly to the Christians, granted the request of Bekr, one of their nobles, that the customary backsheesh of 6,000*l.* which a new Patriarch paid to the Moslem authorities should be remitted. The Alexandrian clergy, so far from following the example of liberality set by the unbelievers, refused their consent to the election of Shenouda II. until he signed the bond for the yearly payment of that tribute which Theophanius had in vain entreated them to forego or lessen. In the present state of the Church this bond alone made it almost impossible to dispense with the ordination fees, which were regarded as the greatest scandal of the Egyptian Church ; but from all accounts Shenouda went far beyond any of his predecessors, and did actually sell the bishoprics as they became vacant to the highest bidder. In this generation, when the Christians were protected instead of being persecuted, the office of a bishop was one of great dignity and power, and sees were freely competed for by the ambitious and unscrupulous men who would conform to the Patriarch's terms. John of Abu Nefer, whose power to coerce successive Patriarchs is not easily explained, since he seems to have had neither virtues to recommend him to Zacharias nor money to bribe Shenouda, was made Bishop of Farma, or Rhinocura, with a pension of 60*l.* The see of Panephyus was sold to one Raphael for 1,200*l.* as consecration fee; the see of Lycopolis, or Assiout, was sold to the Protopope of that Church for a sum not stated. In the latter case the citizens indignantly refused to receive the man as their bishop, and he positively returned to Shenouda and demanded his money back if the Patriarch could not compel the diocese to receive him. The Patriarch refused to do either, but he was eventually received in the diocese, though not in the town of Assiout.

Not only did Shenouda sell the bishoprics as openly as the presentations to livings were recently sold in England; but he invented a theory that on the death of the bishop his personal property reverted to the Church. The Bishop of Shenana having died, Shenouda summoned his brother to give up the personal effects which had belonged to the bishop. The brother begged that the empty house at least might be left to him, and on Shenouda's refusal he turned Moslem, and thus retained the whole of his brother's property.

It seems clear that in the case of Shenouda the ordination and consecration fees were really made the excuse for bribery and extortion to a terrible extent; and that in the second year of his Patriarchate he point-blank refused to pay the yearly tribute to the Alexandrians which was the alleged excuse for his proceedings. The Chapter brought an action against him and obtained payment of the sum with costs. All this was in a time of freedom from persecution, and such liberal treatment on the part of the Moslem authorities as the Church had never known since the days of Amr. It was no wonder that the great lay families of the Egyptian Church became bitterly ashamed of the spectacle presented by such 'Christians.' The same Bekr whose influence had procured from the Kaliph the remission of the backsheesh on the Patriarch's consecration now bestirred himself to reform these crying evils. He sought an interview with the Patriarch and earnestly remonstrated with him, pointing out the scandal which was thus brought upon the Christian name. Shenouda for his part threw the blame on the Alexandrian clergy, and declared that without the ordination and consecration fees it would be impossible for him to raise sufficient money to satisfy their demands. Bekr met this difficulty by solemnly undertaking that he and some other lay friends of his would find the money for the yearly payment to Alexandria, if on his part Shenouda and his bishops would bind themselves to abstain from exacting fees or other simoniacal ways of obtaining money. To this Shenouda consented ; a bond was drawn up to that effect and signed by the Patriarch, who then called a synodical meeting to obtain the signatures of his bishops. But the bishops, who had almost all paid for their consecration and were in the habit of exacting ordination fees from those whom they admitted to holy orders, received the proposal with indignation. They justified the theory of such fees much as we suppose the Western bishops would do in like circumstances, and loudly protested against the interference of the laity. News of the stormy proceedings in the synod being carried to Bekr, he hastened to present himself before the bishops and entreated to be heard. Once more he repeated the arguments which he had used to Shenouda; reminded the bishops that the Patriarch Ephraim, whom the whole Church revered as a saint, had abolished the fees in question, and begged them to consider what account they would have to give of their action at the bar of Heaven if they refused the offer now made to them.

At the close of his speech Shenouda expressed his hearty concurrence in what had just been said. At the same time he asked Bekr to return him the deed which he had signed for a few moments, as he wished the bishops to see it for themselves. Bekr, thinking no evil, readily brought forward the document, and placed it in the hands of Shenouda. Before the whole assembly the Patriarch tore the deed in pieces.

The meeting broke up in the greatest disorder. Some of the bishops had been won by the arguments of Bekr, all complained of the vacillation and want of honour shown by the Patriarch. Most of the bishops and clergy present adjourned to hold a sort of indignation meeting in the church of St. Mercurius (Abu Sefayn), while Shenouda and a few of his partisans remained in the church of St. Michael. The principal laymen joined the bishops, and after long and informal discussions the bishops appear to have acknowledged the justice of the remarks addressed to them, and signified their readiness to accept the terms offered. Shenouda alone, who must have counted on the opposition of his bishops to save him from the onus of rejecting Bekr's proposals, now remained obstinate. He went, apparently on the next morning, to the church where the bishops and laity had reassembled; and the whole day was consumed in fruitless discussion. Bekr stood his ground, pleading and arguing with the Patriarch until the latter lost all control. Furious that Bekr should have won the whole bench to his opinion, and determined not to yield, he closed the disgraceful scene by a yet more disgraceful act. He ordered Bekr to be seized and publicly beaten. The meeting again broke up in the greatest disorder and the ill government of the Patriarch continued unchecked.

Zahir died in 1036 (A.H. 427), and his son Moez or Muad Abu Temim el Mustanzir b' Allah, commonly known as Moustanser or Mustanzir, was proclaimed his successor; but as he was only seven years old the government was for some time carried on by his mother (a black slave) and successive Wuzirs; of whom the first was the Jewish slavedealer who had sold her to Zahir. The palace was filled with negroes, who were favoured to a degree which at length roused the resentment of the Turks and Arabs. A special body of negro troops was raised by the princess and retained in Cairo as life guards.

The early years of Mustanzir were troubled by successive rebellions against the authority of a negress regent and a boy Kaliph. In Syria, in North Africa, in Asia Minor, fighting continued with little interruption for some years. In Egypt an impostor gave himself out to be Hakim returned to life, and raised a popular insurrection, which was, however, of short duration. Eventually, however, the authority of Mustanzir was established on a wider basis than ever. He also received a great accession of wealth from the death of two great-aunts, daughters of the first Fatimite Kaliph, who were enormously wealthy. It is said that their demise had been anxiously looked forward to by each successive Kaliph ; but the old ladies saw four generations of their family succeed before they left the coveted wealth to the young Mustanzir. Part of the riches so acquired the Kaliph employed in restoring and beautifying the Mosque of Amr at Fostat. It had been built on the old simple plan when the Saracens forbore to copy the domes and minarets of the Christian churches, and merely stole the pillars they required for the small portion that was roofed. Now Mustanzir made a niche towards Mecca of beautiful workmanship, placed a pulpit in the mosque, and at a later period caused a minaret to be built for it.

In 1037 (A.H. 429) a treaty was concluded between the Fatimite Kaliph and the Emperor of Byzantium, by which the latter agreed to release all the Moslem prisoners whom he had taken in the late wars (to the number of 5,000), on condition that he was allowed to rebuild the Church of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem, which had been destroyed twenty-six years before by order of the Kaliph Hakim. It was accordingly rebuilt with great care and splendour.

In 1047 (A.H. 439) Shenouda, who had been very ill for three years, died, and was succeeded by Christodulos, called Abd-el-Messiah by the Arabs. He found the Church in a very bad state, owing to the conduct of the late Patriarch. The laity seem to have done their best, for five new churches in Alexandria alone were waiting to be consecrated, and one, St. Mark, to be re-opened after restoration. But the trouble about the ordination fees had evidently deterred many from seeking Holy Orders ; and Christodulos set himself earnestly to work to restore and reform the affairs of the Church. In one day he consecrated the five new churches : St. Mennas, St. John the Evangelist, St. Mercurius, St. George, and St. Raphael, and re-opened the Church of St. Mark. On the same day he consecrated one priest and sixty deacons, and published a series of canons which he had drawn up for the regulation of the Egyptian Church. These were thirty-one in number, and are the first additions to the canons made by the Egyptian Church since her separation from the Greek and Roman Churches. Of these Neale gives the following as the most important :

Marriage is strictly forbidden in Lent ; baptism or burial on Good Friday. Orders were not to be conferred within the octave of Pentecost ; no foreign bishop, priest, or deacon is allowed to exercise any function in Alexandria. The Fasts of the Apostles and of the Nativity are enjoined ; Wednesdays and Fridays are also to be observed as days of fasting. It was forbidden to baptize a child (except in case of danger) without afterwards administering the Holy Communion. Marriage with a Melkite wife was invalid unless both parties were crowned by a priest of the National Church. Any deacon or layman, who from a dispute with his priest is unwilling to receive the Communion from him, is forbidden to receive it at the hand of any other. Any one who appeals from the jurisdiction of the National Church to that of a Mohammedan cadi or the Kaliph, should be, if an ecclesiastic, suspended, if a layman, excommunicated. The corban or oblation is to be prepared at home by the faithful after the accustomed manner.

This last clause had reference to a controversy which had lately arisen about the manner of preparing the oblation or bread of good will. The cakes distributed under this name at the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the Egyptian Churches are well known; but the Syrians were accustomed to mix a little salt and oil in making the bread, and Christodulos regarded this as an innovation not to be encouraged. It so happened that he was himself celebrating the Sacrament in St. Mercurius (Abu Sefayn), at this time one of the most important churches in Egypt, when a Syrian Christian of high rank, the principal physician to the Kaliph himself, attended and brought an oblation of bread prepared after the manner of his country. The Patriarch pointed out that this was contrary to rule, and refused to receive it. The physician persisted, and the Patriarch ordered his attendants to put the man out of the church. The Syrian resisted, and force was used to such an extent that he was injured in the unseemly struggle. By this means Christodulos made himself an enemy at Court.

Other causes conspired to render the zealous and uncompromising Patriarch obnoxious to the Moslems. Under the reign of the unworthy Shenouda the standard of the Christians had deteriorated very much, and though some of the laity had made a gallant effort to uphold the Church, others had apostatised and joined the dominant faith. Among these was a young man, the son of a Court official, whose father however banished him from his house in consequence. Some time afterwards the young man, whose name was Nekam, began to realise what he had done, and in deep penitence sought refuge in the convent of St. Michael at Moctara. Some of the monks from that convent were going to St. Macarius in Nitria, and recommended Nekam to come with them, which he at first consented to do. On the eve of departure, however, Nekam declared that it would be an act of cowardice, and that the only right course was for him to profess Christ openly in the place where he had formerly denied Him. He therefore concealed himself no longer, but in the Christian dress returned to Cairo and mingled with his former associates. He was at once arrested as an apostate from the faith of Islam and thrown into prison. His father used all his interest to save him, backed by the promise of an enormous bribe. The Governor of the city declared that he had no choice and that the law must take its course; but privately suggested to the father that if Nekam chose to feign madness he would be able to procure his deliverance.

The father hastened to the prison, and with loving entreaties prevailed on Nekam to adopt this stratagem. He then left the prison to call the physicians and witnesses before whom the farce was to be played. But during his absence a Syrian monk who was also a prisoner exhorted Nekam to martyrdom with such effect that when his father returned he met him calmly and professed himself before the witnesses a Christian. He was therefore tried and beheaded, but his body, by the special permission of the Kaliph, was given up to his friends, who buried it near the church of St. Michael. When the Patriarch, however, next came to Babylon he directed the body to be taken up and buried inside the church with the honours of a martyr.

Christodulos travelled all over the country, earnestly endeavouring to restore and reanimate the fallen Church. He does not appear, however, to have abolished altogether the ordination fees, so that one party in the Church considered him lax, and reproached him with simony. Under him new churches were built everywhere, especially in Dimrue,¹ where he had fixed his Patriarchal residence and built himself a house. This place rose rapidly in importance, and seems to have been entirely inhabited by Christians, but being at some distance from any seat of Moslem government it escaped notice for some years.

The first accusation brought against the Patriarch was that, owing to his influence, George, King of Nubia, not only refused all alliance with the Moslems, but refused to send the slave tribute. The peace and prosperity of these Christian kingdoms seems to have steadily increased since Moez sent his ambassadors to spy out the land ; and Christodulos had sent one of his Egyptian bishops to assist in the dedication of a new church built by George. He was, however, able to demonstrate to the Wuzir's satisfaction that he had nothing to do with the stoppage of the slave tribute and was set at liberty, but the feeling against the Christians increased more and more as they prospered under the government of their new Patriarch.

In the year 1052 the Nile hardly rose at all, and food became scarce. The next two years were no better, and the Kaliph Mustanzir wrote to the Greek Emperor Constantine X. for corn. A fleet was already laden with supplies for Egypt when the Emperor died, and the Empress declared that the corn should not sail unless the Kaliph consented to a formal treaty, offensive and defensive, between the Greek and Saracenic Empires. Mustanzir refused, and the corn was not allowed to depart. The famine became very grievous, and pestilence as usual followed in its wake.²

¹ Dimrue has been identified by Neale with Hermopolis Parva, or Damanhur, but without any grounds assigned. Amelineau does not mention it, and Quatremère says the name was Timru, and that it is a town in the Garbieh province.

² It was during this reign (1054), though it appears to have passed

So far the Church had escaped actual persecution under Mustanzir, but about this time a Moslem judge 'by chance' passed through the Patriarchal city of Dimrua, and wrote an account of it to the Wuzir with the greatest indignation. He describes it as a second Constantinople—there were seventeen churches in the city alone, most of which had been recently built, besides others in the surrounding districts! Moreover, he complained that the Patriarch's house, which was large enough for a palace, was engraved with inscriptions insulting the Moslem Faith! Yazouri wrote to ask for a list of the insulting inscriptions on the Patriarch's house, since here, it appears, was a tangible offence which could be used against him. The judge, who does not appear to have read them (probably they were in Coptic), made a second visit with his scribes to Dimrua for this purpose. The inscriptions resolved themselves on inspection into one which was engraved over the door of the house: 'In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, which three are but one God.'

The inscription was at once ordered to be erased. The Patriarch offered no resistance, but merely observed, 'You may erase these words from above my door, but you cannot erase them from my heart.'

All the newly built churches in Dimrua were now pulled down by order of the Moslem authorities, and another edict ordered that all the churches in Egypt should be closed. In the Delta this order was carried out with great bitterness by a man whose personal hatred of the Christians was surety for his zeal. He also contrived to unnoticed alike by the Greek and National Churches in Egypt, that the final separation took place between the Greek and Roman Churches.

exact from them the sum of 70,000 dinars, but while he was still prosecuting the work he was thrown from his horse and killed, to the great relief of the Christians in the Delta.

In Alexandria they fared better, since the Governor to whom the order was entrusted was favourable to them. On receiving directions to close and rob the churches he sent for the principal officials of the Church, one of whom was Mahoub the historian, and warned them at once to hide whatever they might have of value in such manner that the soldiers whom he must send round the churches next day should be unable to find them. All that night the Copts were busy, and when the Government officials arrived on the morrow to confiscate everything of value in the churches they found nothing but a few mats and curtains. The Governor thereupon wrote to the Wuzir pointing out that the Christians of Alexandria were so miserably poor that they had nothing of value even in their churches, and that it was impossible for them to pay the fine demanded, viz. 6,000 dinars. The sum was therefore reduced to 1,000 dinars, which the Christians readily agreed to pay. Half was contributed by the Greek and half by the Egyptian Church; for Alexandria was the stronghold of the former, and the numbers of each Church in her were nearly equal.

The keys of one church were restored to the Egyptian Patriarch, and service allowed to be celebrated in it. It is stated also that the house of Anianus, St. Mark's first convert, was spared to them, and there is a curious story in Quatremère, taken from an Arab MS., to the effect that the head of St. John the Baptist, which up to this date had been preserved in a private house in Alexandria, was now hidden by the Christians, lest it should fall into the hands of the Moslems!

The Patriarch himself was arrested and his house searched. They found in the treasury 6,000 dinars, which the Moslem authorities immediately confiscated for their own use. Christodulos was only set at liberty owing to the powerful intercession of the Christians most indispensable to the Government. A Moslem was always chosen as Wuzir, but so little dependence could Mustanzir place on his own co-religionists that in twelve years of his reign there were no less than thirty-five changes in this post. It has always been one of the worst offences of the Christians in the eyes of the Egyptian Moslems, that the superior intelligence and probity of the former render their employment indispensable to the Government. In times of persecution popular clamour has demanded and obtained their instant dismissal over and over again, only to be grudgingly readmitted when it was found impossible to carry on any settled form of government without them.

About this time Egypt was visited by a severe shock of earthquake, which destroyed at least 25,000 people.

CHAPTER XVII

BEDR EL JAMAL, THE ARMENIAN

A.D. 1065
A.M. 781
A.H. 458

THE squabbles between the different Moslem nationalities of the kingdom soon broke out into civil wars. The Kaliph's mother, as we have said, was a negress, and, not content with filling her palace with negroes, had raised a special negro regiment for her own service. On the occasion of the festival at Birket Omaïrah (now called Birket el Haj), which precedes the departure of the pilgrimage to Mecca, a quarrel broke out between the Turkish soldiers of the Kaliph and the black soldiers of his mother. A Turk who was drunk having drawn his sword upon a negro, the comrades of the latter killed the Turk on the spot. The Turks immediately surrounded the tent of the Kaliph, but receiving no satisfaction from him they attacked the blacks forthwith, and a bloody skirmish took place in the pilgrim camp. The spark once lighted, the quarrel became a war between the Turkish and Arab troops on the one hand, and the negroes on the other, neither party paying the smallest heed to the Kaliph or to his mother. The negroes marched out of Cairo, and, taking up their position in the province of Said, were joined by all the negroes in Egypt, to the number, it is said, of 50,000. Then they marched upon Cairo, but were met by the Turks, and the two parties fought a pitched battle. At first the Turks were defeated, but by a clever stratagem they turned the fortune of war, and slew thousands of the blacks. The mother of the Kaliph openly espoused the cause of the negroes, and sent them succours; the Kaliph, when appealed to by the Turks, would only reply that he had nothing to do with the negroes. He sent an ambassador to try and make peace between the two camps, but without effect. Distracted between the civil war on the one hand and the perpetual dishonesty of his Moslem officials on the other, the feeble Kaliph, after a stormy scene with his mother, set off alone to Fostat, intending to abdicate the throne, and become a devotee in the Mosque of Amr for the rest of his life. He was overtaken, however, and brought back to the palace. The contest went on for some years with varying fortunes for the Turks and the negroes, and with unvarying ill-fortunes alike for Christian and Mohammedan Copts, who were harassed and plundered all over the country; the Christians suffering most of all. At length Nasr el Doulah, the leader of the Turks, succeeded in finally crushing the negro troops, and became virtually master of the kingdom. The unfortunate Kaliph was reduced to a mere cypher in his palace, his treasury was exhausted, and the ravished country had little left which he could extract from it. The Turks clamoured for more and more money, and at last the Kaliph made over to them the accumulated treasures of the last hundred years in his palace to satisfy their rapacity. We have long lists of the jewels, the precious objects and the embroideries, which were dragged out and divided between the Turks. Many of them are described at full length, and among them a piece of work which had been executed by order of the Kaliph Moez, representing all the different countries of the earth—the mountains, the seas, the rivers, the towns and roads, each being marked with its name in gold and silver. All the works of art which had been collected with such care by his predecessors, a yearly sum of fifty thousand dinars having been spent in forming the collection, besides the presents received by each Kaliph from various emperors and kings, were in one fortnight of the year 1069 (A.H. 461) dragged out and divided among the ignorant Turkish soldiers: among them was a very large collection of old armour. One of the servants employed in the work of removal carelessly set fire to a piece of cotton; the fire caught, and before it could be subdued the whole of the costly furniture, which had not yet been taken from the palace, was consumed. There remained only the library, and even that was not spared. The Fatimite Kaliphs had collected books ever since they came into Egypt, and these were distributed by camel-loads not only to the leaders of the Turks, who possibly could read, but to the private soldiers, by whom they were wantonly destroyed. The Governor of Alexandria, who was one of the generals sharing in this wholesale plunder of the palace, sent off all he had been able to lay hands on, and particularly an enormous number of the books, which he seems to have valued, to Alexandria. But on their way through the disordered country a wandering tribe of Berbers, who under the name of the Lewatah took a prominent part in the troubles of this time, fell upon the convoy, and took the whole. They tore off the bindings of the books to make slippers, burnt some of the leaves, and threw the rest away in the desert. The wind blew them into heaps, so that ‘to this day,’ says the Moslem author, ‘the place is called the Hill of Books.’

Nasr el Doulah was now virtually master of Egypt ; the Kaliph was little more than a prisoner in his almost empty palace. Nasr's bad government, however, at length turned even his own partisans against him ; some of his troops showed signs of mutiny, and Mustanzir seized the moment to put himself at the head of a popular movement against his rebellious subject. Nasr el Doulah was taken by surprise, and retired to Gizeh. As, however, a large body of his Turkish troops rejoined him, he crossed the river and gave battle to the troops of Mustanzir in the waste ground between the two cities of Fostat and Babylon on the south, and the two Masrs on the north. This space had once been covered with villas and gardens, but had fallen into utter ruin during the troubles preceding the invasion of the Fatimites.

Victory declared for Mustanzir, but Nasr el Doulah escaped, and took possession of Alexandria. Here he declared open war upon the Kaliph, allying himself with the Lewatah, who had harassed the Delta for some time, and were now allowed to ravage the country with impunity. They camped where they chose, and stayed there until they had exhausted the produce of the district. They allowed no banks to be repaired or canals to be cleaned ; all the lawful holders of the lands were plundered, but the Christians were treated without mercy. They plundered and destroyed the monasteries of the Wady Natron, and massacred most of the monks, though some escaped and fled to the Delta. In one of their raids the Patriarch Christodulos fell into their hands ; he was robbed of all he had with him, and cruelly tortured. But Abu-l-Taib, the confidential secretary of Nasr el Doulah, was, as usual, a Christian, and, owing to his urgent representations, Nasr el Doulah intimated to his barbarous allies that the Patriarch must be given up. The secretary paid a ransom of 3,000 dinars, and Christodulos was set at liberty. A little later Abu-l-Taib tried to save the life of his former employer, the Moslem Governor of Tandeta, which the Lewatah had seized and were pillaging; but he arrived too late, and on his reproaching the barbarians with the murder they fell upon him and killed him.

For the last five years, since 1064 (A.H. 457), the canals had been allowed to fall into complete disrepair; the Nile had been unable to water the country; and the civil war had effectually prevented any steps being taken to avert the inevitable result. No road in the country was safe from brigands or plundering parties of irregular troops. The village Copts—who, whether Moslem or Christian, only asked to be left in peace to their husbandry—no longer cared to sow what they were never allowed to reap, but lived from hand to mouth, while famine spread all over Egypt, and had grown worse with each successive year, till in the year 1069 it assumed terrible proportions.

In Cairo, Fostat, and Babylon, a loaf of bread was sold for fifteen dinars, one egg for a dinar, a cat for three dinars, a dog for five. Even the supply of dogs and cats ran short, and one man was convicted of driving a regular trade in human flesh. He decoyed women and children (no doubt with offers of food), strangled them, and exposed the flesh for sale. All the immense establishment of horses, mules, and camels belonging to the Kaliph had been eaten, except three horses; the ornaments of the tombs of his ancestors and the wardrobes of his women had been sold for bread. At length the Kaliph was reduced to the charity of a woman who had been enormously wealthy, and who spent all she had in feeding the famine-stricken people. She sent the Kaliph a bowl of soup every day; but the women of the palace were at length told to seek food where they could. They gathered together and agreed to make their way out of the country on foot. The next day they set out in procession, shrilling the piercing wails of Eastern lament. But hardly had they left the walls of the city than, one after another, they staggered and fell, and died of starvation where they lay.

One day the Wuzir on his way to the palace was set upon by a starving crowd and knocked off his mule, which was seized and devoured before his eyes. His followers, however, succeeded in arresting three of the ringleaders, and the unhappy wretches were at once crucified. By the next morning three fleshless skeletons were seen upon the crosses; the dead men had been eaten during the night.

Pestilence followed, and the population died like flies all over the land. The cities suffered most; Cairo, Fostat, and Babylon were more than decimated. Tanis, up to this time one of the principal cities in the Delta and still inhabited mostly by Christians, was completely destroyed by the famine and the plague. Out of the many thousand inhabitants, only one hundred remained alive, and the city was deserted. Its bishop, Michael the historian, appears to have done his best, and perished with his flock. In their extremity the Christians sent for help to the Christian kingdoms of the Soudan, still prosperous and at peace. George, the King of Nubia, had sent to request the consecration of a bishop (probably the Metropolitan) named Pamoun, and by him Christodulos sent an earnest appeal for help for his starving people. The famine was rendered absolute by the action of Nasr el Doulah, who prevented any supplies coming to the sea-ports from reaching Cairo. The story is told of a woman who came into Fostat one day bearing a necklace which was valued at a thousand dinars, and endeavoured, for a long time without success, to exchange it for some flour. At length a man took pity on her and gave her a supply of flour. Her home, however, was in Cairo, and she dared not cross the desert alone with her precious burden, so she hired some men to escort her, promising to pay them in flour. Arrived at the Bab Zawilah, she supposed herself in safety, and dismissed her escort. But she was hardly within the Cairo streets when the starving crowd surrounded her and tore the flour from her arms. A handful or two was all she could save, enough to make one loaf. When she had made this, she took it in her hands and went to the space in front of the palace gate. Mounting to a spot where all could see her, she raised the bread in both hands and cried aloud : ‘ Behold, ye dwellers in Cairo, and pray for our Kaliph, whose reign is so benevolent, and renders us so prosperous. Thanks to him, this cake of bread that you see has cost me a thousand dinars.’

The woman’s words were repeated to the Kaliph, and stung him into characteristic action. He sent for the commandant of police, loaded him with reproaches, and swore by God that if he did not find some way of furnishing the markets with bread, at a moderate price, he should be beheaded and everything belonging to him confiscated.

The commandant had some reason to suspect that a knot of corn merchants were really hiding supplies of grain, and took an equally characteristic way of finding out. He took out of the prisons several criminals under sentence of death and dressed them in the ordinary garb of a rich corn-merchant. He then called a meeting of the corn-merchants, taking care that all those whom he suspected should be present. Before them all he summoned a corn-merchant whom he had convicted of hiding corn—i.e. one of the aforesaid criminals. Assuring the assembly that the vengeance of Heaven and the Kaliph was about to fall on all those guilty of so grievous an offence, he caused the man to be beheaded on the spot. Another 'corn-merchant' was treated in the same way, and a third was called, when the assembled merchants rose and entreated the commandant to pause, assuring him that the examples he had made were quite sufficient for them, and that they would at once open their granaries, and sell such flour as remained to them at a moderate price. They were not allowed to depart till the price had been fixed by the commandant, and thus for a short time the immediate wants of the city were relieved. But all such expedients were necessarily temporary, and Nasr el Doulah, breaking up his camp at Salahieh, marched upon a city almost denuded of population, and helpless to resist. When the successful tyrant entered the palace he found the wretched Kaliph clothed in rags, and seated upon a common mat. He was kept as a sort of state prisoner by Nasr el Doulah, who tortured his mother and heaped indignities upon him, till in 1072-73 Nasr el Doulah was assassinated by one of his own associates. Neither the country nor the Kaliph was any the better, however, for the change of tyrants, and their miserable state continued another year, till the Kaliph wrote for help in secret to the able general who had made himself master of Syria.

This was Bedr el Jamal, an Armenian, who, like so many of the ablest Egyptian rulers, began life as a slave, but, unlike the majority, he still clung in secret to the religion of his youth.¹ Rising rapidly in the army, he had been appointed Governor of Syria by Mustanzir, and had never openly renounced his allegiance to his nominal master, though for years he had now been entirely independent. Mustanzir wrote and offered him supreme power in Egypt if he would come and free the unhappy country from its present tyrants. Bedr accepted, but the most profound secrecy was maintained, and, in spite of remonstrances of his generals, Bedr insisted on invading Egypt by sea, that he might arrive the more unexpectedly. He landed near Damietta, marched through the Delta without opposition, and entered Cairo in the close of the year 1074 (A.H. 467). The petty tyrants, unaware that Mustanzir had sent for his nominal subject, supposed him another rebel, and hastened to make friends with him, since they were clearly unable to oppose him. Bedr received them all with effusion, and invited them to a great feast. To each Emir he told off a picked soldier, with secret instructions to assassinate the Emir on his leaving the palace. Whoever failed not to strike instant death was to be rewarded with the house and goods of his victim.

This truly Oriental plan succeeded perfectly. In one night the whole band of tyrants was slain, and Bedr presented himself before the Kaliph, who clothed him with honour and proclaimed him commander-in-chief. Bedr at once took energetic measures to restore order and, so far as possible, food to the distracted country. The Lewatah still occupied the Delta; Damietta and Alexandria were each held by one of the petty Moslem tyrants who had ruined Egypt steadily for more than twenty years. In one pitched battle he broke the power of the Lewatah, captured both their chief and his son, and afterwards swept them out of the country with ease. Damietta and Alexandria were taken by storm and with fearful carnage. Bedr used invariably his own well-drilled troops, on which he could rely, and the undisciplined hordes of Turks and barbarians which had lived on the plunder of a defenceless land for so long had no chance against him. The Said was next cleared of the same armed brigands, and so many women and horses were taken prisoners in the process that after distributing the best of each to his victorious soldiers, Bedr sent the rest to be sold in Cairo. It is recorded that the price of a woman was a dinar, the price of a horse a dinar and a half. The peasantry were assured of protection, and encouraged to sow their lands once more. It was proclaimed that all taxes on land and agricultural produce should be remitted for the space of three years. Once more Mecca acknowledged the Egyptian Mustanzir as the true Kaliph, and the inhabitants tore the black coverings of the Kaliph of Baghdad from their mosque, to replace them by the white embroideries of the Fatimites.

¹ It is difficult to say if Bedr el Jamal were avowedly a Christian or not. The Christian Emir referred to by Abu Salih as being lord of all Egypt about this time might be Taj ed Doula.

Though Bedr was a friend to the Christians, he dispensed strict justice, and never openly favoured them. Some Moslem trader having reported to Bedr that Victor, the Metropolitan of Nubia, had destroyed a mosque built by the Moslems in that kingdom, Christodulos was promptly arrested, and held responsible for the action of his Metropolitan. As, however, the Patriarch was able to prove that the story was entirely false, he was set free without injury. One of the robber chiefs with whom Bedr was fighting in the Said escaped into Nubia, where he thought himself safe from pursuit. But Bedr sent two sherifs to demand the extradition of the rebel from the King of Nubia, and asked Christodulos to send a bishop with the sherifs to sanction and enforce the request. Christodulos sent a bishop named Mercurius, and the brigand chief was at once surrendered to justice. He was brought down to Fostat, and crucified outside the iron gate.

Egypt was rapidly recovering under the stern but just government of Bedr, when she was threatened by a new danger. The greater part of Bedr's troops were still in the Said, when in 1076-7 (A.H. 469) Atziz, a Turkoman adventurer, who in Bedr's absence had overrun Syria and taken Damascus, Jerusalem, and Tiberias, suddenly appeared with 40,000 men in Egypt, and had camped close to Cairo before Bedr could recall his troops. In this dilemma Bedr opened negotiations with the invader, as if the only question were the amount of ransom to be paid to Atziz if he would consent to withdraw from Egypt. He prolonged these negotiations as long as possible, and meanwhile his troops were hastening down from the Said. Almost at the same time an enormous caravan of pilgrims on their way to Mecca arrived at Cairo, among whom were 3,000 men capable of bearing arms. Bedr rode out to these men and made them a stirring address, assuring them that they could perform no more meritorious deed than to join in repulsing these invaders on their way to Mecca. They agreed with enthusiasm, arms and money were supplied them, and directions given for the plan of battle. Bedr had also managed to detach several bodies of mercenary Arabs from the troops of Atziz; and when his own troops arrived, he fell suddenly and swiftly on the invaders.

The surprise and the success were complete. Great numbers of the invading army were slain, and the rest took flight, abandoning their camp and all the spoil they had gathered in Syria, which thus fell into the hands of the Egyptians. It is said that Bedr found in the Syrian camp no less than 10,000 children of both sexes, who had been carried off during the march through Egypt to be sold as slaves.

After this no outsider attempted to interfere with the Armenian warrior, and for eighteen years Egypt prospered under his government. He rebuilt the walls of Cairo, and enlarged or built the three gates now called Bab Zawilah, Bab en Nasr, and Bab el Futûh. He also everywhere restored old mosques, and built new ones in Alexandria, in Cairo, and in the Island of Rhoda. One or two popular tumults broke out, but were sternly repressed, though one of them was headed by Bedr's own son.

Once more during this time the unfortunate Patriarch Christodulos was arrested and held responsible for a charge brought against another of his Metropolitans, the Archbishop of Abyssinia, who is called indifferently Abdun and Cyril—the latter being probably a name taken at his consecration. He was accused to Bedr of being on suspiciously friendly terms with the Moslems of that country, and tempting them to drink wine when they dined with him. Christodulos replied that, as it happened, he had not yet consecrated any Metropolitan for Abyssinia, but, as Cyril had been elected to that post, he was about to send Mercurius, Bishop of Wissim, to assist in the ceremony of consecration. Bedr yielded to the representations of the Patriarch, and permitted Mercurius to depart for that purpose. At this time the Moslem authorities in Egypt were so suspicious of the Patriarch's influence in the Christian kingdoms of the Soudan and Abyssinia that all letters sent between the Patriarchate and these countries were regularly opened, read, and forwarded or not, as the Moslem Government might choose. A year or two afterwards Christodulos died, and was buried in the church of Moallakah in Babylon, though his body was afterwards removed to Nitria. Since the destruction of the Patriarchal church of Dimrua, Christodulos had fixed his residence at Babylon, where, besides the old cathedral of Moallakah, he had raised St. Mercurius (Deyr Abu Sefayn) to the dignity of a Patriarchal church and residence. In Cairo also, in the Greek quarter, a church dedicated to the Virgin was made a Patriarchal church. The effect of this was to bring the churches in question, and the rights of jurisdiction, &c., belonging to them, directly under the Patriarch, instead of under the Bishop of Babylon. The latter prelate seems to have consented to this change in the time of Christodulos, though a subsequent bishop of that see contested the legitimacy of the proceeding.

Christodulos, it is clear, had won the respect of Bedr el Jamal; and his successor, a monk of Macarius, was received at Court with marked honour. He was even requested to bless the palace of the Kaliph, a ceremony which he performed in great state, and the Christians hoped for happier days. The new Patriarch had been called George by his parents, but on his elevation to the Patriarchal throne he took the name of Cyril II. Not long after his accession Solomon, the King of Nubia, abdicated his throne in favour of his nephew George,¹ and retired to a convent to spend the remainder of his life in prayer. But as he chose for this purpose Deyr Onuphrius, a desert church within the territory claimed by the governors of Assuan, the suspicions of the Moslems were again awakened. A band of soldiers was sent to surprise the convent, arrest the late king, and send him to Cairo. Whether during his march northwards representations were made to the Kaliph, or whether Bedr thought it an occasion on which his own predilections might safely be avowed, we know not; but as the regal monk neared Babylon, not only the Christians but the principal Moslem officials went out to welcome him with drums and trumpets, and he was escorted in a triumphal entry to the Wuzir. By Bedr he was received with much honour, and assigned a splendid house instead of the monastery which he desired. Nor was he allowed to leave the capital again until his death, which took place about a year afterwards.

A young Egyptian monk named Severus, of considerable learning, great ambition, and few scruples, at this time conceived the idea of becoming Metropolitan of Abyssinia. The see was not vacant, but, in spite of the mission of Mercurius, there seems to have been some informality in the consecration of Abdun or Cyril, which gave Severus what he conceived to be a fair excuse for trying to supplant him. He managed to ingratiate himself with Bedr, and not only promised a large bribe in return for the Wuzir's influence, but assured the Kaliph that, if elected to the see of Abyssinia, he would not only build four mosques in that country for the benefit of the Mohammedan settlers, but would do all he could to forward Moslem interests in Abyssinia. Bedr yielded to his representations, and issued a mandate to the Patriarch Cyril for his consecration as Metropolitan of Abyssinia, a command which Cyril weakly obeyed. Severus started at once for Axum, and, denouncing the irregular consecration of Abdun, declared that he had been sent to supersede him. Abdun was not sufficiently popular in the kingdom to contest the point, and fled to Dah'laka, where he was arrested, sent to Cairo, and beheaded; though on what pretext does not appear. Severus, though the means by which he obtained his elevation cannot be justified, seems to have done his best to reform the abuses of the Church in Abyssinia, which had become very great. In particular he tried his best to put an end to the practice of polygamy; for the Abyssinians have a strong Jewish element in their Christianity, and their standard of morality has always been fixed by the Old Testament rather than by the New. Moreover, they can fairly claim that polygamy is not forbidden even in the New Testament, except to bishops and deacons; though it is distinctly contrary to the spirit of Christ's teaching. In 1086 a dispute broke out between Cyril and his bishops, the origin of which is not very clear. Certain ecclesiastics—amongst whom are mentioned two bishops, whose sees however are not found in any authentic list of Egyptian bishoprics—had in some way given great offence to the rest of the bishops and also to the principal inhabitants of Babylon. The Patriarch was applied to, and entreated to pass sentence of excommunication against them. In the case of one individual he complied; in the case of the others he not only refused to do so, but retained them in their employments about his person. The bishops took the extraordinary step of presenting a petition to Bedr el Jamal through his head gardener, who was apparently a Christian, entreating him to interfere and compel their Patriarch to do as he had been asked. Cyril himself was absent at the time, visiting and consecrating some newly built churches.

¹ The throne of Nubia passed, not to the son of the reigning monarch, but to the son of his eldest sister.

The Wuzir, on receipt of the bishops' petition, issued a mandate desiring the Patriarch and all his bishops to assemble in a synod, at which he would preside. A list of the bishops who attended this meeting has been preserved, and seems to have included almost all those whose sees were in the Delta, and perhaps more than half of those in the Thebaid and Said. Twenty-seven are reckoned for the former, and twenty-two for the latter; but it is known that the real number of bishops in the southern provinces exceeded those of the Delta. The bishops of Babylon, Kandak (now a northern suburb of Cairo), and Gizeh were classed by themselves.

The synod met, as commanded, in a country house belonging to the Wuzir, outside Cairo. It was opened by an harangue from Bedr, in which he severely rebuked the bishops for insubordination and disloyalty towards their Patriarch. He then commanded both parties to draw up a statement of their case and submit it to him, after which he would deliver his judgment. They were then dismissed, and sent in the written statements which had been asked for. After three weeks, during which Bedr cut off the head of his gardener for unbecoming conduct to his Patriarch, he assembled them again, and informed them that his mind was made up. He had not read the statements of either party, and did not intend to do so; his duty was plain, and so was theirs: to live in love and peace, as became members of the same faith. He spoke to them at some length, pointing out that Christianity commanded charity, good faith, and brotherly love; and recommending them to practise these precepts rather than quote them. His duty was to afford them immunity and protection, and he had desired one of his officers to give them each a written document to that effect. At the close of his speech, which, whether dictated by policy or true religious feeling, must have overwhelmed his auditors with confusion, he dismissed the assembly.

Cyril and his bishops withdrew shame-stricken and evidently repentant; for they went at once to return thanks to God in the church of St. Mercurius, and on the following Saturday and Sunday they all solemnly received the Holy Communion in the same church in token of reconciliation. Cyril after this employed himself in drawing up some new canons, which were not, however, received as part of the Canon law of the Egyptian Church till after his death.

A great many Armenians settled in Egypt in the reign of Mustanzir—or, rather, of his able Armenian Wuzir—and Deyr Basatin, a Christian establishment still existing to the south of Cairo, was allotted to them as their headquarters. Abu Salih relates that the Emir who ruled Egypt on behalf of the Kaliph—and who must probably therefore have been Bedr el Jamal—rebuilt the principal church, and kept it in repair until his death, when he was buried in it. An Armenian Patriarch named Gregory was even consecrated (at Alexandria) for the Armenian Church in Egypt, and was received with great honour by the Egyptians. Cyril on this occasion issued a manifesto setting forth that the Churches of Egypt, Abyssinia, Nubia, Syria, and Armenia were united in bearing testimony to the ancient Catholic faith and in anathematising its corruptions, first by Nestorius and afterwards by Leo and the Council of Chalcedon.

Gregory consecrated an Armenian bishop of Itfeh, and the Armenian succession of Patriarchs in Egypt continued until the invasion of the Kurds at the close of the Fatimite dynasty and the consequent troubles. They always lived in cordial relations with the Egyptians, and the successor of Gregory was consecrated by the Egyptian Patriarch.

Whether the cordial agreement between the Armenians and Egyptians aroused the jealousy of the Moslems again or no, it was certainly followed by a change of policy which was sanctioned, though it may not have been approved, by Bedr. Severus had sent his brother with backsheesh to the Wuzir from Abyssinia ; but, instead of meeting with a cordial reception, Bedr reproached him with failing in his contract, and, as usual, held the Egyptian Patriarch responsible. Cyril was summoned, and came attended by two of his bishops to the Court. Bedr demanded why, when he consecrated a new Metropolitan for Abyssinia, he had not given the customary backsheesh to the Moslem Court, and why Severus had neglected to build the mosques which he had promised to erect in Abyssinia as a condition of his consecration. Without waiting for reply or defence, he declared that Cyril must at once send two of his own bishops to Abyssinia to enforce this being done, and until then the Patriarch and all the bishops with him should be kept in custody, and should pay each of them four pounds a day for their maintenance.

The Christians were struck with consternation, but before any action could be taken an embassy arrived from

Basil, King of Nubia, with presents for the Court of Cairo, and a request to the Egyptian Patriarch that he would consecrate one of their number, the son of the late king, as bishop (Metropolitan). Bedr, like other Fatimite Wuzirs before him, had learned that it was not safe to provoke Nubia, and this opportune arrival changed the face of affairs for the Christians. The Patriarch and his bishops, as well as the envoys from Abyssinia, were recalled; and the Wuzir's complaint stated with more courtesy, while the accused were allowed to answer. The ambassador from Abyssinia was eager to explain that, so far from his brother having neglected to fulfil the condition imposed upon him, he had, in fact, built seven mosques instead of the stipulated four. He went on to say, however, that the Abyssinians were so indignant at his proceedings, that they had risen in rebellion, had levelled all the seven mosques to the ground, and would have killed the Archbishop had he not been rescued out of their hands by the Emperor, who had, nevertheless, put him in prison. Bedr professed himself satisfied, and released his prisoners, but stipulated that the two bishops should be sent to Abyssinia to obtain permission from the Emperor for the rebuilding of the mosques. He sent with them an ambassador of his own to inform the Emperor that unless the mosques in question were permitted to stand, all the churches in Egypt should be thrown down. But he had met his match. The Emperor returned for reply that, if he dared such a deed, that if in Egypt one single stone of God's temples were touched, he would himself send to the Court of Cairo every single brick and stone of Mecca; and that with so thorough a destruction of the city that, if but one brick should be wanting, he would supply its weight in gold. The Kaliph had already revived the law which compelled all Christians and Jews to wear a black girdle, and the extra poll-tax from which they had been lately free, but he did not venture in face of Abyssinia and the Christian kingdoms of the Soudan to proceed with any overt act of persecution. Cyril spent the rest of his life in peace, restoring churches and relieving the poor of his communion. In this time, the use of the Arabic language became so common among the Copts that the Patriarch thought it his duty to learn it.

He died in the year 1092 (A.H. 485), and was succeeded by Michael IV., or Michael the Hermit. Before his consecration, however, the bishops insisted on his signing not only the usual bond for the continuance of the stipend to the Chapter of Alexandria, and a solemn promise to abstain from taking fees for ordinations and consecrations, but a Confession of Faith and a resignation of the rights over certain churches in Babylon and Cairo which had been first assumed by Christodulos. Michael promised to observe all these conditions, though indeed, without the ordination fees, it had become almost impossible for a Patriarch to pay the yearly sum demanded by the grasping Chapter of Alexandria. The first condition which he broke, however, was the one most easy for him to fulfil. When Shenouda, the Bishop of Babylon, applied for the restoration of the said churches, the Patriarch flatly denied that he had ever promised to resign them.

‘But,’ exclaimed Shenouda, in amazement, ‘I have the deed, and the witnesses to the deed.’

‘But I,’ answered the Patriarch, ‘will excommunicate anyone who ventures to come forward in that character against me.’

The Chapter of Alexandria, as one of the interested parties, had also a copy of the fourfold agreement which Michael had signed, and another was in the possession of the Bishop of Xoïs (Sakka), as the oldest prelate on the Egyptian Bench. By threats and promises Michael got back these two copies into his own possession; but the Bishop of Babylon refused to give up his, and finally left the city and retired to a monastery. As the Ecclesiastical Court of Babylon was, from its nearness to the Moslem capital, the most important of all, great inconvenience was occasioned by the absence of the bishop, and the citizens addressed so strong a representation to Michael that he permitted Shenouda to return and exercise his functions without further remark.

The strong rule of Bedr el Jamal prevented actual outbreak of either Christians or Moslems for the remainder of his life, but he died in 1094 (A.H. 487),¹ and not many days afterwards was followed to the grave by the feeble Kaliph, whose nominal reign had lasted sixty years. Little good is known of Mustanzir, but in the earlier part of his life his pleasures were not solely vicious ones. He showed some love of literature and art, in particular of the art of painting, though even in this it seems to have been his Wuzir Yazouri rather than himself who was the patron of artists. There were two of some note in Egypt at this time, Kasir and Ebn Aziz; the latter was a Persian whom Yazouri had invited to Egypt. These painters were often pitted against one another, but in their greatest competition, where each painted the figure of a dancer on a different panel of the same wall, they were declared equal, and the same rewards were given to each.

¹ He seems to have been buried as a Christian in the Armenian church at Basajin. (See Abu Salih.)

The prohibition against making the likeness of man never seems to have been seriously regarded by the majority of the Moslems in Egypt, except when they wanted an excuse for destroying or insulting the sacred pictures of the Christians.

CHAPTER XVIII

EFFECTS OF THE FIRST CRUSADE IN EGYPT

A.D. 1096
A.M. 812
A.H. 490

THE nominal successor of Mustanzir was his second son, Ahmed Abu el Kasim Mostali b' Allah; the real successor was the second son of the able Armenian who had governed Egypt for twenty years. From this time till the extinction of the Fatimite dynasty the Kaliphs took little or no part in public life. They lived in the seclusion of their palaces, surrounded by every Oriental luxury, showing themselves on rare and stated occasions to the people, who were taught to look upon the mysterious Kaliph almost as a God. While, however, the forms of absolute power were maintained with elaborate ceremony, the real government remained in the hands of successive Wuzirs. It is not known why the eldest son of Mustanzir was passed over in favour of Mustali; in the case of Bedr his eldest son had revolted against him in his lifetime, and had thus forfeited all right to succeed his father. In every way the second son, Shahin Shah el Alfdal was better qualified for the government of Egypt than his brother; and almost the first thing he had to do was to crush a revolt among the Moslems headed by Mustanzir's eldest son. He next turned his attention to the recovery of Syria, which had been overrun by different Turkish adventurers, and succeeded in re-establishing the authority of the Egyptian Kaliph in Jerusalem. But the cruelties of the Turks during the twenty years of their occupation of the sacred city had tried the patience of Western Christendom too far; and the sins of the Ortokide Turks were visited on the head of the Fatimite Arabs. The Patriarch of Jerusalem had been dragged by the hair through the streets of that city and thrown into prison until a sufficient ransom was paid by his flock, and the clergy of every rank and sect were exposed to constant insult and oppression. It is true that far greater evils had been suffered by the Christians in Egypt under both Turkish and Arab dynasties without a single protest from the Christian empires of East or West. But the rumour of these atrocities had hardly penetrated so far. Since the conquest of Egypt by the Moslems, Europe had almost forgotten her existence; moreover, the Egyptians were heretics, and consequently the 'Christianity' of those ages had no Christian feeling for them. Probably even the ill-treatment of the Greek Patriarch in Jerusalem would not have in itself aroused any active resentment. But when a great Latin pilgrimage of 7,000 people, headed by four bishops, met with such ill-treatment that only 2,000 poverty-stricken individuals returned to their Western homes; when the humblest pilgrim was no longer safe from insult and robbery in the sacred city, the fighting nations of the West burned with indignation. The preaching of Peter the Hermit fell on a soil well prepared, and in the same year that saw the Fatimite dynasty re-established in Jerusalem the Council of Clermont proclaimed the crusade which was to liberate the Holy City from the yoke of the Infidel.

The melancholy story and the varying fortunes of the immediately called upon to suppress another revolt in favour of the child's uncle.

Early in 1102 the Metropolitan of Abyssinia died, and an embassy was sent to the Patriarch Michael for another. A monk named George was accordingly consecrated and sent to Abyssinia, but he developed the sin of avarice to such an extent that there was a popular outbreak against him. The Emperor compelled him to disgorge all his ill-gotten gains and sent him back to Egypt, where he was thrown into prison by El Alfdal. The last acts of the Patriarch Michael were in keeping with all the rest that we know of him. He seems to have left Shenouda, Bishop of Babylon, in peace for some years; but now, for some unexplained cause, the old quarrel was revived and Michael determined to get rid of him.

He summoned a synod of the bishops and denounced Shenouda on a fresh and very curious charge. He declared that the Bishop of Babylon had, in the lifetime of the late Patriarch Cyril, celebrated the Holy Communion twice in one day, and for this infringement of canonical rule had been excommunicated by him. Cyril died before he had absolved the bishop; consequently Shenouda was still excommunicated and ipso facto deprived of all rightful claim to his office. Whatever the bishops may have thought of their Patriarch's conduct in this raking up an ancient irregularity against the bishop after ten years had elapsed, and refusing to confirm the absolution which Cyril had doubtless prepared, they could not apparently dispute his facts, and most unwillingly subscribed their assent. Michael at once cited Shenouda to appear before the synod and receive sentence of deposition; but Shenouda refused to appear, and hid himself in a private house at Babylon.

Michael proceeded to take possession of one of the churches concerned in the original dispute—St. Sergius and St. Bacchus of Babylon. On the following day the Wuzir El Alfdal was returning to Cairo from some expedition, and the Patriarch went out in state to meet and congratulate him. Hardly had he returned home, however, when he was seized with the plague and died on the following day.¹

His successor was not elected till September, as the bishops found it difficult to choose between two candidates both of the monastery of Macarius. One was under the canonical age of fifty, so they ultimately decided in favour of the other, whose name was Macarius. He was not at all anxious for the honour, and pleaded that he also was canonically ineligible, being the offspring of a second marriage. But on inquiry it was found that it was the second marriage of his father and not his mother, so his excuse was disallowed. The next difficulty was with the rapacious Alexandrians, who as usual demanded that the Patriarch elect should sign the bond which assured them their yearly pension. Macarius refused to bind himself to that or any sum, but promised to give them as much as the present condition of the Church would allow. When they persisted and tried to bully him, as they had been accustomed with former Patriarchs, Macarius quietly left them and set about his return to the monastic life. Eventually the Alexandrians had to content themselves with his written promise to pay them less than one half of the original pension, and Macarius reluctantly assumed the office to which he was called.

¹ Makrizi tells a very curious story of this Patriarch. He declares that during the lifetime of Mustanzir, the Nile failing again, the Kaliph sent the Patriarch up through the Soudan to Abyssinia to try and discover the cause. The King of Abyssinia came to meet him, and asked the reason of his coming. 'The Patriarch then told him that there lacked water in the Nile, and that the people of Egypt suffered on that account. Then the king ordered a certain enclosed valley whence the Nile flows into Egypt to be opened. No sooner was this done than the Nile rose three yards in one night, and went on rising until it overflowed the country and the crops. Then the Patriarch returned, and El Mustanzir bestowed on him a robe of honour, and otherwise treated him well.'

Next year Acre was taken by storm after a long siege, and fell into the hands of the Crusaders. The people of Tripoli were so hard pressed by the Count of St. Giles that they appealed to Egypt for help, and though El Alfdal despatched a fleet to their assistance it was too late; Tripoli, after an obstinate resistance, was taken by storm in the year 1110 (A.H. 503). Hardly any possessions were now left to Egypt in Syria, and El Alfdal was well aware that only dissensions among the Crusaders saved Egypt from an invasion. The Christians of Egypt, on the contrary, looked with rising hope on the struggle in Syria; though the National Church could expect but little mercy at the hands of the Latin Christians had they conquered. Indeed, Baldwin, who had succeeded Godfrey in the kingdom of Jerusalem, shortly took a step which removed all doubt of his intentions. He obtained from Pope Pascal in 1116 a bull whereby all the new conquests from the Moslems were annexed to the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Armed with this authority, Baldwin in the year 1117 (A.H. 511) began his invasion of Egypt. He laid siege to Farama, the Moslem city which had risen near the ruins of the ancient Pelusium. When it fell into his hand he put most of the inhabitants to the sword, and burnt all the mosques of the city. But immediately after his first success he became so seriously ill that the project of conquest had to be given up. He set out on his return to Jerusalem, but died while still in Egypt, before he had even reached the frontier at El Arish.

For the rest of the life of Alfdal Egypt remained at peace, and the Christians were exempt from persecution. The Kaliph Amr, who was now nearly thirty-five, grew restless in the Oriental seclusion and luxury which had kept him a cypher in his own kingdom. Instead, however, of openly announcing his determination to rule, he had recourse to the usual Oriental methods of asserting himself. He hired some of the sect of the Assassins who were then spreading terror through Syria to fall upon his great Wuzir and murder him secretly. The deed was done, but a few years afterwards Amr himself perished in the same way, and while El Alfdal left a son to succeed him in the real government of the country, Amr left no male heir, and his cousin Abd el Mejid ebn el Kasim el Hafiz le dyn Illah, known as Hafiz, took the kingdom.¹

Shortly before the death of El Alfdal there was a terrible earthquake shock in Egypt, which was felt most severely in the city of Babylon. Among the casualties, it was found afterwards that the church of El Mokhta, in the island of Rhoda, was thrown down, though some, says Makrizi, suspected El Alfdal of having taken the opportunity to demolish it 'because it stood in his garden.'

The Egyptian government continued to be carried on chiefly by a series of assassinations, in which, among others, both the son and grandson of El Alfdal perished; but while the Moslems thus quarrelled among themselves, the ¹ It was Alfdal who, in the year 1107 A.D., forbade the use of the solar year in all public or official transactions.

Christians still enjoyed security. Macarius, whose honourable reign lasted more than twenty-four years, died in 1129, and for more than two years the Patriarchate remained vacant for some unexplained reason. Even when the synod met to elect a successor it found itself composed entirely of priests, deacons, and laity, no bishop having answered the summons, and consequently they were unable to proceed. Some of them undertook the journey to St. Macarius to seek advice in these unusual circumstances. Eventually a man named Gabriel was elected (called in Arabic, Abu-el-ala-Said ebn Tarik), who was of an old Coptic family and had passed much of his life as a layman in Government service. Having retired or been dismissed, he became a deacon of the church of St. Sergius in Babylon, where he was greatly respected for his learning and piety. He knew Arabic as well as Coptic, and was a great collector of manuscripts. About this time the distracted Kaliph had put an end to the quarrels among his Moslem subjects for the post of Wuzir by appointing a Christian Armenian, brother to the Patriarch of the Armenians, and this greatly bettered the position of the Christians. But after a few years, though no one questioned the ability and good government of this Wuzir, whose name is given differently in different histories, the jealousy of the Moslems was inflamed to such a pitch that a popular riot broke out on the pretext that the whole country would become Christian if Christians were to be openly favoured in this manner.

The revolt was headed by a man named Rodowan, who claimed the office of Wuzir for himself. The Christian who held it, and who is called Taj ed Doula by the Christians, declared that he would not be the cause of bloodshed or strife betwixt Moslem and Christian, and resigned his post. He retired into the Thebaid intending to take refuge with another brother who was governor of Kus or Kusae. But Rodowan was beforehand with him, and excited a tumult against the Christians in the city of Kus. When Taj ed Doula arrived he found that his brother had been barbarously murdered, and the inhabitants refused to receive him. At first Taj ed Doula proposed to lay siege to the city with his followers, but abandoning the idea he dismissed his friends and went away alone to embrace the monastic life.

Meanwhile Rodowan made a triumphal procession through the fourfold city of Masr and Babylon, and allowed his troops to sack the houses of the Christians wherever found. His first acts were to restore the disabilities of the Christians, to dismiss the whole regiment of Christian officials who carried on the business of the government, and to double all the taxes paid by them. But just as in the early days no Moslem could build a mosque without stealing the pillars of the Christian churches to uphold it; so no Moslem Government has ever been able to exist without the support of the despised Christians. The measures of Rodowan defeated his own policy, anarchy reigned supreme, and a counter-revolution soon drove him from his office, though not before he had done his best to ruin the country and slain a great number of the Armenians who, since the time of Bedr el Jamal, had settled in Egypt.

The Kaliph, utterly unable to restore order, sent to beg Taj ed Doula to return to office; but the latter replied that it was impossible, since he was now a monk. He consented, however, to return to Court, where he lived in monastic retirement and aided in the conduct of affairs only by his advice.

The Armenians in Egypt were still a numerous and influential body, with a Patriarch of their own. On his death they begged Gabriel to consecrate the Bishop of Atfih, an Armenian and the brother of Taj ed Doula, to succeed him. Gabriel, evidently uncertain whether his compliance might not be regarded as a schismatical act by the National Church of Armenia, excused himself from doing so; but made no protest when some of his bishops, on being applied to by the Armenians, consented to perform the ceremony. In all cases we find Gabriel anxious to abstain from even the appearance of evil. Many deeply religious Patriarchs, though refusing to exact ordination fees, accepted them when offered after the ceremony. But though Gabriel, during his sixteen years' reign, consecrated no fewer than fifty-three bishops, he refused in every case to accept the presents offered.

In his time an embassy arrived from the Emperor of Abyssinia charged with important letters both to the Kaliph and the Patriarch of Egypt. It has been mentioned that the Metropolitan, or Archbishop, of Abyssinia was not allowed to have more than seven bishops under him for the whole kingdom. This number had been fixed, it must be feared, with the express purpose of making it impossible for the Abyssinian Church to throw off her dependence on the Mother Church of Alexandria. For, by the canons common to both Egypt and Abyssinia, a minimum number of twelve bishops was required for the legitimate consecration of a Patriarch; this ceremony, therefore, could never be performed by the Abyssinians themselves; and even a Metropolitan could not be consecrated without the consent of the Patriarch of Alexandria. In the old times the Metropolitan elect journeyed himself to Egypt to receive consecration, but for some time now it had been the custom to choose an Egyptian in Egypt for the post.

In the days when communication between the Christian kingdoms of Africa had been comparatively safe and rapid, the inconveniences attending such a state of things had been little regarded. But the present Emperor, observing that seven bishops were not enough for the needs of his kingdom, had suggested to his Metropolitan to consecrate more, and had received for answer that he was forbidden by the canons to do so without the consent of the Patriarch of Alexandria. This consent the Emperor undertook to obtain, and hence the present embassy, in which he strongly urged both upon the Kaliph and the Patriarch the need of more bishops, and begged that all restrictions as to their number might be removed. The Kaliph, who, since the flight of Rodowan, had endeavoured, with the informal help of Taj ed Doula, to govern Egypt himself, sent for the Patriarch Gabriel and directed him to return a favourable answer to the Emperor's request. But Gabriel firmly refused, and pointed out the inevitable consequence of such a step: that Abyssinia, having a sufficient number of bishops to do so, would next proceed to elect a Patriarch of her own, and sever her connection with Egypt. No doubt Gabriel believed himself to be doing right in thus preventing what he would have looked upon as schism, but by his refusal he inflicted a serious blow upon the Church in Abyssinia, and prevented its reform or development.

Gabriel issued thirty canons, which became part of the canon law of the Copts. One of these forbids ecclesiastics of all degrees to attend games or dances; another forbids a custom then prevalent in Upper Egypt of spending the day of a wedding in games and dances and putting off the religious ceremony until the evening. By these canons it is also forbidden to pray for the dead on Sunday; to administer baptism during the public service of the church; to bury the dead within the churches; and the twenty-fourth canon enjoins that priests are in future to have no women residing in their houses except their wives, mothers, sisters, aunts, and grandmothers. We find no mention of daughters, but may conclude that they were among the privileged classes of such women.

Gabriel died in 1146, and his successor was chosen by the ceremony of the Heikel held at Babylon. The lot fell upon a monk of blameless life, but so ignorant that he could not read either Coptic or Arabic. This, however, does not seem to have been regarded as a disqualification, especially as he knew the services of the Church by heart; and his public entry into Babylon was solemnised with more than the usual pomp. But barely three months afterwards he was poisoned—it is said by one of his own monks, who could not endure the strictness of his discipline. One of the other two candidates at his election, whose name was John, was consecrated in his place.

In 1148 a new crusade was proclaimed, and excited fresh alarm among the Saracens. But it was a melancholy failure, and Egypt was suddenly confronted with a much more pressing danger from Northern Africa, where the Normans, under their Count Roger, made good their footing, and whence they threatened Alexandria. At the same time Rodowan suddenly appeared in Masr, and, calling on all the discontented to join him, he made himself master of all four cities, and Hafiz shut himself up in his palace without resistance. But Rodowan was slain by one of his own following, and the danger of invasion from Pentapolis also passed away. Shortly afterwards Hafiz died, leaving four sons, the eldest of whom was named Ismail ebn Mansur el Zafir l'Amr Allah, commonly called Zafir.

CHAPTER XIX

THE SCHISM OF MARK EBN KUNBAR

A.D. 1149
 A.M. 865
 A.H. 544

ZAFIR—or Dafer, as the name is sometimes spelt—was only eighteen when he came to the throne, and he devoted himself to a life of pleasure, leaving the government of the country to his Wuzir. This was a man named Abbas, who after some hard fighting among the Moslems for the office succeeded in murdering his successful rival and making himself supreme in the country. Zafir might have spent as long and useless a life as Mustanzir in his pursuit of the degrading pleasures which were all he cared for, if he could but have refrained from violating the family honour of his powerful Wuzir. But not even consideration for his own safety could restrain his lusts, and within four years he and his two next brothers were slain at a banquet to which Abbas had invited them. The little one, Issa, who was but five years old, was spared, but the shock of seeing his brother's corpses reduced him to a state of semi-idiocy. He was proclaimed Kaliph under the names of El Favez-nasr-Allah, but Abbas soon found that he had gone too far. The troops, and particularly the negro battalions, declared against him, and summoned an Emir named Thalai (also spelt Talahia or Thelay), the Governor of Minieh, to the Wuzirate.

Abbas, finding himself deserted, fled with all the treasure he could lay hands upon to Syria. The sister of Zahir betrayed him to the Franks, who fell upon his party, carried off all his treasure, and either killed Abbas on the spot or sent him back to Zahir's sister to be executed in Egypt.

Thalai assumed charge of the infant Kaliph and the kingdom, but his ambition was not satisfied with the title of Wuzir. He called himself Melek-el-Saleh ("the Blessed King"), but he did not do much to justify this title. The Eastern Delta was at this time greatly harassed by plundering incursions of the Frank garrisons of Askelon and Gaza. Thalai did not venture to expose his troops to meet them in open field, so he purchased peace by the payment of tribute to the King of Jerusalem. He also oppressed the Christians considerably, and did them one injury which, more than actual persecution, aroused their horror and indignation.

The village of Matarieh had been regarded as sacred since the time that the Holy Family had rested there on their way to Babylon. Pilgrims came there from all parts of the world (we have a very interesting account of a pilgrimage undertaken by a European in this century), but it was also famed for its balsam gardens, which to a certain extent shared its sanctity, and the unfailing spring of pure water which was regarded as the miraculous gift of Jesus. The place, like Babylon on the south, was a pre-eminently Christian district, and a line of churches stood on the route from Matarieh to Cairo. Thalai took by force one dedicated to St. George, close to Matarieh, and turned it into a mosque.

The National Church was a good deal exercised at this time about certain questions of ritual. The monks of one district had added the words 'life-giving' to the Holy Communion service, and the bishop of their diocese (Samanhoud) objected to the innovation and wrote to the Patriarch about it. John called a synod to discuss the matter, and it was decided that there was no harm in the addition of the words, and that the use of them should be permitted. This question was speedily and amicably settled, but another controversy shortly broke out which had more serious consequences.

The question related both to the use of incense and the practice of confession. In the first three centuries of Christianity the use of incense in churches was not permitted, because it savoured too much of the practices of paganism. But for sanitary reasons it was afterwards introduced, and the people in the churches were regularly fumigated to minimise the chances of infection in such mixed gatherings. The first religious sanction we find of its use is in the benediction which the priest pronounced over it before it was carried round the church for that purpose: 'May the Lord bless this incense to the extinction of every noxious stench, and kindle it to the odour of its sweetness.' This benediction is not found in any liturgy earlier than the fifth century; but in the sixth century the practice had assumed a religious aspect and been given a symbolic meaning. It was supposed to represent the ascension of prayer from the churches of the earth to the throne of God, and the priest is further directed to say: 'Let my prayer be set forth in Thy sight as the incense.' The practice of private confession to a priest, though older in the Eastern Churches than in the Western, was not enjoined as a religious obligation, except for a short time in the fourth century. It was found that the public confession of sins to the congregation in church, which was the earliest practice, often gave rise to grave scandals and sometimes to fresh crimes. For instance, St. Basil forbade a woman who had confessed to him that she had been guilty of adultery to acknowledge her sin in church, lest her husband should murder her. Private confession grew up first in this way: if Christians were troubled by consciousness of unacknowledged sins, they sought counsel of their priest, and he determined which faults should be acknowledged openly to the congregation and which should be confessed to God alone. It then gradually obtained that a particular priest should be attached to the principal churches for the purpose of hearing such confessions. But in the Eastern Church, of which the Egyptian Church was then part, this office was formally abolished at the close of the fourth century. In the Egyptian Church private confessions continued to be heard by the priest; but there was no absolute rule on the subject, nor was it ever a necessary preliminary to the reception of the sacraments. Indeed, the only time in a man's life when it was formally required of him was before his marriage, since marriage in the East is equivalent to attaining his majority. Before that time he is a minor, and presumably therefore in a state of baptismal innocence. Still, confession of sins after marriage was generally required before reception of the Holy Communion, whether to a priest in private or in the church. And in the church, after public and general confession by the priest in the name of the whole congregation, the people remained on their knees, confessing silently to God the particular sins of which they knew themselves to be guilty. During this time the fumigating process went on, the censor being carried all round the church. In course of time, assisted no doubt by the symbolic utterances of the priests, the incense came to be regarded as an essential part of the confession—the vehicle, as it were, through which it ascended to God. By the twelfth century a curious custom had grown up peculiar to the Egyptian Church, by which the censor had taken the place of the priest even in private confession, which occasionally, as happens everywhere, was the cause of scandal, and was looked upon with suspicion by the more respectable laity, particularly where their womenkind were concerned. It had become customary therefore that confession should be made solemnly by the individual on his knees and in the solitude of his chamber before a lighted censor. The incense ascended to God, and was supposed in some special way to call down upon the penitent the absolution and forgiveness of God.

It was this custom which was fiercely attacked by an Egyptian priest in the reign of John V. The name of the 'reformer' was Mark, generally called Ebn Kunbar, to distinguish him from the Mark who shortly afterwards became Patriarch.¹ He was a priest in the province of Said, though he had been ordained by the Bishop of Damietta, and, being a man of great eloquence, he attracted crowds by his preaching. His exhortations, however, had more to do with the mode of repentance and confession than with the duty itself. He constantly and urgently denounced the practice of private confession before a lighted censor, and assured his hearers that auricular confession to a priest and absolution through the priest were absolutely necessary to salvation. As the customary practice of confession before the censor had been formally sanctioned by the Patriarch himself, this crusade of Mark's against it gave great offence to the bishops and the educated members of the Church; and they appealed to the Patriarch to excommunicate him. As John seems to have hesitated to take so extreme a step against a man merely to punish a rash and inconsiderate zeal for older customs, charges against Mark's private character were brought forward. The Patriarch was informed that Mark had put away his wife and taken monastic vows, not for any fault on her part, but so that she might not stand in the way of his ambition, since married priests were not available for bishoprics. The Patriarch appears to have satisfied himself that the fact was correct—the motive, of course, could only be matter of conjecture—and on this ground he pronounced sentence of excommunication against Mark.

¹ A full and interesting account of Mark ebn Kunbar will be found in Abu Salih, pp. 20 to 48 of the translation.

To the amazement of the Church, Mark, the upholder of sacerdotal authority, took no notice of the excommunication. He continued to preach to the people, who flocked to him in such multitudes that there seemed danger of a great schism from the Church. He further attacked the custom of circumcision, which had prevailed in Egypt from the earliest times, and declared it to be a relic of Judaism, contrary to the Apostolic precepts. He was regarded almost as a prophet by the common people of the Said, and his name was in all men's mouths.

At this crisis the Patriarch died, and was succeeded by Mark called Ebn Zaara, to distinguish him from his popular contemporary of the same name. On his accession the bishops of Upper Egypt wrote a memorial to him concerning Mark ebn Kunbar, who was holding revival meetings all over the country in open defiance of all spiritual authority. The new Patriarch summoned Mark ebn Kunbar to Cairo, and personally remonstrated with him on the error of his ways. Mark was touched by the Patriarch's exhortations, and flung himself at his namesake's feet, promising amendment for the future. He was then apparently released from excommunication and sent back to his work. But the persuasions of the multitudes who thronged to welcome his return were too much for him. He was rather in the position of a Dissenting minister who knows that he ought not to attack the Established Church, but who also knows that to abstain will sacrifice his reputation and his influence and leave him without a congregation. He very soon therefore recommenced his sermons on the absolute necessity of priestly confession and absolution, and the people again flocked to hear him, bringing him not only presents of money and produce, but paying to him their tithes and Church dues instead of to the lawful authorities.

The Patriarch summoned a synod to consider the matter, and sixty bishops assembled for that purpose. Their unanimous vote was for the deposition and excommunication of the rebellious priest. Then Mark ebn Kunbar took a step which he must afterwards have bitterly regretted ; he appealed to the Moslem authorities, declaring in the memorial which he presented to them that he had preached nothing contrary to the canons, and demanding that the case should be tried before them. The Moslems were very ready to interfere, but the Patriarch and his bishops absolutely refused to acknowledge their jurisdiction. They were, however, willing to meet the view of Mark ebn Kunbar so far as seemed consistent with their religion, and consented to accept the arbitration of Michael the Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch.

Michael endeavoured to treat the question with courtesy and fairness, and succeeded in displeasing both parties. He suggested that the one side depreciated, the other exaggerated, the importance of auricular confession; and while writing with all deference to the Egyptian Patriarch evidently suggested concessions on both sides. This led to a temporary coolness between Antioch and Alexandria; while on the other side Mark ebn Kunbar, finding that Michael of Antioch would not support him in his defiance of authority, did not wait for the sentence of deposition, but went over to the Melkite (or Greek) Church in Egypt with a large number of his followers. But the Greek Church was at a very low ebb; her Patriarchs had no real power in the country, and spent most of their time at the Court of Constantinople, leaving their scanty flock to sink lower and lower in superstition and ignorance. Mark ebn Kunbar did not meet with the appreciation he expected, and before very long he submitted himself to his own Patriarch and begged to be received back into the National Church. Mark ebn Zaara received him with affectionate welcome and granted him absolution. But Mark ebn Kunbar soon became aware that by his recent action he had lost all his power. The strongest feeling of a respectable Copt is unswerving loyalty to his National Church; and Mark was no longer to them a hero and a reformer, but a traitor. Mark could not bear it, and went back again to the Greek Church; then, not many months afterwards, returned again with penitence to his own Patriarch. This time, however, Mark ebn Zaara was firm. He refused to admit his namesake again to the Church which he had thrice betrayed, and Mark ebn Kunbar fell into complete obscurity. Nothing more is known of him except that he did not die for many years after his moral suicide.¹

These years were very eventful ones for Egypt. In 1160 (A.H. 555) the Kaliph Fayez died at the age of eleven years, and Thalai caused a boy of about the same age, grandson of Hafiz, but by no means the next heir according to the Moslem law of succession, to be proclaimed in his stead. The power of the Fatimites had long departed, and this child—Abd Allah el Adid el din Allah—was the last who bore even the barren title of Kaliph. Thalai was henceforth recognised as the Sultan of Babylon, and the very name of the Kaliph was unknown to the Crusaders.

¹ It was not till the reign of Pope Innocent III. of Rome that auricular confession to a priest was declared an essential doctrine of the Western Church. Innocent III. was elected Pope in 1198. It has never been declared essential in the Egyptian Church.

CHAPTER XX

THE BURNING OF BABYLON

A.D. 1160
A.M. 876
A.H. 555

THE Sultan Thalai did not survive Favez more than a year. He was assassinated by order of the late Kaliph's sister, and on his death the usual struggle for the kingdom took place. His own son held it for a short time, but the two principal candidates were the Emirs Dargham and Shawer (also spelt Shauer, Chaouer, Chauer, Sauer, and Siwa by different writers). Eventually Dargham established himself as supreme ruler, and Shawer fled the country, though he did not give up his ambitious designs. He sought refuge at the court of Damascus, where a new and warlike dynasty of Turks had established themselves early in the century. The present Sultan was Nour-ed-din, who had extended his conquests on every side and was the most formidable enemy of the Crusaders. These Turks acknowledged the Abbaside Kaliph at Baghdad, and would therefore have no scruple about invading the dominions of the Fatimite Kaliph, even had they not been invited to do so by the fugitive Shawer. Nour-ed-din readily agreed to send an army into Egypt, and committed the command to Shiracouh (Chiracou, Chyrkouch, Shirkoh, or Siracou), a general of great ability, who was a Kurd by nationality. With him went his elder brother Ayoub and the son of the latter, Yusef Saleh-ed-din. As a reward for the services they were to render him, Shower promised to pay Nour-ed-din one-third of the revenues of Egypt when he was established on his throne.

Dargham was already very unpopular in Egypt from the numbers of judicial murders he had committed and an unsuccessful expedition which he had just concluded against the Franks. Amaury (or Amalric), King of Jerusalem, had demanded from him a continuance of the tribute which Thalai had paid to Baldwin of Jerusalem, and, the money not being immediately forthcoming, had invaded Egypt with a numerous army. Dargham met the Franks not far from the frontier, and, being defeated by them, fell back upon Belbeis. Here he cut the banks and inundated the country between himself and the Franks, who were preparing to withdraw when the Moslem army of Shiracouh made its appearance. Dargham, justly dreading a junction of the two armies against himself, sent to Amaury, promising him double the tribute in future if he would help him now against the Sultan of Damascus. But before the negotiation was concluded Shiracouh fell suddenly upon the army of Dargham, which was entirely routed. Dargham fled to Cairo, but was overtaken and killed in the suburbs. As usual, the inhabitants of Egypt proper cared little for the particular oppressor who might rule in Cairo, and Shower found himself at once master of the kingdom. In fact, he believed himself so strong that he refused to fulfil the promises he had made to the Damascene Turks, and desired them to withdraw from the country. On this Shiracouh did indeed break up his camp before Cairo, but only to overrun the province of Sharkieh and seize Belbeis. His troops, let loose upon the unfortunate Egyptians, committed the most barbarous excesses on Moslem and Christian alike. In adopting the religion of his conquerors the Moslem Copt had lost his faith and his nationality, without acquiring the one attribute of his conquerors which would have been useful to him—the capacity for fighting. No attempt was made by the men of either religion to defend their homes or the honour of their wives ; their crops were destroyed, their houses sacked, and hundreds of them carried off to be sold for slaves. It was only when their faith was attacked that the Christians found courage to defy their enemies, and many on this occasion joyfully suffered martyrdom at the hands of the Turks.

Shawer sent to the Frankish army, who had withdrawn into Syria, to invite their help in expelling Shiracouh. Amaury readily responded, invaded Egypt for the second time, and laid siege to Belbeis. After two months spent thus, intelligence was brought to the besieging army that Nour-ed-din himself with a numerous army was marching to the relief of his general. This news caused the Franko-Egyptian army to offer Shiracouh a free passage out of the country on condition that he gave up all his prisoners ; and Shiracouh, who had heard nothing of the approach of Nour-ed-din, found it best to accept the terms. He retired into Syria, and for a brief space Egypt had respite ; but all that Shiracouh had seen of the fertility and natural wealth which not even centuries of bad government had been able to destroy, only the more inflamed him with the determination to possess so fair a kingdom. On the other hand, the Franks also had learned that a country far better worth having than Syria lay open to the strong man armed.

In 1166 they were all in Egypt again. The Franks had attempted to stop the advance of Shiracouh in Syria ; but by a forced march through the desert the latter eluded the forces of Amaury, and the armies entered Egypt almost at the same moment.

Shawer, seeing himself thus menaced, chose, as before, to ally himself with the Franks rather than with his co-religionists. The Frankish army was admitted within the gates of Cairo, and were promised a very large sum of money if they would assist in expelling the Turks. But the Franks had by this time become aware that there was a mysterious power behind Shawer, who could at will annul all promises made by the Sultan-Wuzir, and they insisted on having the compact ratified in the presence of the Kaliph himself. Shawer did all in his power to prevent this. The Kaliph was represented as far too sacred a person to be beheld by any but true believers ; but the blunt determination of the Franks cut through all the wiles of Oriental courtesy, and the demand was grudgingly conceded.

The ambassadors chosen were Hugh of Cæsarea, Geoffrey Ffoulkes, a Knight Templar, and several other nobles, from one of whom William of Tyre took his description of the scene. Everything had been done to dazzle and astonish the Frankish barbarians ; one long corridor after another was traversed between lines of black soldiers and eunuchs. The treasures which had been collected since the loss of everything by Mustanzir were displayed—precious stones as large as hens' eggs, exquisite vases of glass and china, and beautiful embroideries. A silken curtain concealed the entrance to the sacred presence chamber, before which the Sultan-Wuzir, who conducted the ambassadors, prostrated himself three times, and yielded up his sword. Then they were permitted to enter, and the Kaliph, duly instructed in his part, agreed to the proposed terms. But a further indignity awaited him. These barbarian strangers, who had insisted on disturbing the sacred presence, further demanded 'his hand on the bargain.' Explanation and entreaty were of no avail, the sacred hand had to be bared and laid in the rude clasp of the Frank ambassadors, who then consented to withdraw.

Meanwhile under cover of the night Shiracouh had crossed the Nile and marched down to Gizeh, where he entrenched himself opposite Cairo—or, rather, opposite Fostat. Amaury attempted to bridge the river with boats, which the troops of Shiracouh destroyed as fast as they were made; and these desultory hostilities went on for fifty days. At the end of them Shiracouh broke up his camp and marched into Upper Egypt, which submitted to him without a blow. Amaury went after him, leaving a strong garrison in Cairo; but in the battle which followed, Shiracouh was victorious. Amaury fell back on Cairo, and Shiracouh ravaged Upper and Lower Egypt at his pleasure. A year had gone by in these hostilities, and the Franks of Syria, hearing that Amaury had occupied Cairo, proposed to join him and take possession of the kingdom of Egypt at their leisure. This news disposed both Shiracouh and Shower to come to terms and combine against the Franks. Shiracouh agreed to evacuate the kingdom and to restore the city of Alexandria, which he had garrisoned with his own troops under the command of his nephew Saleh-ed-din. With the promise of 100,000 dinars (about £60,000) Amaury was bribed to withdraw, and went back with most of his army into Syria, leaving a garrison in Cairo until the money should be paid. But he found the Franks of Syria indignant that the chance of conquering Egypt should be resigned for a bribe; and either profiting by some delay in the payment of the sum, or persuading himself that it was a venial sin to break faith with infidels, he returned with fresh forces into Egypt and laid siege to Belbeis.¹ Unprepared, the town surrendered after three days, and met with the fate dictated by a ruthless policy. To strike terror into the recalcitrant Moslems of Cairo, Belbeis was given up to sack and pillage; and all the inhabitants were massacred, save those who were spared as useful slaves. It is possible to march from Belbeis to Cairo in two days, but Amaury advanced with the utmost deliberation. Some say that his army was suffering from the licence attending the sack of Belbeis, and could not be moved without time to recruit. Others affirm that what Amaury really wanted was not Egypt, but a larger sum of money, and desired to give time for negotiations with Shower to that effect. Be that as it may, the delay was fraught with disastrous consequence to the native Christians, always the first to suffer and last to profit by the policy of the Moslem tyrants who had misgoverned Egypt for so long. The fourfold capital of Egypt was for strategic purposes only twofold. To the north were the two Masrs, or Cairo; to the south, with a desert space between, which had once been covered with houses and gardens, lay Fostat and Babylon—the former half-Moslem, half-Christian; the latter almost entirely inhabited by Christians. Cairo was already occupied by the Christian garrison which Amaury had left behind him, and Shower seems to have regarded the common faith of the Franks and the Copts as a more important factor than their theological differences, in which it is greatly to be feared that he was mistaken. He evidently supposed that the Christians, who now hemmed him in on all sides, would unite to sweep the tottering dominion of the Moslems from the country. While affecting therefore the greatest readiness to treat with Amaury, he took measures to prevent any such amalgamation. He appealed to the Moslems of the whole country to rise in holy war against the Christians, and he caused the city of Babylon to be set on fire in so many places that the whole town seemed to burst at once into flame.¹ Day after day and night after night the smoke of that great city went up to heaven. Part of Fostat was involved in the common destruction, and for fifty-four days the fire burned without ceasing. No one has ever known how many perished in the flames or what became of the Christian fugitives, who probably escaped across the river and made their way into the villages beyond Gizeh.¹ For miles that awful glare fascinated the horror-stricken eyes of the native Christians; and when at last the fire burnt itself out, among the glowing heaps of utter ruin the only place in that great city wherein one stone was left upon another was the cluster of churches and houses which had been built within the massive walls of the ruined Roman fortress. To this day the site remains desolate—a wilderness of charred heaps, wherein the casual searcher may find coins and beads and broken potsherds, but little else. Only in one or two places the tender clinging of the Egyptians to the memory of their ancient saints led them to rear again, in such poor materials as they could gather, the churches which before had beautified their city in stone and marble and mosaic. These still exist, served by priests without a flock, since the six churches of the Roman fortress are more than enough for the Christians remaining in this desolated district. Even the very name of the ancient city which was for centuries the chief stronghold of Egypt is now only preserved in one of these outer churches, whose frail walls of dried mud are still known as Deyr Babyloun.

¹ More than one Western historian says that it was Pelusium which Amaury took and sacked on this occasion; though the Egyptian historians clearly speak of Belbeis, a town almost as little known to the Western writers as the Egyptian Babylon, but then one of the strongholds of Egypt. The same thing is noticeable more than once—that where Western historians speak of Pelusium, Eastern historians give the same account of events at Belbeis; yet the two towns were far apart. Pelusium was the town that an army marching from Syria to Alexandria would naturally seek to occupy, and Belbeis is on the line from Syria to Cairo.

¹ Some writers have endeavoured to represent this as merely the burning of the suburbs of Cairo between Shower and the invading army; but there is no doubt that it was Babylon and part of Fostat which were burnt, and these lay to the south of Cairo, with a desert between. In this fire one of the principal churches of Deyr Abu Sefayn was burnt down. Deyr Abu Sefayn stood, not in the city proper, but on the road running on the river-bank (in early days) by Fostat and Babylon. The church was rebuilt, and the Deyr still stands on the same site, though now the river has receded, and the road which runs by the crumbling walls of the old Deyr is occupied by the Helwan railway line. The walls are strong and old, for the place was only partly destroyed by the great fire. It stands north-west of the Mosque of Amr, and very near it. We do not hear that the Mosque of Amr suffered in the fire; nor are the churches of Anbar Shenouda or the Virgin, both of which stand within the walls of Abu Sefayn, mentioned in history as having been burnt. The present incumbent of the church of St. Mercurius, however, maintains that it was the church of the

Virgin, and not the church of St. Mercurius, which perished in the burning of Babylon.

¹ Some, and among them the Patriarch of the Armenians, fled to Syria, and took refuge with the Christians of Jerusalem. (See Abu Salih.)

CHAPTER XXI

THE KURDISH CONQUEST

A.D. 1168
A.M. 884
A.H. 564

WHILE Babylon was burning, Shawer was not idle. He continued his negotiations with Amaury until Shiracouh once more returned to Egypt with his fierce army of barbarians. Amaury had raised the sum for which he had formerly agreed to abstain from conquest in Egypt to 1,000,000 instead of 100,000 dinars, and this sum Shawer promised to pay. But Amaury refused to leave Egypt until at least the original sum of 100,000 had been paid down, and Shawer had no choice but to submit. Then Amaury withdrew his troops (of whom it is recorded that they were very angry, since, if the money had not been paid, they had counted on the pillage of Cairo), only to meet with the returning army of Shiracouh at Belbeis. A battle was fought, in which Shiracouh, no doubt to Shawer's secret chagrin, was victorious, and Shiracouh entered Cairo as a conqueror. Both the Kaliph and the population greeted him as their saviour, and Shawer, finding himself in disfavour, determined to put an end to his powerful rival by assassination. Shiracouh, aware of his intention, resolved to be beforehand with him. He arrested him, the Kaliph immediately demanded his head, and his house was given up to be plundered by the Cairo populace. But Shiracouh died within the year 1169 (A.H. 564), and his nephew Saleh-ed-din found himself master of the kingdom.

Saleh-ed-din was a Moslem of the old warrior type, punctilious in the performance of his religious duties, despising all luxury and all learning alike, and regarding the arts as temptations of the devil. His ambition was boundless, and had been strengthened by a prophecy in his youth that he should die Sultan of Damascus and Babylon, i.e. Egypt; or the Regnum Babylonicum, as it was called. Though his father and another uncle were in Egypt with him, there does not seem to have been any question about the succession to Shiracouh. The Kaliph Adid was powerless. To the new conquerors of Egypt he occupied the position of an anti-Pope, since their spiritual obedience was due to the Abbaside Kaliph of Baghdad. He was kept a close prisoner in his palace, and the chief places in the Government were filled by Saleh-ed-din's own followers.

Almost immediately after his accession to power he was called to meet a fresh invasion of the Franks. This time they approached by sea, King Amaury being again at their head, and proposed to take Damietta by assault. But Damietta was ready to receive them, and they were forced to commence a regular siege, in which they fared no better. After entering the mouth of the river they found themselves unexpectedly opposed by a huge chain, beyond which they were unable to force their way. The city received supplies without hindrance from the interior, while the Crusaders expected them from Syria in vain, and famine soon decimated their camp. Quarrels, as usual, broke out amongst them, and finally a tremendous storm tore the ships from their moorings and drove them one upon another in helpless confusion. A torch skilfully flung set fire to a portion of the floating mass, and eventually, after fifty days of loss and famine, the Crusaders abandoned the enterprise and returned to Syria. Saleh-ed-din, arriving from Cairo with reinforcements, found no enemy to fight, and reproached his Emirs with having allowed the Franks to escape.

Next year he entered Syria in search of reprisals, fought with Amaury near Gaza, and made himself master of that city, returning to Cairo in the spring of the year 1171. Soon afterwards he received a message from Nour-ed-din, still his nominal lord, desiring him to substitute the name of the Abbaside Kaliph for that of the Fatimite Adid in the public prayers of Egypt. Saleh-ed-din at first attempted to excuse himself, alleging his fear of an insurrection in Egypt; but in truth it was far more convenient to have an absolutely helpless and heretic Kaliph in his own power than one whose commands he would not feel justified in disobeying. He only received a still more urgent message from Nour-ed-din, and on September 10 a Persian Emir solemnly proclaimed the Abbaside Kaliph from the pulpit of the principal mosque.

The unfortunate Adid was then in a dying condition, and the news of his deposition was mercifully kept from him during the few days of life that remained to him. By the population of Egypt generally the change of Kaliph was received with profound indifference. The true Egyptians, Moslem and Christian alike, asked nothing more than to be let alone and allowed to cultivate their land in peace so long as they paid such taxes as they were unable to evade. The barbarous Turks, Kurds, Arabs, and freed slaves of European origin, who formed the 'upper' classes, cared little for any Kaliph, and were ready to serve a Sultan like Saleh-ed-din, under whom they were sure of unlimited fighting, plunder, and pay. Nor did Saleh-ed-din disappoint them. He began by distributing all the treasure of the late Kaliph among his Emirs and soldiers. It was now more than a hundred years since the sack of the celebrated treasury of Mustanzir by Nasr-ed-doula, and all this time the Kaliph had steadily continued to amass jewels and treasures of all kinds, so that the plunder of the last Fatimite Kaliph was very great. A new library also had been formed, probably containing many of the old books, bought back in course of time from those who placed no value upon them. Saleh-ed-din, who looked upon books in the spirit of the Kaliph Omar, distributed these among the most learned Moslem Egyptians of his day, hoping by this means to conciliate their favour. They were said to amount to a hundred thousand volumes; and there are still in the library of Leyden, or were some years ago, ancient manuscripts annotated in Arabic which formed part of the Fatimite library. Thus perished in shame and humiliation the Fatimite dynasty, which barely two hundred years before could have echoed the proud boast of Cæsar—'I came, I saw, I conquered'—in the kingdom of Egypt.

CHAPTER XXII

THE REIGN OF SALEH-ED-DIN

A.D. 1174
A.M. 890
A.H. 570

ALMOST the whole of the reign of Saleh-ed-din was spent in war. In Syria a series of brilliant campaigns against the Franks on the one hand, and the son of his old master Nour-ed-din on the other, culminated in the substitution of his own name for that of the Abbaside Kaliph in the public prayers ; by which act, in the year 1174 (A.H. 570), he declared himself independent sovereign of Syria, Egypt, and part of Asia Minor. However, he had yet to reduce Jerusalem, the stronghold of the Franks, and many other of their most important cities; and though he returned for a brief visit to Egypt in 1176, he took the field again in Palestine the next year.

Not only in Palestine, but in the south, he was called upon to defend his newly acquired kingdom. After the burning of Babylon and the sufferings inflicted on the Egyptians by the constant wars between the rival Moslem tyrants, the Christian King of Nubia invaded Egypt once more, pillaged Assuan, and would probably have continued his advance if he had not learned that the pusillanimous dynasty of the Fatimites was extinct, and that the new Sultan, a man mighty in war, was sending an army to meet him. The King of Nubia judged discretion the better part of valour, and commenced a retreat ; but the army of Saleh-ed-din's general came up with him before he had crossed the frontier. In the engagement which followed, both parties seem to have claimed the victory, both suffered considerable loss, and both retreated—the king into his own country, the general to report to his master at Cairo.

Saleh-ed-din was far from satisfied, and sent his own brother Shamse-ed-doula with orders to invade Nubia and punish the Christians. Shamse-ed-doula laid siege with his whole army to the fortress of Deyr Ibrim, and took it after three days. It had a strongly fortified citadel on the mountain above the town, which enclosed a splendid church dedicated to the Virgin, whose dome upheld a cross of great size. Shamse-ed-doula plundered the place thoroughly, and set at liberty many Moslems who had been made prisoners in the recent invasion of Egypt. All the Christians who were left alive were sold as slaves, the treasury of the church was sacked, its dominant cross pulled down and burnt, while the call to prayers for the Moslems was sounded from the dome. The bishop of the diocese was seized and tortured, to make him confess where he had hidden his wealth; 'but finding,' says the Moslem chronicler, 'that he really had nothing, he was sold into slavery with the rest.'

Shamse-ed-doula, however, had learnt that the invasion of Nubia was likely to prove a very different thing from the invasion of Egypt, and did not attempt to penetrate farther. He was about to abandon the place, when one of his officers, a Kurd named Ibrahim, asked to be left in possession. Shamse-ed-doula granted his request, and left with him a number of Kurds for garrison. These barbarians lived openly by plundering raids into Nubia for the next two years, never able to effect a footing in the country, but doing incalculable damage to the inhabitants and carrying off their herds. The King of Nubia at length sent an ambassador to Shamse-ed-doula, who had fixed his residence in Kous, with a present of two slaves, male and female, and a letter in which he proposed peace. Shamse-ed-doula delivered two pairs of arrows in return to the ambassador, with the contemptuous remark that it was all the answer he would send; but with a curious confidence in the good-feeling of the Christians he sent back with the messenger a native of Aleppo named Masoud, with orders to spy out the land and report to him if any invasion of Nubia were practicable.

Masoud prospered better than his errand deserved. The king refused to see him, but permitted him to return in safety, not however without an ineffaceable mark, which must have been a sore grief to a Moslem. Masoud, meeting the king by chance, riding on a horse without harness and almost alone, insisted on approaching and saluting him. Whereupon the king, 'laughing,' caused him to be branded on the hand with the figure of a cross, bestowed on him fifty rotls of flour, and sent him off.

Masoud penetrated no farther than the town of Dongola, which, he says, contained no edifice of any size or importance except the palace of the king. But Saleh-ed-din, like Johar before him, gave up all idea of adding the Christian kingdoms of the Soudan to his empire.

Shortly afterwards Ibrahim the Kurd was drowned, with many of his followers, while crossing the Nile on one of his plundering expeditions. The rest of this party abandoned the fortress, which was reoccupied by the Nubians,

In 1176 (A.H. 572) the Christians of the town of Keft or Koptos raised the standard of revolt against the Moslems, but were promptly suppressed by El Adel, brother of Saleh-ed-din, who visited the unfortunate town with the most terrible reprisals. Makrizi says that he hanged nearly 3,000 of the inhabitants on the trees which surrounded the town, using their own girdles and turbans for ropes.

In 1182 (A.H. 578) the son of Nour-ed-din died, and Saleh-ed-din found a fresh pretext for despoiling his successor of the fragment of Nour-ed-din's kingdom which remained to his successors. He then began a fresh campaign against the Franks, and in the years 1185-6 he took from them Tiberias, Cæsarea, Haiffa, Jaffa, Sidon, Beyrout, Acre, and a number of less important towns. Finally, in the year 1187 he marched against Jerusalem, whose king he had already taken prisoner.

Jerusalem was in no condition to resist. Enormous numbers of the poorer people had flocked into the city, but there were hardly any soldiers and only fourteen knights to be found. The priests and deacons fought bravely, regarding the defence of the Holy City as a lawful cause in which to bear arms, but the populace surrounded the Patriarch and the queen, clamouring for a capitulation; and after the hopeless struggle had lasted fourteen days the queen yielded, on condition that the Christian inhabitants of the city should be held to ransom and not sold as slaves. To this Saleh-ed-din agreed, fixing the ransom for each man at ten dinars, for each woman five, and for each child two dinars. Some fourteen thousand, however, were unable to pay, and half of these Saleh-ed-din, convinced of their uselessness, set free without ransom; the other half were reduced to slavery. After the fall of Jerusalem the whole of Syria submitted to Saleh-ed-din, excepting only Tyre, Tripoli, and Antioch, which still remained in the hands of the Christians.

The thrill of horror which ran over Europe when it was known that Jerusalem, after ninety-six years, was once more in the hands of the infidels, gave birth speedily to a fresh Crusade. The Emperor of the West, Frederic Barbarossa, took the Cross himself, and wrote Saleh-ed-din a defiance in which he assumes himself to be the direct descendant of the ancient Romans and natural lord of their empire both in East and West. Saleh-ed-din replied to this letter in terms no less defiant and arrogant, assuring him that not only were the Saracens prepared to meet the Christians in the East, but that he intended to cross over to Europe, 'and will take from you all your lands, in the strength of the Lord. . . . For the union of the Christian faith has twice come against us in Babylon; once at Damietta and again at Alexandria. . . . You know how the Christians each time returned, and to what an issue they came.' In the conclusion of the letter Saleh-ed-din styles himself the 'Saviour,' among thirteen other titles, such as 'the corrector of the world and of the law.'

Frederic Barbarossa was drowned on his march, and the Crusade thus received a serious blow at the outset. But the Franks of Palestine began the siege of Acre in August, 1189, without waiting for the new Crusaders, and Saleh-ed-din was unable to dislodge them. The siege lasted two years; and though Saleh-ed-din sent relays of ships from Alexandria laden with provisions, and gathered all his forces on the landward side of the city, he was unable to save it from ultimate surrender. The Crusaders came from all Europe to aid in the struggle—among them, Philip of France and Richard of England—and finally Saleh-ed-din was compelled to make terms for an honourable capitulation. The city, the 'true Cross,' two thousand noble Christian captives, and five hundred of inferior rank, were to be given up and a ransom paid of two hundred thousand dinars as well. For the payment of the money the Moslems gave all the men of high rank in the city as hostages; but neither captives nor money were sent, and 2,700 of the hostages were publicly hanged outside the city of Acre in revenge. During the siege the Crusaders had lost six Patriarchs and archbishops, twelve bishops, forty counts, and five hundred nobles, besides the rank and file both of clergy and laity who had perished.

The Christian captives, in spite of Saleh-ed-din's bad faith, were freed after all. They were being sent, to the number of twelve thousand, as slaves to Babylon (Egypt) under the escort of a small Turkish force, when King Richard suddenly came upon the convoy as he was reconnoitring the country near Darum. He had but a few soldiers with him, but the fame of his deeds had already struck such terror into the Turks that at the mere sight of his banner the escort abandoned their prisoners and fled for their lives. King Richard pursued and slew some of the Moslems, took twenty of the officers alive, and speedily released the Christians.

Hostilities continued with varying fortunes between Richard and Saleh-ed-din for about a year; and then, both parties being worn out, a truce was agreed upon for three years, during which time pilgrims were to have free access to the Holy Sepulchre. Three great companies of the Crusaders set out at once to perform this duty before returning to Europe, but King Richard counted himself unworthy to visit the Sepulchre, which he had proved unable to redeem. The third company of pilgrims was led by the Bishop of Salisbury, who had an interview with Saleh-ed-din and obtained from him a further boon. The Sepulchre was now, as it always had been, served by priests of the Greek Church ; but the Bishop of Salisbury, regarding them as heretics, succeeding in imposing on the Church by command of Saleh-ed-din two priests and two deacons of the Latin Church. He also established the same number of Latin priests at Bethlehem and at Nazareth.

Before Richard had been gone six months his great enemy was dead. Saleh-ed-din, having within twenty-four years raised himself from a simple officer of the Kurdish contingent to the head of the Saracen Empire, which he had re-established in Egypt, Syria, and—according to his own claim—Russia and India, fell ill at Damascus and died in 1193 (A.H. 589).

It is not often that the wars of an aggressive sovereign add to the material prosperity of his original kingdom, but such was the case with Egypt during the earlier part of the reign of Saleh-ed-din. While the Sultan was warring in Palestine his troops were paid chiefly by plunder, and little was sent from Egypt except food supplies. All the Moslem adventurers who had lived by a kind of permitted brigandage in Egypt followed the new conqueror to the wars, and Egypt was once more enabled to exercise the extraordinary recuperative power which she has always possessed. The government of the kingdom was confided by Saleh-ed-din to a negro eunuch,¹ in whom he had great and apparently well-deserved confidence. This man's name was Boha-ed-din, soon nicknamed Kara-Gouch (or 'the Blackbird ') by the Egyptians, who despised the illiterate freed slave thus set over them at the same time that they obeyed him. The reverence of the Egyptians for their great ancestors had not yet died out, and both Christian and Moslem among them resented with bitter sarcasm and empty hatred the profanation of their tombs. Bohaded-din did not dig for treasure among the tombs, as former Moslem Sultans had done; he probably regarded the stories of such treasure as idle tales. But Saleh-ed-din had ordered him not only to clean and strengthen the canals—which would have earned him the gratitude of the Egyptians had he stopped there—he had also ordered the walls of Cairo to be rebuilt and many other public works to be undertaken which needed stone as well as labour.

¹ One Moslem authority calls this man a Greek.

It seemed an expensive folly to the negro Wuzir, guiltless of sentiment and ignorant of history, to quarry fresh stone from the mountains when the desert plains on the west of the Nile were thick with pyramids of dressed stone for miles, from the ruins of the ancient Memphis to beyond New Cairo. Almost the whole of these vast structures, except the few which remain at either end, and which were spared because they were the largest and most difficult to destroy, were razed to the ground by the Wuzir of Saleh-ed-din. The stone was used in different public works of that reign, most of which may still be seen. The bridge of forty arches which crossed the water between the Pyramids and the town of Gizeh has long since disappeared, but the embankment of the river is still visible at Boulac. The new citadel which took the place of Ahmed ebn Touloun's earlier buildings on the Mokattam yet retains much of Saleh-ed-din's constructions, besides the well which bears his name (Joseph) and the magnificent aqueduct which brought water above the city from the Nile.

Great storehouses for corn were also built at Fostat, the ruins of which still bear the name of 'Joseph's Granaries';¹ and, finally, Boha-ed-din conceived the idea of building a vast wall to enclose the whole extent of the fourfold city, though all that was left of Babylon was the Roman fortress. This plan, however, whether from failure of easily obtained material or by order of Saleh-ed-din, was not carried out. Fostat and the ruins of Babylon were left out, and the old wall of the two Masrs was strengthened and repaired.

During the reign of Saleh-ed-din also the governor in charge of Alexandria, desiring 'to hinder the ships of an enemy from mooring near the walls of the town,' deliberately destroyed the four hundred columns which up to that date still stood on the ruined site of the Serapeum, and threw the fragments into the sea where the waves came close up to the walls of the town. Only one—that which we call Pompey's—was left standing when Abd-el-Latif visited the spot a few years after; but some were left entire, though prostrate, on the site, and Abd-el-Latif gazed mournfully on the fragments of 'more than four hundred' on the shore.

The forced labour imposed upon the people for all these works rendered Boha-ed-din more unpopular than ever with all the Egyptians of either faith. He did not actually persecute the Christians, but he oppressed them in as many ways as he dared. He began by trying to dispense with them in the Government service, only to find, as every other Moslem had found before him, that anything like an effective administration was impossible without the Christians. Still, the humiliating restrictions of dress were enforced; the use of bells, of visible crosses, and the processions of the Christians, were all forbidden. He was more detested than many a worse ruler, and the common people revenged themselves through the puppet-shows of Cairo, in which all the wit and satire of the Egyptians were expended to make him ridiculous. So strangely do certain things endure that the unpopular Wuzir Kara-Gouch, though superior to most of the Moslem petty tyrants who had been set over them, lived for centuries as the villain of the comic street-theatre, in which the Egyptians have always loved to satirise the vices and expose the follies of their rulers. It is said that this street puppet-show of Egypt was the original, through intermediate countries, of our Punch and Judy shows; but generally in Egypt it was a vehicle for ridicule of the prevailing Government under scarcely veiled nicknames. The puppet-show is still called Kara-Gouch, though very few people know the origin of the name.

¹ Tourists are often told that these granaries and the great well were the work of the Patriarch Joseph, before the Exodus.

CHAPTER XXIII

DISSENSIONS OF THE EGYPTIAN AND ABYSSINIAN CHURCHES

.D. 1193 SALEH-ED-DIN left sixteen sons behind him, some of
 .M. 909 whom divided his great empire unequally between them,
 .H. 589 with the quarrels and civil war usual among Orientals on such occasions. The eldest son took Syria as his share, and the second (or third), Imad-ed-din Osman Melek-el-Aziz, commonly called El Aziz, succeeded his father in Egypt.

El Aziz was very much under the influence of his uncle Seyf-ed-din, otherwise called Melek-el-Adel, and was persuaded by him to lend him aid in despoiling Saleh-eddin's eldest son of his kingdom. The same uncle took upon himself to interfere greatly with the affairs of Egypt, and persuaded El Aziz to continue the destruction of the Pyramids. As only the largest were now left to destroy, this was not such an easy matter; but it was determined to begin with the smallest of the three left at Gizeh. A great force of sappers and miners and other labourers was collected, and some of the principal Emirs went out and camped near the pyramid to supervise the work.

For eight months the fruitless labour was carried on, and at the end of that time the vast army of labourers had only succeeded in destroying a part of the casing of the pyramid and making a small breach in one side. This futile performance was greeted with a storm of ridicule by the Egyptians, who saw with delight both that and all other projects against the remaining pyramids definitely abandoned. But El Aziz made himself even more unpopular by forbidding the national festival of the cutting of the Nile. This dates from the remotest times in Egypt, and had been adopted in turn by whatever happened to be the national religion. There are old legends, capable of a very simple explanation, of the sacrifice of a virgin to the Nile in pagan times; then the feast was adopted and sanctified by the Christians, who flung, according to some accounts, the mummied hand of a virgin saint in blessing upon the water. But under whatever guise of religion, the fête was a national and popular one. It is rarely seen by visitors, owing to the time of year at which it takes place, but is an extremely pretty sight. The boats are outlined from top to bottom in coloured lights, and move slowly up and down on the broad river-flood, carrying parties of musicians and merry-makers. About the time of Saleh-ed-din the festival was probably in a transition period, half-Christian still, but becoming yearly more infected by the licence of the Moslems, and giving occasion to quarrels and debauchery. It is just in this state of decadence, however, that such national festivals are most dear to the lower orders, and they bitterly resented the attempt to suppress it. The Kaliph El Hakim had made the same attempt two hundred years earlier, when it possessed a more decidedly Christian character, and with as little real success. The water carnival still goes on every year, and no lover of the picturesque would willingly see it abolished.

For some time there seems to have been no Patriarch of the Melkite Church in Egypt, and the consequences were very serious for that well-nigh expiring body. When the country became once more quiet and safe under the Wuzir Boha-ed-din, it occurred to the ecclesiastical authorities of Constantinople that it would be no longer dangerous, and certainly politic, to revive, if possible, the Egyptian branch of their Church. A man named Mark was consecrated on the express understanding that the office was no longer to be an easy sinecure, but that he was to take charge of his flock in Egypt and do his best to revive Greek influence in that country.

It is evident from Mark's letters to Constantinople that little or nothing had been known for some time about the Egyptians. It surprised him to find that even the liturgy they used was the old one bearing the name of St. Mark, and he wrote to know if he might permit its continuance; but was informed that in all things they must conform to the customs of the Imperial Church, and that the liturgy of St. Mark must be set aside for that of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil. Other rites peculiar to Alexandria were mentioned, all much older than the present customs of Constantinople; but in no case was the Egyptian usage allowed to continue.

The Patriarch of the National Church was now John VI., who had succeeded Mark ebn Zaara in 1189. He had been then but recently admitted to the secular priesthood, and must therefore have been married, but was doubtless a widower at the time of his election. His high character, learning, and eloquence had won him the preference over the monastic candidates for the same dignity, and, like most of those Patriarchs whose previous experience had not been bounded by the walls of a monastery, he ruled the Church well and wisely. Some say that he had been a merchant before he became a priest ; in any case, he seems to have had private means, and to have spent them entirely in charitable works. Little is recorded of the early years of his Patriarchate, but soon after the arrival of the new Greek Patriarch the Christians of both Churches had reason to fear a renewal of persecution. Not only in the suppression of the water festival, but in other ways, Melek-el-Aziz showed his intention of following in the footsteps of the persecutor Hakim, when an accident put an end to his life and left a child of seven to succeed him on the Egyptian throne.

Seyf-ed-din, or El Adel, had no idea of allowing the rights of an infant to interfere with his ambition. He hastened from Damascus, and assumed the title of Regent ; but shortly after deposed the child, and proclaimed himself Sultan in 1199 (A.H. 596-7).

At this time Abd-el-Latif was living in Egypt, and left an account of the country which has been translated both into French and English. Abd-el-Latif was a native of Baghdad, a physician, and a man of letters. He devoted himself to the study of the old Greek authors, particularly of Aristotle, and went to Cairo attracted by the fame of three men, of whom only one, Moses Maimonides the Jew, left a lasting reputation behind him. Moses Maimonides was a Spanish Jew of Cordova, who had become a Moslem in Spain, but, it is said, returned again to the religion of his forefathers after he had settled in Fostat. Abd-el-Latif went to see the Pyramids before they were stripped of their casing by the iconoclastic attempts of El Aziz, and declares them to have been covered with inscriptions in the character of the ancient Egyptians, which no Moslem could read. Abd-el-Latif wrote a description of the plants and animals of Egypt, as well as of the antiquities of the Delta. He mentions that the hippopotamus was still to be found in the Delta, and in particular gives an account of two which did so much damage in the Damietta branch of the river that after the local authorities had tried in vain to destroy them, they sent to Nubia for a band of skilled hippopotamus-hunters to get rid of the beasts for them. The bodies were brought to Cairo, where Abd-el-Latif saw and made careful measurements of them.

Abd-el-Latif is full of admiration of the Egyptian architects and the lofty, well-ventilated palaces which they built for the 'princes' of Egypt; the splendid baths and water conduits, which were so solidly built that they remained where the palace or building was destroyed. Even after centuries of misgovernment and oppression the sanitary arrangements and engineering skill of the Egyptians filled the celebrated physician from Baghdad and Damascus with surprise. But the chief value of Abd-el-Latif's book lies in the account he gives of the famine and consequent pestilence of the years A.H. 597-8 (1200-1 A.D.).

Apparently Boha-ed-din had thought more of building walls with the destroyed antiquities than of cleaning canals, and the usual result followed: a low Nile left the country absolutely unwatered. The wretched people abandoned their desolate fields and crowded into the towns along the river; there were no reserves of money or food to fall back upon, and the poorer classes almost from the beginning had to subsist on the flesh of dogs, of horses, of those men and women who had died before them of starvation. Some of them went still further and devoured their own children in their extremity; some set up a regular trade in human flesh, decoying women and children with offers of food, murdering them, and exposing the flesh as meat for sale. Abd-el-Latif says that he himself saw the roasted corpses of several children which at different times were recognised and seized by the authorities in their attempts to put an end to the frightful trade. Those who were convicted of having killed and eaten children were burnt alive. In a few days as many as thirty suffered this punishment in Cairo. Page after page of Abd-el-Latif are filled with the ghastly details. In particular, he says that the neighbourhood of the mosque of Ahmed Touloun was infested by these human butchers, who lay in wait for their victims in the narrow alleys and killed great numbers, among whom Abd-el-Latif particularises a fat bookseller. He assures us that the same scenes of horror were enacted at Assuan, at Kous, in the Fayoum, Mohallah-el-Kebir, Alexandria, and Damietta. The bodies of those who died from starvation lay about the streets unburied, or the shrunken flesh was stripped from their bones for food. Many villages were left without a single inhabitant. Some were taken possession of by the rich, who had managed to keep themselves alive and to save seed for sowing the deserted fields, and then they were obliged to hire men to bring out the corpses which lay in all the houses and throw them into the river, at the rate of a piece of silver for every ten bodies so disposed of. But in some cases the wolves and hyenas had saved them this expense. A fisherman from Tennis reported that in one day four hundred rotting corpses had floated by him on the river. Thousands sold themselves or their children into slavery for the food necessary to sustain life. Some men boasted to Abd-el-Latif that they had violated as many as fifty free-born girls, whose misery had rendered them an easy prey. It was reckoned that less than two per cent. of the artisan class survived the famine.

Pestilence, in Egypt the invariable sequence of famine, soon followed, and the population was reduced still further. In one day alone in Alexandria the funeral prayers were said for seven hundred persons, representing a far greater number who were buried without a prayer or left without burial at all. Abd-el-Latif nowhere hints that he felt any obligation to devote his skill and science to the relief of the suffering people, and with a brief sketch of the havoc wrought by the plague his account ends. We learn from other sources that he left the sorely afflicted country and went to live at Damascus.

About this time also there was an outbreak of persecution in Egypt which was specially directed against the Christian sculptors, architects, and masons, whose achievements Abd-el-Latif so much admired. Hundreds of them emigrated in consequence to Abyssinia, where the king received them gladly and employed them in building churches.

In the Northern Delta the horrors of war were added to those of famine, persecution, and pestilence. The Crusaders had already made one or two fruitless attempts to recover Palestine, and either in the autumn of 1203 or the spring of 1204 they invaded Egypt by the Rosetta branch of the Nile and entrenched themselves at Fueh, whence they devastated the country and massacred indiscriminately the Christian and Moslem inhabitants. The Bishop of Fueh, a man named Kilus, managed to escape, but his flock appears to have been scattered or destroyed. Egypt at the same time was visited by a terrible earthquake, which was felt through Syria and Asia Minor up to the frontiers of Persia.

El Adel was in Syria at the time, but returned with all speed to meet the Franks in Egypt. He did not, however, give battle, but opened negotiations, which ended in a treaty by which he yielded to them Jaffa, Lydda, and Ramleh (in Syria) as the price of their evacuation of Egypt.

Soon after these events an embassy arrived from Abyssinia to the Patriarch John, asking for a new Metropolitan for that country. John was particularly anxious to make a good selection for this important and far-distant post; but the deplorable custom of electing only monks to the highest offices of the Church made it impossible for him to choose any of the clergy well known to him. He therefore set out on a tour of the different Egyptian monasteries, making diligent inquiries in each, and noting the names of those monks who might be selected as candidates. But the Abyssinian ambassadors grew impatient of this long detention, and applied to the Sultan, offering him presents and requesting him to compel John to give them their Metropolitan without further delay.

John then took the bold step of refusing to choose any inexperienced monk. The Bishop of Fueh was without a flock, a man of experience, and, as the Patriarch had every reason to believe, of high character. The proceeding was canonically irregular, translations not being allowed in the Egyptian Church; but no one protested, and Kilus was raised to the rank of Metropolitan with a special ceremony, and departed for his new charge.

He was met with the greatest respect and ceremony three days' journey from Axum by the king in person, the bishops, many of the clergy, and a numerous body of troops. An umbrella of cloth of gold—the peculiar privilege of the Metropolitan of Abyssinia—was held over his head, and he was conducted in a triumphal procession to the city. One of the Egyptians who went with him has left an account of the scene, and of the splendour and dignity which surrounded the Metropolitan of Abyssinia at all times. For four years John heard the best reports of his government and conduct; at the end of that time Kilus suddenly appeared in Cairo. On being asked why he had deserted his charge, he replied by declaring that his office had been violently taken from him by a bishop who was the brother of the queen, and that he had barely escaped with his life. His story did not entirely satisfy the Patriarch, and he requested Kilus to take up his abode in Cairo while a commissioner was sent to Abyssinia to inquire into the affair. The commissioner was absent a year, and brought back a very different version. It seemed that a golden staff of great value belonging to the cathedral at Axum had been stolen; that Kilus had accused the treasurer of the theft, and, on the bare suspicion, had caused the priest to be seized and scourged to death. This high-handed proceeding had raised a popular riot against him, from which he had fled. The Emperor of Abyssinia sent his own ambassadors with the commissioner to confirm the truth of his story, and to entreat that another Metropolitan might be sent to them. The ambassadors were also charged with handsome presents for the Sultan, since it was well understood by this time that if the Churches of the Soudan and Abyssinia wished to keep up their communications with the Mother Church of Egypt they must pay heavily for the privilege of doing so. Among other offerings, they brought to the Sultan a lion, an elephant, and a giraffe. El Adel was away fighting the Franks in Syria; but his son and successor, Melek-el-Kamil, received the presents graciously, and gave the necessary permission for the departure of a new Metropolitan.

But John first called a synod to decide what was to be done with Kilus, and he was sentenced to be solemnly and publicly degraded from the episcopal office. A certain day was fixed, and the concourse of both Christians and Moslems to see the unwonted spectacle was so great 'that a saddled ass fetched three drachmæ for the day's hire.' The new Metropolitan was Isaac, a monk from the Laura of St. Anthony, who was received with great honour in Abyssinia, and governed the Church there till he died. The reign of this Emperor of Abyssinia lasted forty years, and he was revered as a saint after his death. He caused churches to be carved out of the solid rock in Abyssinia by Egyptian architects, which aroused the astonishment centuries after of the Portuguese.

All this time El Adel was struggling with the Crusaders in Palestine, and Egypt was governed by Melek-el-Kamil, who was very favourable to the Christians. Some who had outwardly apostatised under the oppression of Saleh-ed-din began to hope that they might be permitted to profess their true faith again without incurring the fiery death to which all who relapsed from the Moslem faith were doomed. One man, who from being a monk of Nitria had become a Moslem clerk in a Government office, presented himself before Kamil and entreated his leave to return to the Christian faith, declaring that if it were not granted he would suffer martyrdom sooner than remain a Moslem. Kamil dismissed the man in safety, and he returned in penitence to his former monastery. Hearing of his success, another Christian from the Thebaid came to the Court with a like request; but by this time El Adel had returned from Syria, and was extremely indignant to hear of his son's clemency. So far from granting the second application, he despatched soldiers to Nitria with orders to put the monk to death at once if he declared himself a Christian. The wretched man not only apostatised a second time, but tried to curry favour by declaring that he would point out to the Government officials where the monks of his monastery had concealed their treasure. In fact, on the approach of the Moslems the sacred vessels of the church had been hidden in a dry well for safety, but no other treasure was possessed by the monastery, as the archimandrite assured the party sent to carry it away. They found the well by the help of the renegade, and took the chalice, paten, and sanctuary veil to Cairo, whence by the intercession of Kamil they were restored to the monks.

Not long after this John died, beloved and lamented by all parties. Burial follows almost immediately upon death in Egypt, and it so happened that none of his own bishops arrived in time to attend the funeral, whereby we conclude that his death was sudden and unexpected. The chief mourner at the funeral of the Egyptian Patriarch was therefore a bishop of the Greek Church in Egypt, which is significant of the high estimation in which he was held even by those who deemed him a heretic. And it was a Moslem historian who wrote of this same Patriarch: 'He put an end to the poll tax' (paid by each member of the Church to the Patriarch, and originally imposed to meet the demands of the Moslems and the Alexandrians) 'and forbade all fees for ordinations. He was never burdensome to a single Christian, and never took a bribe.'

The Egyptian Church hesitated between two men as John's successor—one named Paul, of whom little more than the name is known; and the archdeacon of the church of the Moallakah in the fortress of Babylon. But there was a certain man named David ebn Johanna ebn Laklak, a native of the Fayoum, well known among the Copts for his unscrupulous ambition, who had strong interest at Court, and was determined, by fair means or foul, to obtain the Patriarchal throne. He had absolutely no qualification for the post, he had been excommunicated by his bishop on a previous occasion for exciting disturbance in the church, he had presented himself as a candidate for the dignity of Metropolitan of Abyssinia, and had been refused by the late Patriarch with indignation. Had the Egyptian Church been free, his claim would not have troubled their peace for a moment; but he was the intimate friend of the Secretary of State for War, and that person, who was nominally a Christian, persuaded the Sultan El Adel to issue his mandate for the consecration of David on the following day, which was Sunday. As soon as this became known, the indignation of the Egyptians knew no bounds. A sufficient number of bishops to perform the ceremony were apparently kept in restraint all night, but they managed to send information to the principal Copts, who were not slow to take action. Long before it was light, Kamil, who was then residing in the citadel, was awakened by the clamour of a great multitude calling upon him. He came out with his usual kindness to receive the petitioners, a vast crowd of Christians carrying lighted torches and imploring his help to prevent the calamity which threatened them. As soon as Kamil understood what had happened and the urgency of the affair, he called for his horse and promised to seek his father the Sultan immediately on their behalf. Meanwhile David, having good reason to fear interruption, had left Cairo at daybreak on the Sunday morning, accompanied by his personal supporters and the bishops who were to perform the ceremony of consecration, on his road to Babylon ; for though the city of Babylon was no more, the old cathedral church (the Moallakah) had been saved by its inclusion in the Roman fortress, and the ceremony of consecrating the Patriarch was still performed there. Thus, when Kamil arrived at the palace of his father in Cairo, he found David gone ; but, on his urgent representations, the Sultan sent to recall the bishops, without whom the consecration could not proceed, and who had doubtless been looking anxiously for the summons. David's nomination was declared null and void, and the election was put off for a time. Four of the bishops met in the church of St. Sergius and Bacchus in Babylon, and pronounced sentence of excommunication against David. They also bound themselves by an oath never to join in the consecration of David, for it seems to have been clearly understood that no reliance could be placed upon El Adel ; and as they were not permitted at once to end the matter by consecrating a Patriarch of their own choice, the way was left open for David's intrigues and his indomitable will to gain their end.

His friend, the Secretary of State for War, soon made another attempt. He assured the Sultan that David was really approved by the people, and that the demonstration against him was got up by unworthy agitators. In order to prove this, he managed by threats, persuasion, and bribes to obtain the signature of thirteen bishops (among whom we are sorry to find the names of two of those who had sworn never to consecrate him), forty monks, and a large body of priests and laity. The Sultan permitted the arrangements to go on, and David would then have attained his ambition but for the interference of the Sultan's physician (as usual, a Christian), who exposed the means by which the War Secretary had obtained the signatures, and implored the Sultan to allow the election to proceed by the Heikeliet.

The situation ended in a deadlock. The Sultan at Kamil's entreaty refrained from using force to compel the election of his nominee, but neither would he allow any other man to be consecrated, and Egypt remained without a Patriarch.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE CRUSADERS IN EGYPT

A.D. 1216
A.M. 932
A.H. 613

ALL this time the wars in Palestine were continuous. The sixth Crusade had begun in 1213 (A.H. 610), and the Saracens were hard pushed to maintain their footing on the coast, where almost all the important towns were in the hands of the Franks. El Adel had gone again to Syria to carry on the war after the incidents mentioned in the last chapter, when the Crusaders turned towards Egypt and laid siege to Damietta. Kamil hastily marched to its relief, sending to his father for succour. El Adel at once set out to join him, but died suddenly before he reached the frontier. His soldiers, who viewed Kamil with dislike as a lover of peace and of the Christians, at once declared that they would not accept him as Sultan, and elected a Kurdish general. If at this juncture the Crusaders had unanimously pushed their advantage, they could have conquered Egypt with ease; but unfortunately they were as much divided among themselves as the Moslems. The Pope's legate, who had recently arrived, insisted that the supreme command should be given to him; whereas John de Brienne, the commander of the Crusading army, was naturally unwilling to yield his post to an ecclesiastic. The Saracens were the first to recover themselves. Kamil's brother, commonly called Khor-ed-din out of his many names, with a loyalty very unusual among the Moslems, hastened to his assistance from Syria. He suppressed the revolt against Kamil, and joined his forces to those of his brother against the Franks.

The siege had now lasted several months, when the Crusading army was joined by St. Francis of Assisi, travelling with a small band of monks in search of martyrdom. He arrived just as Kamil and his brother were about to make a vigorous attempt to raise the siege, and prophesied that in the forthcoming battle the Christians would be defeated. It fell out as he had said, and six thousand of the Crusading army were slain or taken prisoners ; but the siege was not raised. Then St. Francis, taking with him one of his companions, set out alone to visit the Moslem camp. They were seized by the advanced guard, bound, and taken before the Sultan, who demanded why they had come alone to his camp.

St. Francis replied that he came by the authority of the Most High God to show to the Sultan and his people the way of salvation. Probably, like most Europeans—not only of his day, but of ours—he was unaware of the very existence of the Egyptian Church, or of the fact that Kamil was constantly surrounded by and dependent on his Christian subjects. Moreover, if he had known, a heretic would be regarded by St. Francis as no better than an infidel.

Kamil, while he smiled at the Saint's ignorance, admired his courage, and invited him to remain as his guest for some days. The fiery monk expressed his willingness to do so on a trifling condition. 'Let a furnace be heated,' he asked, 'and let any of your teachers enter it with me. He whose God protects him in the midst of the fire shall be acknowledged as the teacher of the true faith.'

The Sultan objected that no Moslem would consent to abide by such a test. Then St. Francis offered, if the Sultan would give him his word as a sovereign that in the case of his surviving the ordeal Kamil and his people would embrace Christianity, to enter the furnace alone. But Kamil, who perhaps feared the 'art magic' of the Franks, and who in any case would not have joined the Latin Church, even had he decided to become a Christian, refused this second offer. He dismissed St. Francis with all honour; attempted to load him with presents, which he refused; and at parting desired him to pray that God would reveal to the Sultan of Egypt whether the Moslem or the Christian faith was more acceptable to Him.

The siege dragged on, and Kamil, finding it impossible to save the town by force of arms, and anxious at any cost to prevent the Franks from obtaining a footing in Egypt, proposed conditions which were most favourable to the Crusaders. He offered to restore to them Jerusalem and all his own possessions in Palestine (Northern Syria belonged to his brother Khor-ed-din); the true Cross, which Saleh-ed-din had promised to restore, and failed; besides a sum of money and all his Christian prisoners. It seems extraordinary that such terms as these should not have been accepted; but the Crusaders argued that it would be comparatively easy for the infidels to retake Jerusalem as soon as the Crusading army was disbanded, and that it was more important for them to make good their footing in Egypt. The terms therefore were rejected, though by a very small majority. A night attack was made very shortly afterwards, and Damietta fell into the hands of the Crusaders in November of the year 1219 (A.H. 616). Kamil at once broke up his camp and marched southwards to protect his capital.

Damietta was little more than a city of the dead when it was entered by the Crusaders, and fear of pestilence prevented for some time the solemn ceremonies with which the Latin Church proposed to take possession. As usual, they ignored or persecuted the National Church and the native Christians. A Metropolitan see under Rome was established in the city, the principal mosque was converted into a Latin Church, and not even the rights of Nicholas, the Patriarch of the Greek Church in Egypt, were respected. Renaudot gives a list of fourteen titular Latin Patriarchs of Alexandria dating from this act of schism, of whom only the first two appear to have ever been in Egypt.

- Unfortunately there was no Patriarch of the Egyptian Church to remonstrate against these schismatical proceedings, but Nicholas wrote to Pope Innocent, ostensibly to entreat his interference on behalf of the Christian captives in Cairo and Alexandria. He also reported that among the captives was a deacon of the Latin Church, who sought priestly orders from himself in order that he might be able to minister to his fellow-prisoners, but he (Nicholas) could not think of conferring orders on a member of another Church without the express sanction of the applicant's Spiritual Father. The Pope either could or would not see the implied reproach in the courteous letter of Nicholas, and merely commended him for his filial devotion to Rome!

Among the besiegers was the Bishop of Acre, and when the inhabitants of Damietta were sold as slaves he bought up all the babies he could get, in order to baptize them. The need for mothers does not appear to have been considered by him, and five hundred of the poor little things died soon after their baptism—in many cases, no doubt, their second baptism, since it is not recorded that the good bishop troubled himself to inquire whether the parents were Moslem or Christian. Some of the babies survived and were brought up by friends of the bishop.

Meanwhile the Crusading army, leaving their impedimenta with a garrison in Damietta, marched to overtake the Sultan. They came up with him at Mansoura,¹ where a disastrous engagement took place, concerning which each side claimed the victory. Both were evidently too severely crippled to be available for immediate movement, and negotiations began between the two camps, while the Sultan sent to Syria for help and to Cairo with instructions to put the city in a state of defence and prepare for the worst.

This was a difficult matter, since the city had been almost drained of fighting men already. Money could always be obtained, however, by the simple expedient of taking it from the industrious Christians, and on this occasion the Melkite Church fared as badly as the Monophysite, since it was known that Nicholas had been corresponding with the Pope, and was apparently quite ready to transfer the allegiance which he owed to Constantinople to the Spiritual Father of the West. The authorities began by confiscating half the money which the late National Patriarch had left to his sister, and they again tried to induce the Egyptians to consecrate David, since not only did the election of a Patriarch mean heavy fees to the Moslem authorities, but they had good reason to expect a large sum of money from David when the object of his ambition was attained. But priests and bishops poured into Cairo from all parts of the country to protest, and David, who had called a meeting at the Court in favour of his candidature, saw his hopes once more defeated in the uproar and tumult which followed. He seems to have conceived the idea of taking the Patriarchal power by force, without the ceremony of consecration, which he could not obtain; and went solemnly in state as Patriarch, attended by his followers, to celebrate the Liturgy in the church of St. Sergius and Bacchus in the fortress of Babylon. The Egyptians swarmed into the church with loud outcries; but David had apparently a strong guard with him, and finished the office, in spite of the tumultuous protests which rendered it inaudible. His action still further increased the troubles of the Church, and the fall of Damietta brought actual persecution upon the Christians. The priests who had poured into Cairo to protest against the consecration of David were retained by the Moslem authorities and set to forced labour at the works hastily raised for the defence of the city; they were told that they should all be sent to the Moslem camp, where they would be at once put to death by the infuriated soldiery; and finally an enormous sum of money was levied upon them. The Melkite priests were also put to forced labour and heavily taxed. Indeed, the native Christians all over the Delta felt themselves 'between the hammer and the anvil.' They had learned by this time that they had nothing to hope for from the Crusaders, who regarded heretics as no better than infidels, and treated them all alike; while the invasion of the Latin Christians had roused all the Moslem fanaticism from which the Egyptian Christians suffered. The army which had marched to the relief of Damietta had destroyed in revenge every church by which they passed; even the church of St. Mark in the suburbs of Alexandria was levelled to the ground, in case the Crusading army should occupy it as a point from which to attack Alexandria.

¹ Or some village near the present Mansoura, which did not then exist in all probability. It is said to have been built by Kamil after Damietta had fallen into the hands of the Christians.

Kamil, however, was about to reap the benefit of the high character and wise policy which had won him the loyalty even of his own family and the respect of the Egyptian Church. His brothers and cousins thronged from Syria to his relief, and his army was soon in a far superior condition to that of the Crusaders. Moreover, he had carefully calculated his camping ground, so as to be well out of reach of floods, while the Crusaders had chosen the low ground near the river. When the Nile rose, the Sultan despatched a body of men by night to cut the banks of a canal, which flooded the Latin camp with water, and they woke to find themselves in the midst of a lake and cut off from all their stores.

Helpless and suffering from famine, they had soon no choice but to come to terms with the Sultan. There was no talk now of receiving Jerusalem and Southern Palestine; they were forced to be grateful for the permission to retire in safety from the country, and give up Damietta, which it had cost them nearly a year and a half to win.

The defeat of the Crusaders, though hardly regarded as an evil by the National Church, who believed that the Latins would prove no better masters than the Moslems, was a terrible blow to the hopes of the Greek Church in Egypt.

Nicholas wrote a very curious letter to Pope Honorius of Rome after the surrender of Damietta, in which he ignores the National Church altogether, and speaks as if all the Christian inhabitants of the country were ready to become with himself the dutiful subjects of the Pope.

The following is a translation of the letter in full, taken from Neale:—

To the Most Reverend Father and Lord, by divine grace Chief Pontiff of the Holy Roman Church and Universal Bishop, Nicholas, by the same grace humble Patriarch of the Alexandrian see, reverence, prompt as due.

The archbishops, bishops, presbyters, clerks, and laics, and all the Christians which are in the land of Egypt, supplicate your paternity and sanctity with groans and cries. If any Christian church from any accident happens to fall, we dare not rebuild it; and for these fourteen years past each Christian in Egypt is compelled to pay a tax of one bezant and fourteen karabbas; and if he be poor, he is committed to prison and not set at liberty until he have paid the whole sum. There are so many Christians in this country that the Sultan derives from them a yearly revenue of one hundred thousand golden bezants. What further shall I say when Christians are employed for every unfit and sordid work, and are even compelled to clean the streets of the city? It is well known throughout the whole of Christendom how shamefully Damietta hath been lost, and it is unsafe to trust that to letters which to speak by word of mouth is most painful. Have pity therefore on us, our Lord and Spiritual Father! As the Saints, before the Advent of Christ, longed for their redemption and liberation by their Saviour, so we your children expect the coming of the Emperor; and not only we, but also more than ten thousand exiles dispersed through the land of the Saracens. I must not omit, but rather press, what it will be the duty of our lord and Emperor to do on his arrival. This is the way of salvation and health, and which will be free, by God's grace, from danger : let the ships and galleys, whatever their number may be, sail up the river Rasceti¹ and as far as the town which is situated in an island of that stream, called Fueh ; and thus, by God's mercy, they will secure without loss the whole land of Egypt. The river is deep and broad, the island abounds with all necessaries, as the bearer of these presents, one in whom we have confidence, will be able to certify. We know him to be prudent and discreet, and have on that account sent him to you. Nor must I omit one of the greatest misfortunes which have befallen the Christians in Egypt : in consequence of the capture of Damietta one hundred and fifteen churches have been destroyed.

It is not to be wondered at that Kamil grew doubly suspicious of the Greek Church, while he resumed his policy of tolerance and justice toward the National Church. The Melkites were not permitted to restore the lately destroyed churches belonging to their communion, and were compelled to submit to many of the humiliating restrictions formerly applied to all Christians ; while the Monophysites were allowed to rebuild their churches and follow their own habits of life. Indeed, on one occasion, when one of his Emirs had, without any form of trial, seized some monks accused of not paying their taxes and extracted from them by torture the sum of 400 pieces of gold—being all that the monastery possessed—Kamil listened to the remonstrances of a deputation from the monastery, inquired into the matter, and commanded the money to be restored to them. He refused also all the bribes which were offered him to enforce the consecration of the unworthy David. The monks were again exempted from tribute, and on one occasion Kamil himself paid a visit to the still famous monastic settlement of Nitria. He was entertained at the monastery of St. Macarius, and as a further mark of favour he removed a Mohammedan official who had hitherto quartered himself on the monastery. The monks earnestly urged upon him the crying need of a Patriarch, declaring that of eighty priests who had formerly been under the monastery only four remained; for though there were still bishops in the land, these monastic Christians preferred apparently to leave the parishes dependent on them without pastors sooner than abandon their privilege of receiving ordination from the Patriarch alone.

¹ That is, enter the country by the Rosetta branch of the river, instead of again attempting Damietta.

The Sultan assured them that he was not to blame for the unhappy state of affairs, and that when the whole Church was unanimous in their choice of a Patriarch he would gladly give his consent, and would even forego the usual backsheesh on the elevation of a new Patriarch.

It is probable that Kamil, who had shown himself the kindest master that the Egyptians had known for many centuries, was really in earnest at the time, and a terrible responsibility rests on the ambitious and unprincipled man who for his own selfish ends ruined the cause of Christianity and patriotism in Egypt. Bishopric after bishopric fell vacant, and David only rejoiced because the number of his opponents grew less. A man like the late John or fifty others of her already long line of Patriarchs would have used this time of unwonted peace and prosperity to build up and reform the Church of Egypt; even, it is possible, to win over Kamil himself to the faith which evidently had great attractions for him. But it is hardly wonderful that as time went on the Sultan, who saw most of David and his venal following, should have lost all patience with the Christians and all faith in their love for their religion. He found out after a time that his generosity in exempting the monks from tribute had been grossly abused. Hundreds wore the dress who had neither taken nor practised the monastic obligations, merely in order to escape the Government tax on Christians. With justifiable indignation Kamil ordered a searching inquiry to be made, and his officials immediately seized the excuse for extortion from all 'monks' without inquiry. It is recorded that the true monks, no less than the false, suffered very severely. On the whole, the thirty years which cover the reign of Kamil and his two successors are the most melancholy and disgraceful in the record of the Egyptian Church.

Though we can perfectly understand Kamil's change of policy towards the Christians, it is not so easy to explain his sudden change for the worse at this time towards those of his own faith and family. For eighteen years the Sultan and his brothers in Syria had shown a most rare example in any age amongst ruling Oriental families, of good feeling and loyalty. Kamil's brothers had hastened to his defence more than once against their common enemy the Franks, and that without demanding reward or compensation. Nor can we discover any ground of offence, pretended or otherwise, against the Sultan of Damascus, the very brother to whom Kamil owed most, and against whom he declared war about the year 1235. He even sent money to the Crusading Emperor Frederick, and made an alliance with him to seize and share the kingdom of Damascus. Moreover, needing money, he did what he had sworn not to do—he gave his consent to the forcible consecration of David by such few bishops as remained and were not inclined to risk martyrdom for a refusal. Thus after twenty years of intrigue David's iron will triumphed, and he was given the Church of his fathers for a prey.

So sudden and complete a change in the Sultan, without any apparent reason, may perhaps be explained by the conjecture that he was already suffering from the malady which put an end to his life about a year afterwards and had fallen under some strong influence for evil. This may have been that of his second son ; but nothing is known for certain, except the fact that in concert with Frederick he attacked the dominions of his brother, that his brother died immediately afterwards, and that Kamil allied himself with another of his brothers from Mesopotamia to despoil his young nephew of his inheritance. But in 1237 both brothers died, shortly after one another ; and the Sultan Kamil was succeeded in Egypt by his eldest son, who among his many names is known as Melek-el-Adel.

CHAPTER XXV

AN INFAMOUS PATRIARCH

A.D. 1237
A.M. 943
A.H. 634

WHILE the Sultan Kamil departed to wage war against his unoffending brother in Syria, David was left to tyrannise unchecked over the unfortunate Christians. He had begun by assuming the honoured name of Cyril, but resembled Cyril the Great in nothing save his indomitable will. He was enthroned with the greatest pomp and splendour, which deeply offended the Moslems; but in his first ordinations of priests and deacons he conciliated popular opinion among the Christians by abstaining from the demand for fees. Nearly all the bishoprics were vacant, however, and in dealing with these he exceeded all bounds. In a short time he had sold forty bishoprics, thus raising an enormous sum of money and surrounding himself at the same time with an effective force of his own creatures. The nobles of the community remonstrated in vain, and one monk named Peter solemnly renounced his communion and headed a schism from the National Church. To all remonstrances Cyril replied that he was compelled to raise money to satisfy the promises he had made to the Moslem Government. He gave this excuse at a meeting of the better ecclesiastics and laymen held, in the same year that the Sultan died, in the cathedral church of the Moallakah; but swore that now these demands were complied with he would in future abstain from simony.

His next proceeding, if not simoniacal, was a flagrant act of tyranny, which gratified at once his greed of gold and of power. Some of the monasteries in Egypt, like the celebrated one of Macarius in Nitria, had always been Patriarchal—that is, directly under the spiritual authority of the Patriarch, who fulfilled for them all the functions requiring a bishop, exercised certain rights, and received a certain share of the revenues. Many, however, were in the same way subject to the bishop of the diocese in which they were situated. Cyril by an arbitrary edict declared that all the monasteries of Egypt were henceforth Patriarchal, by which means he increased both his income and his rights of personal jurisdiction enormously. In the same way he annexed the episcopal income and jurisdiction belonging to several of the parish churches.

Not content with invading the rights of his own bishops, he proceeded to infringe those of the Patriarch of Antioch. His great aim seems to have been to change the 'constitutional monarchy' of the Egyptian Patriarch into an irresponsible tyranny, like that of the mediæval Pope of Rome. On the pretext that there were many Egyptians resident in Syria who could not understand the language of the Monophysite Bishop of Jerusalem (under Antioch), he proceeded to ordain a Metropolitan for Syria under himself, who went to reside at Jerusalem. The Egyptian bishops and clergy strongly remonstrated with their Patriarch on this act of schism, but only succeeded in getting him to send an embassy to the Patriarch of Antioch, who was then at Jerusalem, to ask his recognition of the intruding bishop. This was courteously but firmly refused by Ignatius of Antioch. Cyril persisted. Ignatius lost his temper and excommunicated the intruder, who appealed to the Latin ecclesiastics of the city. These, aware that their own appointment lay open to the same charge of schism, defended the Egyptian, and gave him their protection. Ignatius proceeded to return evil for evil. He ordained a Metropolitan for Abyssinia, which was clearly under the jurisdiction of the Egyptian Church ; but it is not stated whether the man whom he ordained, and who was an Ethiopian by birth, ever attempted to enforce his pretended claims in Abyssinia.

Cyril's proceedings, however, marked him out as fair game to the Sultan Kamil in the changed attitude of the latter. He arrested the Patriarch on some frivolous charge, and Cyril had to pay 1,500 pieces of his ill-gotten gold before he was liberated. Almost immediately after this Kamil died, and Cyril, it must be feared by systematic bribery, succeeded in securing the favour and protection both of the son Adel, who first succeeded him, and the son who two years afterwards usurped his brother's throne.

For nearly eight years Cyril, by favour of the Moslems, tyrannised over the Egyptian Church in defiance both of the lay nobles of her communion and of the bishops, who, though most of them owed their position to Cyril's rascality, made constant efforts to restrain him and avert the ruin of their Church. Cyril was so unpopular at Cairo that, instead of living in the cathedral fortress of Babylon, he had fixed his residence at Alexandria ; but was constrained at length to come down and meet his bishops in the house of the Governor of Cairo, who was a friend of Cyril's, and doubtless saw the way to make money out of both sides. For the bishops had begun to talk openly of deposing their Patriarch, and this startled Cyril, who knew that, though there was no precedent in the whole history of the Patriarchate for such a course, his bishops might, if pressed too far, take the law in their own hands and create one.

The demands of the bench were not, in truth, unreasonable. The first, that the practice of 'simony' should be renounced, came perhaps with a bad grace from a bench which owed its elevation, almost without exception, to the most barefaced simony. The other demands were—that the rights of the Patriarch of Antioch should be respected; that the jurisdiction of the newly made Metropolitan in Syria should extend no farther than Gaza; that some ecclesiastics whom Cyril had ordained in spite of their canonical incapacity should be deposed; that the Patriarch 'should not affect to imitate the innovations of the Melkites';¹ and that one of the senior bishops should be appointed secretary, as a check upon the Patriarch.

Cyril listened to these demands, but refused to give any reply, and rejected their earnest requests for a formal synod. He employed his time in bribing the Moslem authorities, and by this means obtained the imprisonment of the leader of the movement for reform, a monk named Hamid, and his own dismissal in safety. The scandal of Cyril's conduct, however, grew worse and worse; till fourteen of the bishops came up in a body to remonstrate in 1239, and after some time succeeded in inducing Cyril to call a synod in the Moallakah at Babylon. A series of resolutions were drawn up with great care concerning the reform of the Church, and these were presented to Cyril for his signature in the form of a lengthy document, to which was prefixed the Monophysite profession of faith. Neale gives an abstract of this document, which is here inserted:—

¹ This appears to refer to the fact that he had restored the practice of auricular confession in the Egyptian Church.

None should henceforth be ordained bishop who was not qualified for that dignity by his learning, by the consent of the people, and by a regular 'psephisma';¹ that the consecrations of bishops and the ordinations of priests should be performed gratis, and that ecclesiastical judges should be forbidden under any pretext whatever to receive presents, the whole under pain of excommunication; that the Patriarch, assisted by a council of the most experienced bishops, should draw up a compendium of the Canons, particularly with respect to the sacraments and matrimonial and testamentary causes; that copies of the document should be distributed throughout Egypt, and that all future ecclesiastical cases should be determined according to it; that a General Synod should be held annually in the third week after Pentecost; that the traditions of the Coptic Church should be preserved; that circumcision, except in case of necessity, should take place before baptism; that none who had been a slave should be raised to the priesthood, except in Ethiopia and Nubia, where this rule might be relaxed in favour of otherwise deserving candidates; that the sons of uncrowned mothers should, both themselves and their posterity, be incapable of ecclesiastical promotion; that the Metropolitan of Damietta should retain that dignity; that neither the Patriarch nor any of the prelates should presume to hold an ordination beyond the limits of their respective dioceses; that the Patriarch should not presume to excommunicate any of the faithful in another diocese till after due monition given to its bishop that he should himself perform the excommunication, and, if the prelate refused, the Patriarch might then act on his own authority; that the same rule should hold with regard to absolution ; that the lately created Patriarchal churches should return to obedience of their diocesan bishop ; that the tribute paid by the monasteries to the Patriarch should not be exacted unjustly nor tyrannically ; that the Patriarch should not compel a bishop to ordain any unwilling candidate ; that the Patriarch should not claim a right over the offerings made in the various churches of his diocese on festivals, unless the bishop of the diocese had consented before his consecration to commute for these the ordinary pension paid to the see of Alexandria ; that the accusations of monks against each other should not be rashly received, and that in settling these differences laics should not be employed as judges ; that no bishop should be excommunicated for a trifling cause, nor without three admonitions from the Patriarch, two by letter and one by word of mouth ; that an Hegumen (or head of a monastery) should be considered as of the same rank as a Protopope, and should therefore pronounce the absolution when a priest of lesser rank was celebrating, and receive the communion immediately after the celebrant. Finally, that none of the faithful should incur excommunication by attending on a festival the divine office in a church out of his own diocese.

¹ A ψήφισμα at Athens was a proposition passed by a majority of votes, opposed to a προβούλευμα (decree of the Senate) and to a νόμος (fundamental law of the state).

Cyril did all he could to escape signing this document, but the bishops were firm, and flatly told him that, unless he did so, they would one and all break off communion with him. Thus constrained, he signed ; and the compendium of the Canons which they had insisted on was drawn up, signed, and distributed to the different dioceses as agreed. It contained nineteen sections in five chapters. One section is devoted to baptism, seven to marriage, one to wills and bequests, eight to the laws of inheritance, and two to the priesthood.¹

¹ The man who drew up this compendium of the Canons was Safi-el-Fedail, commonly known as Ebn Assal, a distinguished theologian of the National Church.

Shortly after this synod the young Sultan of Egypt was deposed by his brother Melek-el-Saleh, and the revolution was attended with the usual licence and anarchy, in which the Christians suffered most. Cyril managed, however, to secure the favour of the usurper, and, breaking all the oaths that he had sworn, he continued his scandalous practices unchecked. Not only insatiable greed both of money and power characterised all his actions, but an excessive cruelty, and the Government authorities endeavoured to bring him to trial themselves in a regular manner, but no two bishops could be got to witness against him in a Moslem court, or to acknowledge any jurisdiction on the part of the Moslem where they or their Patriarch were concerned. They called another meeting among themselves, however, with the lay nobles of the Church, and again entreated Cyril to observe the laws of the Church and to promise reformation. Cyril answered them with biting scorn, and in truth the position of all those who had bought their preferment from him was almost intolerable. For very shame they could not pursue the matter further; but one of the lay members of the Church stuck to his ground, and eventually constrained Cyril to sign another paper. In this he appointed a faithful priest to administer the revenues of the Church (which he had systematically appropriated to his private use) according to a plan laid down. He promised to consecrate (without fees) new bishops for two sees which he had kept vacant in order to pocket the revenues and keep the jurisdiction in his own hands; to appoint two schoolmasters at Babylon and Cairo; and to permit the monasteries to remain under their own episcopal authority. But when this paper was submitted to the Council it was rejected as insufficient, and the meeting broke up without any definite result.

In 1240 one of Cyril's own followers, disgusted with his avarice, betrayed him to the Emir of Cairo, who threw him into prison, and again endeavoured to make his bishops give evidence against him. This they still refused to do, but in a private consultation with the Emir—the Sultan Melek-el-Saleh was away fighting in Syria—nine of them admitted that all the charges against their Patriarch were true. At the same time they offered Cyril to forgive and forget, if he would sign a document which was very similar to the one he had signed the year before. Cyril signed, obtained his release, and continued to act precisely in the same manner as before. In 1241 the bishops made an endeavour to depose him, and informed the Emir of their purpose. The Emir, who seems to have been wonderfully favourable to the Christians, asked if it could be done according to their law. They were compelled to confess that the Patriarch could not legally be deposed, except with his own assent, since no synod called without him would have the necessary authority. In a similar case the Pope of Rome has been known to subscribe sentence against himself; but this, of course, Cyril would never have done. He was heavily fined again by the Government, but continued his evil practices for more than a year longer. No one but his own creatures would communicate with him, and when he died, in the February of the year 1243, there was but one feeling among the Egyptians—of relief and thankfulness.

It is difficult to estimate the harm done to the Egyptian Church by this man, whether as David, during the twenty years when his intrigues and bribes kept the Church without a Patriarch ; or as Cyril, during the eight years when he robbed her with both hands, and brought her to the lowest pitch of shame and humiliation in the eyes of the Moslems. The bishops were struggling with him at Cairo most of the time, to the neglect and scandal of their different dioceses. The name of the Patriarch, which had been to all true Egyptians a rallying-point for honour, every sentiment of patriotism, and reverence—and, whatever their faults, the line of Egyptian Patriarchs will compare favourably with any line of kings or bishops—became a by-word among them for dishonesty and degradation. No Patriarch since the days of Benjamin had so fair an opportunity to serve the Church of Christ as the successor of the saintly John VI., under a Sultan like Kamil. And no Patriarch of Egypt, since the days of St. Mark until now, has so persistently, so shamelessly disregarded every obligation of his high office, or done more to bring the Church into disrepute and degradation. In the extremest persecution it was never known that a bishop of the Church of Egypt had apostatised to the faith of Mohammed. But the Patriarchate of Cyril III. is marked by this disgrace also—that in a time when the Christians were protected and permitted to live their lives in peace the Bishop of Sandafa renounced the faith of his fathers and became a Mohammedan.

Cyril left the Church in such a state of anarchy that no attempt was made for some time to elect another Patriarch. For seven years the bishops managed the affairs of the Church each in his own diocese. It is possible that the laity and the best of the ecclesiastics desired to wait for the death of one or two of the worst of Cyril's creatures, in order to make sure of being able to elect a good man. During most of this time Egypt was at peace, and the following extract from Ibn Said,¹ who travelled in Egypt between 1240-49, will form a pleasant interlude between the records of strife and war.

Ibn Said says :

Now when I was staying in El-Kâhira, I had a great desire to see El-Fustât. So a kind friend accompanied me. And I saw at Bâb Zawila an immense quantity of donkeys for the use of those going to El-Fustât, such a number as I never saw before. So my guide mounted one of them, and signed to me to mount another. Now I was ashamed to do this, according to the custom I had inherited in the Maghrib : so he informed me that it was not considered shameful for the notables of Egypt. And I saw the Fukaha riding them, and also persons with fine clothing, and persons of high position : so I mounted ; and when I rode gently the donkey-boy made a sign to the donkey, and away he flew with me, and raised such a black dust as blinded me, and soiled my clothes, and I had a dreadful experience. And from my ignorance of how to ride the donkey, and the pace at which he ran, after a method I had never before witnessed, and the unmercifulness of the donkey-boy, I stopped in that thick dense cloud of dust, and said :

In Misr I foregathered with bitter misfortune :

I rode on a donkey, the dust in my eyes :

Behind me a donkey-boy swifter than tempest,

Who knew of no mercy, nor heeded my cries.

I asked him for quarter,—he heeded no jot,

Till I fell on my knees in precipitate wise :

All above me the dust formed a cloister to shade me,

And curtained the daylight away from my eyes.

So I paid the donkey-boy his fare, and said to him : ' All I ask of you is to let me walk on my own two legs.' So I walked, and reached the city ; and I calculated the distance between El-Kâhira and El-Fustât, and found it to be about two miles. And when I approached El-Fustât all gladness left me. I observed blackened walls in bad repair, and dusty spaces. And I entered the gate, which was ajar, and led to a scene of ruin with ill-placed buildings and crooked thoroughfares built of blackish brick and reeds and palmwood, storey above storey ; and round about the doors such a quantity of black dust and refuse as to horrify a cleanly man and close the eye of a nice one. So I went on, and walked in the narrow markets, where my sufferings from the crush of the people with their wares, and waterskins carried on camels, were such as can only be done justice to by witnessing and undergoing them ; until at last I arrived at the mosque. And I observed in the matter of the narrowness of the streets which surround it, the contrary of what I have mentioned in the case of the mosque of Ishbîliya [in Spain] and the mosque of Marâkish [Morocco]. Then I entered, and saw a great mosque,¹ of ancient structure, without decoration, or any pomp in the mats which ran round part of the walls and were spread on the floor. And I observed that the people, men and women alike, made a passage of it, treading it under foot, and passing through it from door to door to make a short cut : and the hawkers were selling in it all sorts of kernel-fruit, and biscuits, and such like, and the people ate of them in many parts of the mosque, neglecting the reverence due to the place, according to the custom holding amongst them in such matters. And a number of children were going about with vessels of water to those who ate, and made a living out of what they got from them : and the remains of their food lay about the court and corners of the mosque ; and roof and corners and walls were covered with cobwebs ; and the children played about the court : and the walls were written upon with charcoal and red paint in various ugly scrawls written by the common people. Nevertheless, in spite of all this, this mosque has a certain grandeur and magnificence of effect upon the feelings, which you do not experience in the mosque of Ishbīliya, in spite of all its decorative display, and the garden in its midst. And I observed that I experienced in it a soft and soothing influence, without there being anything to look upon which was sufficient to account for it. Then I learned that this is a secret influence left there from the fact that the companions of the Prophet (may God accept them!) stood in its court whilst it was building. And I was pleased with what I observed in it of the circles of students sitting round those appointed to lecture in the Kurān and theology and syntax in various parts: and I enquired about the sources of their livelihood, and was told that it came from the legal alms and suchlike: I was also told that it was very difficult to collect it, except by means of influence and great trouble. After this we left the mosque, and passed on to the shores of the Nile. And I saw a quay with dirty, dusty soil, neither clean nor extensive nor straight in its length, and without any white wall along it; but nevertheless much frequented by the ships and vessels of all sorts which arrive from all the lands of the earth. And as for the Nile, verily, if I say that I never saw on any river what I saw upon that bank, I say naught but the truth. And the Nile is at that point narrow, because in the midst of the water is the island¹ upon which the present Sultan of all the lands of Egypt² has built his citadel,³ nearer to the side of El-Fustāt: and the beauty of its lofty stuccoed walls lends a charm to the view from the shore. Ibn Haukal mentions the bridge which reaches from El-Fustāt to the island; it is not very long: and from the other side of the island to the western bank, known as the Giza bank, is another bridge. But the people cross the river, both themselves and their beasts, mostly in boats, for these two bridges are held in reverence because they come in front of the Citadel of the Sultan, and no one passes on horseback over the bridge between the island and El-Fustât, out of respect to the abode of the Sultan. And we passed that night in a high-placed chamber built out on the roof of a house by the side of the Nile.

¹ This translation of Ibn Said is taken from the writings of Corbet Bey.

¹ The mosque of Amr ebn Aas.

¹ The island of Rhoda.

² Melek-el-Saleh, younger son of Sultan Kamil.

I never tasted water sweeter than the Nile water : and I never saw people more polite than the people of El-Fustât ; they are even more so than the people of El-Kâhira, which is about two miles off. And in a word, the people of El-Fustât reach the extreme of politeness and softness in their address, and underneath this surface an extent of flattery and carelessness of the observance of the claims of old friendship and length of social intercourse, which would be long to relate. As for the merchandise from the sea of Alexandria and the sea of the Hejâz [i.e. the Mediterranean and Red Seas] which comes to El-Fustât, it is beyond description : for it is here that it is collected, not at El-Kâhira, and from here it is forwarded to all parts of the country. And it is in El-Fustât that we find the sugar and soap factories, and most other suchlike establishments : for El-Kâhira was built for the especial use of the soldiery : and in like manner all the accoutrements of the soldiers are finer in El-Kâhira than in El-Fustât, as also the work of the weaver and the goldsmith and all manufactures of royal magnificence. And in El-Fustât the state of ruin is widespread : while El-Kâhira is in better repair and more populous and crowded, on account of the Sultan's having changed his residence to it, and because the troops live in it. Still, at the present day [i.e. about 1245 A.D.] the spirit of repair and growth has breathed upon El-Fustât, on account of its closeness to El-Gazîra As-Sâlihiya [i.e. Rhoda], and many troops have been transferred to it, to be close to their duty, and a number of them have built along the walls pleasure houses which are a delight to look upon.

CHAPTER XXVI

ST. LOUIS IN EGYPT

A.D. 1245 IN 1245 a new Crusade was proclaimed in Europe, and the
 A.M. 961 Egyptian Sultan—or the Sultan of Babylon, as, notwith-
 A.H. 643 standing the destruction of that city, he was still called by the Crusaders—left Egypt in 1248 to fight against an allied army of Franks and Saracens, apparently in the expectation that the new Crusading army would land in Syria.

King Louis of France, however, had intended from the first to begin by attacking Egypt, and in 1249 he landed his army on the shore near Damietta. A large force of the Moslem troops were at Damietta at the time, but they made no attempt to oppose the landing of the Franks, for news had just arrived that Melek-el-Saleh had been brought back from Syria in a dying condition, and, as usual, the mercenary troops were more concerned with the question of his successor than with the defence of a country to which few of them belonged. They abandoned Damietta without striking a blow; and all the stores, treasure, and munitions of war which Melek-el-Saleh had sent to Damietta in expectation of a long siege fell into the hands of the French on June 29, 1249. This loss accelerated the event for which the Saracens were looking; the rage of the Sultan increased his fever, and he died early in November at Mansoura. As usual, the Crusaders lost their advantage by remaining in Damietta during these four months, while they quarrelled over the division of the spoil and indulged in the wildest debauchery. The good king was powerless apparently to restrain his followers, and occupied his time in pilgrimages to the churches and in perpetuating the schism of which the Latin Church had been guilty in 1219, thirty years before, by appointing a new Latin Patriarch of Damietta. Nicholas, the Patriarch of the Greek Church in Egypt, had died in the same year as the infamous Cyril; and though he had nominally been succeeded by a man named Gregory we know nothing of the latter beyond his name, and no protest of his is recorded against the proceedings of the Crusaders.

In November the Count of Poitiers, who was brother to the King of France, joined the Crusading camp, and a council was called to decide whether they should march to attack Alexandria or Babylon (Cairo). He gave his vote for Cairo, and the march began; but from the first they were harassed by the Saracens, who were now headed by a woman named Shajar-el-dur. This woman, an Armenian by birth, had been the favourite slave of the late Sultan and mother of his only son, Ghayath-el-Din Touran Shah. She had concealed the Sultan's death, and was giving orders in his name in order to secure the throne for her son, who was still in Syria. In this she was entirely successful. While the French waited idly in Damietta, and the Mameluke army waited restlessly for the death of the Sultan to choose their new leader, this woman, with the aid of the chief eunuch and the Emir Fakhr-ed-din, issued her orders, strengthened her defences, and waited for her son.¹ It is said that Shajar-el-dur had in the same unacknowledged way governed Egypt for some years while her husband and son were fighting in Syria.

Learning wisdom by failure, the Franks advanced more cautiously, and in February, 1250, they surprised the Moslems near Mansoura and massacred a great number of them. But the Mameluke regiments rushed to their assistance, and the Crusaders were beaten back. Constant skirmishes took place between the two armies, but no real advantage was gained on either side till the arrival of the young prince Touran Shah, when a battle was fought, in which the Crusaders were defeated with great loss.

The condition of the latter was indeed desperate, and a terrible account of their sufferings is given by the Sieur de Joinville. They had sent to Damietta for stores, but none came, and at length they discovered that the 'Saracens' had drawn their boats on to the land, conveyed them secretly across the country, launched them again between Damietta and Mansoura, and totally destroyed the convoy which was coming to the king's relief. On hearing this the King of France gave orders for a retreat to Damietta, and sent to arrange a truce with the Saracens, who nevertheless fell upon them as soon as the retreat had begun and slew many thousands, so that the river was almost choked with the corpses. The king and all his nobles were made prisoners, and hundreds were slain without further trial than the simple question whether or no they would renounce their faith. On their denial they suffered instant martyrdom by beheading. Makrizi declares that in this manner perished one hundred thousand of the French. The king and his nobles were also threatened with torture and death because they refused to swear to conditions of liberty which they knew they could not honestly fulfil; but, finding that threats were useless, the Saracens gave up these conditions, and consented to make it a matter of ransom. The Queen of France was in Damietta, where she was delivered of a son only a day or two after she had heard of her husband's captivity, and King Louis agreed to send to her for the money. The Sultan demanded the enormous sum of a million bezants (about 500,000 louis d'or) for the nobles and the army, and Damietta for the person of Louis himself. The King of France agreed at once to these terms, and this so much astonished the young Sultan, who had expected the long haggling indispensable from every bargain in the East, that, not to be outdone in generosity, he immediately took off 100,000 of the sum, which was fixed at 400,000, and the further condition was agreed to on either side that all the prisoners should be exchanged. The day for the king's departure was fixed, and peace seemed thoroughly established between the two armies, when one of the military revolutions to which all the Moslem kingdoms have been so constantly subject changed the condition of affairs. No one, as usual, was ever able to say precisely how it began. But the Mameluke regiments who composed the greater party of the Egyptian army had never cordially accepted the son of their late master. Empire, according to their ideas, should fall to the strongest. The right of inheritance could have no meaning for these European slaves, ignorant of their own parentage and knowing no home or country but their regiment. Only the strong wise head of the woman Shajar-el-dur had prevented open mutiny from breaking out before Touran Shah's arrival, and since he had taken the power into his own hands the discontent of the Mameluke Emirs could no longer be restrained. Some say there was a quarrel about the division of the money to be received from the Franks; but the account of the final scene in the life of the last descendant of Saleh-ed-din was written by an eye-witness, the Sieur de Joinville.

¹ Makrizi says that Touran Shah was not really her son, but the son of one of the Sultan's wives.

After describing the large pavilion which had been erected for the Sultan on the banks of the river, with its three towers of wood covered with cloth from which Touran Shah could survey the whole country, and speaking of the sounds of tumult which arose from the tent where the Sultan was entertaining his principal Emirs, the Frenchman describes the murder:—

The Sultan, who was young and active, fled to the tower he had built, with three of his imans who sat at meat with him; and this tower was behind his chamber, as you have already heard. Those of the Halca, who were 500 mounted men, levelled the Sultan's tents, and surrounded the tower to which he had fled with the three imans, and called to him to come down. Then he said he would do so, provided they spared his life. They replied that they would force him to come down, and that he was not in Damietta. So they discharged Greek fire, which caught the tower, which was made of fir poles and calico. The tower burnt rapidly, so that I never beheld a fire so bright and straight. When the Sultan saw that, he hurried down and fled towards the river by the path which I mentioned above. Those of the Halca had broken up the pathway with their swords, and as the Sultan hastened along towards the river one of them smote him between the ribs with a lance, and the Sultan fled on, dragging the lance after him. They plunged in after him, swimming, and came and slew him close to the galley where we were.

One of the knights, whose name was Phares ed din Oktai, cut him in twain with his sword and tore out his heart. Then he went to the king, with his hand all covered with blood, and said to him : 'What wilt thou give to me who have slain thy enemy who would have made thee die had he lived ?' But the king answered him never a word.

Immediately after the murder the French nobles were seized by the Mamelukes who had done the deed and laid head and heels together in the bottoms of their own galleys. They expected nothing but death on the following morning, and indeed the Emirs seemed to have quarrelled about it all night ; but love of money was too strong for the majority, and on the following day they were again set at liberty and allowed to proceed to Damietta.

Once more it was the woman Shajar-el-dur who had saved Egypt from anarchy, and now, by a sudden caprice of the Mameluke Emirs, each unwilling to vote for any man but himself, she was proclaimed Queen of Egypt. If the Emirs had been capable of such sentiments as moral courage, gratitude, or chivalry, it would have been well for Egypt ; but not even the experience of the wisdom of their choice could keep them loyal to it in the face of the ridicule which was poured upon them from all other parts of the Saracen world, and the experiment only lasted three months. Shajar-el-dur had chosen one of the chief Emirs, Eibeg (Ibek, Ybek, Eibeg, Aybak ; all these names are spelt differently by each historian), as her Wuzir or Atabek, and in this short time they had honourably concluded the war with the French, and turned their attention to the government of the country and the relief of taxes. In Syria and Baghdad, however, Shajar-el-dur was unknown, and the fact that the Emirs of Egypt had elected a queen to reign over them was received with incredulous astonishment and indignation.

Is there no one man among you worthy to be Sultan? (wrote the Kaliph from Baghdad). Then will I give you one from hence. For what says the Prophet: 'Woe to the nation that is governed by a woman.'

Damascus flatly refused to own allegiance to a queen, and opened her gates to the Sultan of Aleppo, while all the other Egyptian possessions in Syria followed suit. The Mameluke Emirs of Egypt gave way at once. They forced the queen to whom they had sworn loyalty a few months before to abdicate; but as they chose for their Sultan the Emir Eibeg (under the names of El Melek el Moez el Jashenkyr el Turkomani Iz el din), and as Eibeg immediately married Shajar-el-dur,¹ the change was at first more nominal than real. But it was the beginning of fresh divisions. In order to secure himself, the Sultan Eibeg was forced to admit an eight-year-old grandchild of the Sultan Kamil to a nominal partnership in his throne. The poor child gained nothing from this but a cruel death in one of the dungeons of the citadel little more than a year afterwards, and with him ended the royal race of Saleh-ed-din the Kurd.

¹ Shajar-el-dur was not the queen's real name, but a nickname signifying 'The Tree of Pearls.'

CHAPTER XXVII

THE FATE OF A MOSLEM QUEEN

.D. 1250 THE followers of Mohammed, whether Turk or Arab, have
.M. 966 been the great slave traders of the world ever since his
.H. 649 immediate successors overran and destroyed the ancient civilisations of the East. Slavery, of course, has been known since the earliest dawn of history ; it was the recognised fate of captives taken in war, and slaves have always been bought and sold for domestic servants since the world began. But in these earlier forms of slavery there always seems to have been one humanising influence, a sense of responsibility. In some of the ancient nations a slave had certain rights which only the worst masters ventured to disregard. Among the Hebrews he could legally claim his freedom after seven years' service ; in most cases his ultimate freedom depended on his own conduct, and not on the arbitrary caprice of his master. But under the Moslems the slave was a mere chattel, with no rights beyond those of a beast of burden. It was the Arab slave trade which sapped the strength and morality of the Christian kingdoms of the Soudan, and eventually rendered them an easy prey to the Moslem ; it was the Turkish slave trade which created that terrible tyranny of the Mamelukes under which Egypt groaned for centuries, and from which she has not yet recovered.

It was the quarrels between the two armies—the free Turks on the one hand, and the black slaves on the other—which had brought about the downfall of the Fatimite dynasty; and Saleh-ed-din, perceiving that neither Turk nor Arab would submit to the discipline necessary to make a really effective army, had adopted a new development of the policy of slave armies. He could not obtain blacks in sufficient numbers for his purpose without conquering the Soudan, and this he evidently came to the conclusion would be too desperate a venture. He therefore employed slave merchants in the mountainous countries of Southern and Eastern Europe to purchase systematically all the boys they could get by force, fraud, or fair bargain, who were suitable for his purpose. These were brought up as Moslems and soldiers; ignorant of their parentage, in some cases even of their nationality; and entirely dependent on the favour of their military commander. All Saleh-ed-din's descendants had followed his example, so that now almost the whole army of Egypt was composed of these European slaves. They were divided into regiments, each with a distinguishing mark sewn upon their garments; and were subject to no laws except the will of their commanding Emir, who at first was generally a freeborn Turk or Arab of good family, but afterwards came to be appointed or even elected from among the Mamelukes themselves. The last Sultan, Melek-el-Saleh, had so greatly increased the number of these fighting slaves that the barracks could not contain them, and very extensive new ones had been built on the island of Rhoda. From their chief barracks being situated on an island in the river, or Bahr, the Mamelukes whose headquarters were there came to be called the Baharites.

The new Sultan of Egypt had been a Turkish slave and had risen to the command of the Baharite Mamelukes. While he remained under the influence of his wife Shajar-el-dur, all went well in Egypt; though in Syria the Sultan of Damascus, who was of Saleh-ed-din's family, refused to recognise a Mameluke slave as any better qualified to rule Egypt than a woman. He made overtures of friendship to the French, who on leaving Egypt had gone to Syria. As this alliance would have been fatal to the Mamelukes, Eibeg hastened to forestall the Sultan of Damascus, and effected an alliance with the French on condition that the remainder of the ransom, only half of which had been paid, should be remitted, and that all the boys whom the Saracens had taken prisoners in the late wars and were educating as Mamelukes should be restored. It was also stipulated that all the Christian heads with which the ramparts of Cairo had been ornamented should be taken down and honourably buried. The Baharites agreed to these terms, and added a present of an elephant, which was the first seen in France.

Thus free from all fear of a coalition between the French and Turks of Damascus, Eibeg and Phares Oktai, the Emir who had given the final stroke to Touran Shah, went out to meet the army in Syria, and finally drove them back in confusion.

But the first encounter had ended in defeat for the Mamelukes; and on his return to Cairo, Eibeg found that the Arabs in Egypt had seized the opportunity to throw off the hated yoke of the Mamelukes, and to declare allegiance to the Sultan of Damascus. They mustered in the Said in great strength, but were defeated in the first pitched battle by the Turks. In revenge Eibeg gave up the two Masrs to the pillage of his Mamelukes. He shortly afterwards treacherously murdered the Emir Phares Oktai,¹ whom he feared as a rival, and caused the child who was supposed to share his throne to perish in prison.

Whether Eibeg's cruelty or his impolicy most estranged his wife it is impossible to say, but they became enemies, and Shajar-el-dur lived apart from him for some time. Then she heard that he was about to marry the daughter of the Sultan of Mosul, and the cup of his offence was full.

It was not, of course, that the Moslem wife expected to be all in all to the man whom she had raised to the throne. Moreover, she had borne him no son; and therefore, like all of her faith, she fully recognised his right to repair the omission on her part through the instrumentality of other women. He had the usual harem, and one of his concubines had already presented him with a son, and earned her freedom thereby. But to give his consort a rival of royal birth, who would expect to take precedence of her and usurp the queenly state to which Shajar-el-dur had been accustomed, this she could not tolerate. She issued her commands, and the thing was done. Five white slaves strangled Eibeg in his bath, and Shajar-el-dur, sending for the two principal Emirs of the Mamelukes, showed them her husband's body, and offered on the spot to bestow her hand and the kingdom on one of them.

¹ Makrizi tells a curious story of the adventures of twelve Mamelukes belonging to the troop of Phares Oktai, who took flight into the desert of 'Tih Beni Israel' after the murder of their master, and lost their way. After five days' wandering they saw in the distance a town, and rode all that day towards it. On the sixth day they entered a deserted city solidly built 'of green marble.' Sand had drifted into the silent streets and houses, but in one shop they found clothing which fell into dust when they touched it. In the same shop were nine pieces of gold graven with the figure of a gazelle and Hebrew characters. These they took, and by digging they found a spring of fresh water, which was of far more value to them for the moment. Having thus refreshed themselves, they left the deserted city and marched all night. In the morning they fell in with a troop of Bedouin, who guided them to Karak. At this place they offered the gold they found in the green marble city to the money changers. One of them at once declared that this money had been coined in the time of Moses, and insisted on knowing where it came from. The Mamelukes told the story of the deserted city, and found that the Jews of Karak knew of its existence by tradition. They declared that it had been built by the children of Israel during their forty years' sojourn in the desert.

Both refused bluntly the perilous honour, and departed. In the early morning the Mamelukes of Eibeg's regiment surrounded the palace, calling for vengeance on his murderer. The young son of Eibeg was elected to succeed him, and the first act of the boy was to deliver the murderer of his father to the vengeance of his own mother. The unhappy queen was beaten to death in the harem by the wooden clogs of the women, and her body thrown out into the desert below the citadel, where it was half eaten by the dogs before anyone saw to its burial.

About this time, either in the year 1257 or 1258, one of the great obelisks which still marked the deserted city of Heliopolis fell to the ground. It must have been, as we know that some of them were, cased in metal, for it is recorded that the fallen obelisk yielded 200 cantars of copper. 'The summit alone,' says Makrizi, 'produced ten thousand pieces of gold.'

During the troubles of the past ten years the Christians, though suffering with the rest, had not been subjected to any official persecution, and in the early period of Shajar-el-dur's reign they had ventured to elect another Patriarch after the throne had been vacant seven years. Cyril's successor was a man named Athanasius, elected in 1250, who did his best to repair the mischief caused by his predecessor ; but the mere fact that almost all the bishops owed their consecration to Cyril's greed of money must have made it terribly difficult to deal with them, and apostasy among the Christians had become frequent. When Eibeg was murdered, his young son was put under the charge of an Egyptian named Theodorus, who for the sake of advancement had, under the Patriarchate of Cyril, renounced his Christianity and taken the name of Sherif-el-dyn. He was a physician by profession, and showed great ability as Prime Minister to the boy-Sultan. As might be expected, he hated the Christians whom he had betrayed, and he levied a double tax upon them, though he did not otherwise openly oppress them. But peace and good government were the last things desired by the Mamelukes, and in little more than a year there was another revolution. Sherif-el-dyn, more loyal to his earthly master than to his heavenly one, strove desperately to defend his pupil, but was taken prisoner and crucified at the gate of the citadel. Eibeg's son was also murdered, and the Emir Seyf-el-din took the kingdom under the name of Melek-el-Mozaffer. He reigned barely a year, which he spent in Syria, fighting against a great invasion of the Tartars, and was murdered on his return journey by another Emir of the Mamelukes, who on the strength of this and other achievements was elected Sultan in his stead.

This man may be considered the first real Sultan of the Mamelukes, though, not counting Shajar-el-dur, he was the fifth who had usurped supreme power. His names were Roukh-ed-dyn, Beybars-el-Bondokary, El Melek-el-Daher, Abou-l-foutuh El Alai; and he is generally known as Beybars, Bibars, or Bibros.

Bibars, who was a tall fair European with blue eyes, took the throne in 1260 (A.H. 658), and soon showed that he had some idea of the responsibilities of a ruler. He regulated the taxes with some regard to justice, and received with great honour the Kaliph of Baghdad, who had lost everything but his life in the invasion of the Tartars. He organised the pilgrimage to Mecca, which had been neglected in Egypt for twelve years; and on the Governor of Mecca refusing entrance to the Egyptian pilgrims Bibars made a speedy march upon that city, killed the governor, recovered possession of the holy places, and returned to Cairo. When in 1262 a terrible famine broke out in Egypt, Bibars opened his granaries and fed thousands of people daily, while he sent hastily abroad for further supplies. After the famine was over he celebrated the circumcision of his son with great pomp; and as a thank-offering to God he paid the expenses of the circumcision of six hundred and forty-five other children at the same time, who were carried in solemn procession in the robes which he had given them. The presence of the Kaliph gave additional solemnity and splendour to this public spectacle.

Being, either from policy or conviction, a good Moslem,¹ it was not to be expected that Bibars should show much toleration to the Christians. Besides, he wanted money for his wars in Syria. At this time the Patriarch Athanasius died, and two men, John and Gabriel, were marked out as candidates, for whom the votes were equal. The question was decided by the Heikeliet in favour of Gabriel, but John bribed the Moslem authorities to insist on his own consecration. In the present state of the Church the bishops had not patriotism enough to resist. John was consecrated, and governed the Church for nearly seven years. The money thus acquired, however, was not enough for the Moslems, and a fresh pretext was seized on the occasion of a fire in Cairo, which almost destroyed a great part of the town. The Christians were accused of having caused it, and compelled to pay 50,000 dinars, nominally to repair the city, but the money was really used for the expenses of the wars which Bibars carried on all through his reign. While he was absent in Syria, in 1269, the Egyptian bishops took courage to depose John and consecrate the lawfully elected Gabriel as their ruler. But in two years' time Bibars returned. John appealed to him with the money which was his strongest argument, and was reinstated in spite of the Church. Gabriel died soon after, and John was left undisturbed till his death. But the Egyptian Church in her list of Patriarchs inserts Gabriel's name before that of John, to mark her sense of his superior claim. On Bibars' return he was received with the greatest honour in Cairo; the city was decorated, and his entrance was a triumphal procession.

¹ At one time he absolutely prohibited the sale or manufacture of beer throughout Egypt, and constantly endeavoured to do the same by wine. He had one of his principal Emirs strangled because he was convicted of drinking wine. The use of coffee was discovered in Yemen about this time, but was not introduced into the West till nearly three centuries later. Many devout Moslems would not touch it, placing it in the same category as wine.

During the Patriarchate of this John, the Emperor of Abyssinia again sent to Egypt for a Metropolitan. It is evident from his letter¹ that the Emperor's father ¹ I address my request to the Patriarch of Alexandria, our Father John, whom I salute with all the reverence due to the successor of Mark and Annianus.

Listen to my words, and grant me my request. Send me a virtuous Metropolitan, who will be able to instruct me in all things good and useful. Follow the counsel of the Prophet David, who in his Psalm had introduced Greek Prelates from Syria, and that his son was anxious to restore his country to the jurisdiction of the Egyptian Church.

The Greek Church had recently made an effort to assert herself in Egypt as well as in Abyssinia. During the early years of the reign of Bibars, the Emperor of Constantinople had sent a special embassy to request that the Sultan of Egypt would permit the election of a Patriarch for the Greek Church in Egypt, which was then without a head. Bibars consented, and an oculist was chosen and sent to Constantinople to be consecrated. But nothing more is known of him, and even his name is given differently by different writers.

Towards the close of the thirteenth century, and probably in the reign of Bibars, an incident occurred which shows how great was the respect paid to the Patriarch of Egypt in Abyssinia. An Egyptian merchant had sent a has addressed to you these words: 'O my son, do not leave your sheep to the fangs of the wolf.' These Syrian Metropolitans who reside in Abyssinia have only attracted our hatred. We have always belonged to the Patriarchate of Egypt; nor should we so long have suffered these strangers to exercise episcopal functions, we should have chased them from their thrones, only that they enjoyed the protection of our father, who had near him no bishop of your choice. But now do not permit the ruin of a kingdom which is under your charge, and send us a Metropolitan, to the end that our Lord Jesus Christ shall rain blessings upon you. Think upon St. Mark, and do not abandon us to punish us for our sins. Choose for us a Metropolitan; or, if the thing does not depend on you, demand permission from the Sultan to do so. When you have granted our demand you shall obtain all that you most desire. Do not suffer that these Syrians should any longer exercise authority in our country. For the rest, if you tell us to expel them, we will expel them. If you command us to keep them with us, we will execute your orders. You have disapproved of our conduct with regard to them; but deign to pardon our fault, that our sin may be remitted. Pardon also all our compatriots, and let your benediction repose upon us in life and death.

considerable sum of money to his agent in Abyssinia. The agent died, and his master found himself without any means of recovering his money. He appealed to the Sultan, who recommended him to apply to the Patriarch of the Christians. The Patriarch (in all probability John VII.) consented to help him, and wrote to the Emperor of Abyssinia begging him to use his influence to get the money restored safely to its owner.

When it became known that a letter from the Patriarch had arrived in Abyssinia, all the governors of the different provinces hastened to receive it. The letter was placed on the ——. ¹ He who bore it and his followers were supplied with horses ; and were magnificently fed and lodged in all the countries through which they passed before arriving at the capital. Here the king received the messengers with every mark of distinction. On the following Sunday the letter was publicly read by the Metropolitan in the cathedral and in the presence of the king. While it was read the king stood with his head uncovered to hear it, and immediately afterwards he gave orders for the money to be brought and handed over to the Patriarch's representative. Besides the money, the king loaded him with presents, and he was conducted out of the country again with the same state which had attended his entrance.

While the Sultan's attention was engaged in Syria and Asia Minor, the King of Nubia was ill-advised enough to draw attention upon himself by an invasion of the province of Assuan, where he did considerable damage. The Emir of Kous promptly started off in reprisal, and, invading Nubia, penetrated some way towards Dongola, pillaging the country and laying it waste. He made prisoners of several Nubian nobles—among others, of the viceroy of the northern province—and on Bibars' return to Cairo they were presented to him as trophies. Bibars with the barbarity of his kind had them all cut asunder in the middle of the body.

¹ A word I have been unable to decipher.

This David seems to have been a very unpopular King of Nubia, and in 1275 (A.H. 674) his nephew Shekander, who, according to the Nubian law of succession, was his heir, sought refuge at the Court of the Slave-Sultan, and disgraced his faith and lineage by betraying his own country to the Moslems. Bibars was, of course, delighted with the chance offered to him, and sent a numerous army under two of his principal Emirs to invade Nubia, with the ostensible purpose of asserting the rights of the heir Shekander.¹ The Nubians came to meet the invading army, and fought with great courage, but were eventually overpowered. The Moslem Emirs advanced into the interior, spreading devastation on every side and killing or seizing for slaves all whom they found in their line of march. The viceroy of the southern province submitted to acknowledge Shekander as his king instead of David, and was allowed to retain the governorship of the country. David with a fresh army came to meet the invaders, but was defeated, and his mother, sisters, and brother were taken prisoners. David saved himself by flight, and Shekander was proclaimed king in his stead on the following humiliating conditions :—

He was to cede to the Sultan of Egypt, the northernmost province of Nubia (which was a fourth part, and that the most fertile part, of the whole kingdom). He was to revive the ancient tribute of 400 slaves, from which Nubia had been free for more than two centuries, and in addition

¹ This name is probably a corruption of Alexander.

- to the slaves was to send yearly to the Moslem ruler of Egypt three elephants, three giraffes, five panthers, one hundred dromedaries, and one hundred bullocks. He was to set at liberty all the Moslems who had been taken prisoners by David in his recent descent on Egypt. He was to send to the Sultan all the treasure and all the herds belonging not only to David, but also to all the Nubian nobles who had fallen in the late war. He was to consent to the establishment in Dongola of Moslem officials to look after the collection of the tribute due to the Sultan. A church which the impolitic David had caused to be built by the forced labour of the Moslems whom he had captured in his recent expedition was razed to the ground, and gifts which had been presented to it to the value of 13,000 dinars (?) were seized by the Emirs.

From this date the ruin and downfall of the Christian kingdoms of the Soudan became a mere question of time. Once more the collection of slaves for tribute necessitated perpetual fighting and anarchy, so that all good government became impossible, and the kingdoms of the Soudan were set one against another, instead of making common cause against the Moslem. The richest province of the Nubian kingdom had been lost, and it was no longer possible to keep the Moslems out of the interior. In their new province the Emirs of Bibars offered the inhabitants the usual choice: the faith of Islam, tribute, or death. As generally happened, the inhabitants chose the tribute, and every male Christian paid annually the poll-tax of one dinar. The Moslem army only occupied Dongola seventeen days, and, having concluded the treaty, returned to Egypt.

Next year, when heading an expedition against the Tartars in Syria, Bibars died of his own superstition. A total eclipse of the moon presaged, as he believed, the death of a prince. He suspected a young prince, grandson of Touran Shah, the last Kurdish Sultan, of intent to poison him, and determined to cheat the oracle by arranging that the unfortunate youth, against whom there was no shadow of evidence, should die instead of himself. He filled a cup with poison, which he offered to the unsuspecting prince, who drank without hesitation. Then Bibars left the room, and during his short absence one of the servants, not knowing what had happened, refilled the cup. When the Sultan came in again, restless and feverish, he took up the same cup in ignorance and drank from it. There was still poison enough in it to kill him, and the two princes expired within an hour or two of each other.

During his reign Bibars had done a good deal for Egypt. The fortifications of Damietta, Rosetta, Alexandria, and Cairo had been repaired and strengthened, public granaries had been built at Cairo, bridges had been repaired, canals renewed, and many celebrated mosques had been rebuilt and repaired. He also built a new one, to the north of Cairo, of great size and magnificence. The square in which it stands, on the road to Abbasyieh, is still called Il Daher or Zahir, after one of the names of the Sultan Bibars. The four walls of the mosque are there, and much of the beautiful tracery is left in the windows, but the building has long since lost its religious character. The French turned it into a fort about a hundred years ago, and after their expulsion the Moslems continued to use it as a military post. It is now a commissariat depôt of the British army.

¹ It is said that more than once on urgent occasion the Sultan went with all his Emirs to help in the repairing of a canal, and carried a basket of earth with his own hands 'in the sight of all the world' by way of setting an example.

Bibars had so firmly established himself on the throne of Egypt that no objection was made by the other Mameluke Emirs to the succession of his son Barkah Khan. But there could be no lasting sentiment of loyalty under the circumstances, and within three years the two young sons who successively bear the empty title of Sultan in the lists were deposed or slain, and another of the Mameluke Emirs, Seyf-ed-din Kalaoun-el-Elfi, possessed himself of the throne of Egypt.

CHAPTER XXVIII

TWO INVASIONS OF THE SOUDAN

A.D. 1281
A.M. 997
A.H. 681

THE new Sultan was a Mameluke of uncertain nationality, whose nickname of El Elfi commemorated the fact that in his youth he had been bought for the sum of 1,000 (elf) dinars. He had, as usual, to fight for his usurped position in Syria, but crushed the revolt against him without much trouble. In the next year, 1282 (A.H. 682), he was, unfortunately for Egypt and the Soudan, free to occupy himself with their affairs. The Christians had already suffered cruel injustice under the brief reign of Barkah Khan;¹ and Kalaoun, though in the first year of his reign he remitted certain taxes equally for his Moslem and Christian subjects, soon renewed all the vexatious and humiliating restrictions upon the latter, which generally fell into disuse whenever the Sultans were fighting away from Cairo. At such times no one took any particular notice of the civil administration except the permanent officials, who were always Copts and generally Christians ; no Turk or Arab being capable of the work. Kalaoun's interference soon produced acute discontent among all the Egyptians, whether Moslem or Christian ; and the Slave-Sultan, after the fashion of his kind, resolved to teach his subjects a lesson. He turned his Mameluke army loose upon Cairo, and for three days the unhappy city was given up to murder and pillage. No attempt was made to discriminate between the innocent and guilty, the streets ran with blood, and were encumbered with the corpses of men, women, and children. At length the Ulemas took courage and approached the Sultan with the thunders of religion. They not only succeeded in stopping the carnage, but so successfully worked on the superstitious fears of Kalaoun that he undertook to make expiation, in the form of a mosque combined with a great Muristan, or hospital for the incurable and insane. Of this, only the tomb remains ; the mosque which now forms part of it was added by his son ; the hospital has long been disused, and small remains of it are left.

¹ In the year 678 of the Hejira all the Christians in the War Office were dismissed and replaced by Mohammedan clerks. This wholesale dismissal of Christian employees happened several times under Moslem rulers, but sooner or later it was always found necessary to take the Christians back. On the same day that this edict was published the monastery of Khandak, in the suburbs of Cairo, was razed to the ground, an immense rabble pouring out of Cairo to assist in its destruction.

Kalaoun's attention was fortunately diverted from the government of the country to a safer and more congenial occupation, the reorganisation of the uniforms of the Mameluke regiments, which kept him out of mischief for a whole year. He added very greatly to the numbers of the army, but almost all the boys he bought were Circassians, as it seemed to him that these made the best soldiers. He had little faith in the loyalty of the Baharite Mamelukes, and changed his Wuzirs so often that contemporary historians have not attempted to record their names.

In 1286 (A.H. 685) Ador, the king of the southernmost kingdom of the Soudan, sent ambassadors to the Sultan of Egypt to complain of the latter's vassal, Shekander, King of Nubia. The precise cause of complaint is not stated; but probably Shekander had been raiding the southern kingdom for slaves to supply the yearly tribute demanded by his Moslem suzerain. The latter gladly seized the opportunity to send an officer back with the envoys of King Ador in the double character of ambassador and spy. He made the journey in safety; but Shekander was on the watch for the spy's return from the south, and, though his escort made a considerable detour to avoid passing through Dongola, they were arrested and brought before the King of Nubia. He gave orders that they should all be put to death; but the nobles of his Court interposed and indignantly demanded if the king were mad. They pointed out that, little as Kalaoun might care about the subjects of Ador, the murder of his Moslem ambassador would give him just the excuse he wanted for the invasion of Nubia. As Shekander was obstinate, they deposed him and made Shemamoun king in his stead. The Moslem and his escort were permitted to return to Egypt in safety; but Kalaoun's intentions were not turned aside, and he almost immediately despatched a large army to invade Nubia. Shemamoun adopted singular tactics. He wrote to the viceroy of the northern province to attempt no resistance, but to evacuate the country as the Moslems advanced, leaving as little as possible for the Moslems to destroy. In this way the Emirs penetrated without fighting the whole way to Dongola, where Shemamoun was waiting to give battle. He was defeated, however, and fled into the interior. Then the Moslems took the son of Shemamoun's sister and made him king, on condition of his owning allegiance to the Sultan of Egypt. After this they returned to Egypt, carrying with them great booty of flocks and herds.

No sooner had they quitted the country than Shemamoun reappeared, his subjects received him with joy, and the king who had promised allegiance to the Sultan of Egypt was turned out of the country with the Moslem garrison which had been left in Dongola. Kalaoun, furious at this unexpected turn, prepared to conquer Nubia in grim earnest. All the militia—as that part of the army was now called which consisted of free men, whom long descent had taught to call themselves Egyptians, in distinction from the Mameluke or slave regiments—was ordered on this service, besides 40,000 mercenaries recruited from the Arab tribes of the northern provinces. Once more the Moslems swept through the Nubian kingdom, set up a new king in Dongola who had been dragged from a Cairo prison and was also nephew to the former King David, made him swear fealty to the Sultan of Egypt in the principal church of Dongola, left a garrison in that city, and returned to Cairo at the end of six months. Once more they had hardly left the country before Shemamoun reappeared in Dongola, the whole land returned to its allegiance, and the Moslem garrison was conducted beyond the frontier. This time, however, Shemamoun did not allow their kingly nominee to leave with them, but put him to death by torture. Kalaoun did not attempt a third expedition, and Shemamoun reigned in peace till his death.

Kalaoun did not live very much longer. His eldest son and heir died of a fever, and his father is said to have felt the loss very much. He sought distraction in a fresh war against the Christians in Syria, took the city of Tripoli, massacred all the inhabitants, and razed the town to the ground. This, however, was his last exploit, and he returned to Cairo, where he received an embassy from the King of Arragon shortly before his death.

His eldest son, Saleh-ed-din Khalil Melek-el-Ashraf, proclaimed in the following year (1291) a holy war against the Franks, and did, in fact, dispossess them of Acre after an obstinate siege. He massacred all the inhabitants and destroyed the walls. He also brought to Egypt as a trophy of victory the portal of one of the principal churches of Acre, which may be observed to this day in the copper bazaar, where it forms one of the entrances to the mosque of his brother Nasr ebn Kalaoun. During his short reign also this Sultan built the well-known bazaar Khan Khalil, which is the constant resort of tourists; it was built on the site of some ruined tombs of the Kaliphs.

After his victories in Syria the Sultan invaded Armenia, ravaged the country, and took the city of Erzeroum. On his return to Egypt a fresh persecution broke out against the Christians, in which they show to less advantage than at any other time in their history. Generally, whatever their faults at other times, a persecution has brought out all the latent heroism of the Copts, who guard against their own weakness to this day by branding themselves with the sign of the cross,¹ in order that they may put it out of their own power to deny that they are Christians.

¹ This branding—or, to speak strictly, tattooing—is not done in infancy, but when the boy is old enough to know what it means and to give his own consent. There is also an old tradition among them that Egypt will one day be delivered from the Moslem yoke by the Christians of the South (Abyssinia), and that this mark will make it easier in that day for the invaders to recognise the faithful.

But ever since the time of the infamous David (Cyril III.) the character of the Egyptian Christians had undergone an accelerated process of deterioration. Apostasy was no longer infrequent, and Christians in the employ of the Government were too often Christians only in name, as they were now signally to prove, and misused the power entrusted to them.

The persecution, indeed, began with a street riot, occasioned by the fact that the Christian steward of one of the principal Emirs rode through the streets of Cairo with one of his master's debtors, who was a Moslem, walking at his side under arrest, with his hands tied behind him.

The people gathered round at this, so that by the time he came to the crossway of the mosque of Ebn Touloun a large crowd followed him, every man of which entreated him to let go the prisoner, but he would not grant their request.

They then mustered in greater number, pulled him down from his steed, and set his prisoner free. This happened near the house of his master, to whom he sent his servant to ask him to come and deliver him from his assailants. He came out with a batch of the Emir's slaves and body-guards, who rescued the secretary (or steward) from the crowd, and began to ply their sticks and to disperse them. But they shouted 'It is not lawful!' and they ran hastily until they stopped under the citadel, and cried 'God help the Sultan!' He heard them and sent to inquire about the matter. And they made known to him the overbearing way the Christian secretary had behaved towards the agent (the debtor), and what followed.

The Sultan then sent for Ain-el-Ghazal and addressed him thus: 'How can thy people behave as they have done towards Moslems for the sake of a Christian?' Ain-el-Ghazal excused himself, saying that he was busy at his office and knew nothing about it. Then the Sultan sent to fetch all that were in Ain-el-Ghazal's establishment, and ordered the people to bring to him all the Christians. He also sent for the Emir Bedr-ed din Beidar, the governor, and the Emir Sandjar esh Shodjai, and ordered them to bring before him all the Christians, to put them to death. These two Emirs, however, did not leave him till the matter was decided (till they had persuaded him to reconsider his decision), and it was cried throughout Cairo and Masr that no Christian or Jew should remain in service with an Emir. And he ordered all the Emirs to propose the faith of Islam to all the secretaries they had, and to cut off the heads of all those who refused to embrace it, but to retain in their service all who did. He also gave orders to the governor (Bedr en Naib) to make the same offer to the Christians of the Court and to treat them the same way.

An order was given to look for them, and they hid themselves ; but the people forestalled them in their own houses, which they plundered until the sack was general, both of the Jews' houses and of those of the Christians, one and all. They led away their women captive, and put to death a number of people with their own hands. Then the Emir Bedr en Naib went up to the Sultan about the conduct of the people, and coaxed him till he (Bedr the governor) rode to Cairo and proclaimed that whosoever plundered the house of a Christian should be hanged. He also beat a number of the people, and marched them about the city after having scourged them. Thus the plunder was stayed, but not before they had plundered the church of the Moallakah in Masr (Babylon), and had put to death a quantity of people there.

Then the governor brought together a number of secretaries of the Sultan and of the Emirs, and placed them before the Sultan, at a certain distance from him. The Sultan then ordered Esh Shodjar and the Emir Djendar to take those men with them, and to go down to the horse market under the castle, there to dig a large grave, to throw into it all the secretaries now present, and to light a fire of wood on the top of them.

Then the Emir Bedr came forward and pleaded for them, but the Sultan would not receive his plea, saying, 'I will not have a Christian Diwan in my Government.' Yet the Emir did not quit the Sultan until he had consented to this—that so many of the secretaries as embraced the faith of Islam should be retained in their office, but that those who would not should have their heads cut off.

He therefore brought them out to the house of the governor of the city (his own official residence), and said to them: 'O ye, all of you, I have not been able to prevail with the Sultan on your behalf but on one condition, which is—that he of you who prefers his religion is to be put to death, but that he who prefers El Islam shall receive a robe of honour, and it shall be well with him.'

Then El Makin ebn esh Shikai, one of the secretaries of State, came forward and said to him: 'O lord, which of us men, high in office, would choose death for this good religion? By God—a religion for which we should have to die and go—God has not written on it His peace! Tell us, you—the Sultan and thyself—the religion you wish us to choose and to follow.'

Then Bedr burst out laughing and said to him, 'My good man, what other religion should we choose but El Islam?' Then El Makin replied, 'O lord, we know not; do you tell us, and we will follow you.'

Then the public notaries came in, made them Moslems, and wrote a deed of witness thereof, wherewith Bedr went in to the Sultan, who clothed them with robes of honour, and they went in them to the council of the Wuzir Es Saheb Shamse-ed-din Mohammed ebn Selous. One of those present addressed El Makin ebn esh Shekai and handed him a sheet for him to write upon, saying, 'O Kadi, our master, write on this sheet.' He answered, 'O my son, it is not for us to decide.' They did not leave the council of the Wuzir until the evening, when the warder of the gate came to them and took them to the council of the governor, where the Kadis were already assembled ; and there the secretaries renewed their profession of Islam in their presence.

And thus, from men despised they became honourable and honoured through embracing Islamism. But they also began to despise the Moslems, and to lord it over them with a violence which Christianity would have forbidden them to use.¹

The usual fate of the Mameluke Sultans overtook Khalil shortly after. He was murdered in his harem, at the instance of an Emir who hoped to succeed him ; but the Mamelukes of Kalaoun murdered the usurper in his turn the next day, and chose Nasr, the younger son of Kalaoun, who was only nine years old, to be their nominal Sultan. The real power they gave to one of themselves, Zeyn-ed-din Ketbogha, who shortly after murdered his principal rival among his fellow-slaves, and, sending the child Nasr to be imprisoned in the fortress of Karak, he proclaimed himself Sultan of Egypt.

Ketbogha reigned two years, to be in his turn deposed by Lajyn, another of his fellow-slaves, who seems to have been of German origin. Lajyn reigned about the same length of time and was murdered by one of his own slaves ; another Mameluke Emir was proclaimed one day and murdered the next ; and for forty days the throne remained vacant while the Mameluke Emirs quarrelled among themselves. Eventually they agreed to recall the boy Nasr, and govern in his name.²

During these years Egypt had suffered greatly from

¹ Makrizi (Malan's translation).

² In the year that Nasr was recalled to Cairo such heavy rain fell that many tombs were entirely wrecked by the water rushing down from the Mokattam hills.

natural causes as well as from oppression and anarchy. Pestilence and famine had almost decimated the population. Athanasius, the Patriarch of the Greek Church in Egypt, deserted his post and fled to Constantinople. John, the Egyptian Patriarch, died in the same year that Ketbogha usurped the throne, and was succeeded by Theodosius, of whom we only know the curious fact that he was a 'Frank,' perhaps the descendant of one of the French captives taken in the invasion of St. Louis. For the six years of his Patriarchate the Christians enjoyed a brief respite from persecution, but worse days were in store for them. Nasr seems to have attributed his misfortunes to an unholy tolerance of the Christians in his realm, and the chief Kadi was the son of one of those men who had apostatised from Christianity, and was bitter against the Christians. The first year of Nasr's return to power¹ was the first year of a new century, which is one of the saddest in the records of the Church of Egypt.

¹ In this year also cattle plague broke out in Egypt, and raged with such virulence that but few beasts were left alive. A native of Ashmoun Tana, who had 1,021 head of cattle, lost all but eighteen of this great herd.

CHAPTER XXIX

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CHURCHES

A.D. 1300 THE eighth century of the Hejira, which corresponds to A.M. 1016 the fourteenth century of our era, gives us an almost A.H. 700 unbroken record of persecutions suffered by the Egyptian Christians at the hands of their Moslem rulers.

The Mohammedan writers assert, and it has been the fashion for most Christian historians to accept the assertion without inquiry, that these persecutions were brought upon the Christians by themselves; that they were, to use the complacent words of Neale, 'occasioned by their own fault.' But a careful examination of the statements in Makrizi and other Moslem writers, on which this charge is founded, show that they are absolutely insufficient to establish it. The complaints of arrogance and harshness brought against them resolve themselves into the simple fact that the Christians presumed upon their admitted indispensability to the Moslem Government to behave as free men and not as slaves. They disregarded the vexatious and cruel laws which had been in former times passed for the express purpose of humiliating and oppressing them, and which were still unrepealed. They dared to appear in white turbans; and when one of them, high in Government employ, was seen riding publicly through the streets on a horse, followed by a crowd of petitioners, it was felt that severe measures must be taken. The principal Moslems clamoured for the destruction of all the Christian churches, as well as for the enforcement of all the penal laws against them; and though the Governor of Cairo refused to grant the former demand, he did not dare to refuse the latter. He sent, however, for John VIII., the National Patriarch, and the principal men of both the Jewish and Christian communities, and warned them that he could not answer for the consequences if they did not oblige their people to obey the laws against them. John VIII. at once wrote letters to all the dioceses, ordering that the Christians should wear blue turbans and girdles, and refrain from riding on horses or mules on pain of excommunication, since in such matters the powers that be were to be obeyed. The churches, though only a few of those recently built were destroyed, were ordered to be shut up; but this order the Patriarch did not attempt to enforce, and in consequence it was neglected, except in Cairo for a time during which disobedience would have been followed by the total destruction of all the churches and popular riots. All the care and wisdom of the Patriarch, however, could not entirely avert the storm when once popular fanaticism was aroused. Once more the whole army of Christian clerks was dismissed from Government service; once more the mob hooted and stoned inoffensive Christians daily in the street, or pulled down and savagely beat anyone who ventured to ride even on the permitted ass. In Alexandria and the Fayoum the popular riots against the Christians were particularly fierce, and the Government did not attempt to restrain them. The festival of the Nile—or the Feast of the Martyr, as it was by this time called—was forbidden, and the lives and property of the Christian and Jewish populations were in hourly danger all through the country.

Such was the state of things for three years, till an embassy from the King of Barcelona arrived with the ransom of a prisoner who had been recently taken in war (probably in Syria), and the envoys were horrified at the state of things they found in Egypt. They offered the Sultan large additional sums if he would permit the churches to be opened, and the presents were accepted. Some relief was certainly given, but Makrizi records with apparent pride that only two churches were permitted to be opened ; and further records that, though the prisoner was freed and allowed to depart with the ambassador, they were afterwards pursued by order of the Sultan. Probably the pursuers disguised themselves as robbers. All that had been given them was taken from them, and the unfortunate prisoner was retaken and put in irons. Makrizi appears to think this rather a fine action on the part of the Sultan.

During these three years of persecution, in the year 1301 the Moslem population of the Said, who were chiefly the descendants of Arab settlers, rebelled against the rule of the Mamelukes. Several of the chief Mameluke Emirs were despatched to crush the rebellion, which they did with pitiless ferocity. The greater part of the population was put to the sword, so that the stench of their corpses filled the land. Sixteen hundred of the principal landowners were seized and all their property confiscated. Innocent and guilty, Moslem and Christian, were involved in the same wholesale ruin ; in some of the districts no man was left alive, only those women and children who were not worth being taken as slaves.

Next year a terrible earthquake contributed to the ruin and demoralisation of the country. Some towns—notably Kous—were entirely destroyed. The fourfold cities of Cairo were left ‘as though they had been overthrown and ruined by an enemy.’ The young Sultan was far from happy in his kingdom. He gradually realised that his violence against the Christians had only thrown the whole civil administration of the country into confusion without conciliating his Moslem subjects, or at any rate those whom he had most reason to fear, the Mameluke Emirs. By the year 1309 he had grown so weary of the constant complaints and disputes that, under pretext of making a pilgrimage to Mecca, he retired to Kerak, and from thence sent word to the Mamelukes that they might choose whom they liked to reign over them—he would have nothing more to do with it. But when they took him at his word and elected one of his own slaves—Rokud-dyn Bibars II.—Nasr ebn Kalaoun changed his mind. He went first to Damascus, where he was welcomed as the true Sultan, and then marched down to Egypt. The Mameluke Emirs flocked to his standard, and Bibars II., hastily collecting all the treasure in the citadel—which is said to have amounted to 300,000 dinars, and to which no doubt the recent plunder of the Christians had largely contributed—fled to Akhmin. He was, however, pursued by Nasr ebn Kalaoun, the treasure recaptured, and himself strangled.

The rest of the reign of Nasr ebn Kalaoun, which lasted thirty years longer, shows him in a very different light. Taught by experience, he did his best to protect the Christians, both from the violent rapacity of the Mamelukes and the religious fanaticism of their Moslem fellow-subjects; and occupied himself in valuable public works, and in an endeavour to restore good government to the distracted country. But though the respect and good-will of the Sultan could do something, he was often powerless to restrain the outbreaks of popular fanaticism, and ten years after his return (1320) fresh outrages roused the Christians at last to retaliation.

The beginning of the affair was simple enough. The Sultan desired to build a jetty on the Nile bank for the convenience of his new Meidan.¹ It should be remembered that the Nile bank of 1320 is not the Nile bank of to-day. The river has shifted a good deal to the westward, and its old bed is covered with the houses of modern and even mediæval Cairo; for the new buildings were erected as soon as the ground was dry. In the time of Nasr ebn Kalaoun there was a newly-formed island, between Cairo and Boulac, upon which was already built a mosque, a mill, and several houses with spacious gardens, which were a favourite resort of the people of Fostat. Still, in years of flood it is recorded that the island was covered with water, and the streets converted into canals, while the inhabitants went about in boats. The eastern branch of the river which washed the town of Fostat was, however, always shallow; and, as time went on, it dried up altogether. The eighth century of the Hejira is full of records of the formation of new islands, which gradually became part of the eastern bank in Cairo, and of the ineffectual attempts of the Mohammedan rulers, at vast expense, to control the river.

¹ The literal translation of the word Meidan is 'riding school,' which would give a false impression. It was a great open court belonging to one of the Sultan's palaces, to which he used to descend every day from the citadel.

In the particular spot of this half-dry channel, which the Sultan had fixed upon for his jetty, on a fragment of older and higher ground, stood the church of Zehry. If left alone, it would have occupied a conspicuous place on an island in the middle of the little basin which the Sultan was digging to receive the waters of the Nile, and this would have been a constant offence to the Arabs. Still, the Sultan shrank from giving orders for the actual demolition of the church, and merely desired his men to dig very closely all round it, so that it might become undermined and fall in of its own accord. But though the church was left, as it were, suspended in the air, it still refused to fall, and the complaints of the Moslem workmen grew loud. Angry murmurs ran through the country that the Sultan was favouring the Christians, and Mohammedan fanatics were not wanting to the occasion. How, or by whom, the plot was formed was never known, but about three weeks afterwards the smouldering fire of fanaticism broke into open flame.

It was on a Friday, in the burning splendour of a June day, that the signal was given. On that day, at the hour of noonday prayer, when the faithful were gathered in crowds into the mosques, alike 'in Cairo, in Alexandria, in Damanhour, in Assiout, in Manfalout, in Kous, in Assuan, and in five other of the principal towns in Egypt,' the same thing happened. At the close of the prayer a fakir—who appears in each case to have been a stranger—suddenly raised himself from among the congregation, and cried out with strong trembling, as of one who receives a command direct from Heaven, 'God is great! God is great! O my brethren, let us go forth and destroy the churches!'

In most cases the Moslem crowd needed no second bidding. In Cairo the cry was raised in three places at the same moment—on the site of the excavations before the church of Zehry, in the mosque at the citadel, and in the great university mosque of El Azhar. The first church to fall was the obnoxious Zehry, of which not one stone was left upon another. Everything of value was stolen by the crowd, which then rushed towards the church of St. Mena, in the Hamra quarter. This church had been from time immemorial a special object of veneration to the Egyptians, who sent offerings to it from all parts of the country, so that it had at this time one of the richest treasuries in the kingdom, not only in money but in beautiful vestments, vases, and other works of art. Around it lived a large colony of Christians, who 'had retired from the world,' without apparently any definite monastic establishment.

The crowd flung itself upon these buildings, and in an hour or so they were sacked from top to bottom, and the defenceless inhabitants beaten and despoiled. Being, however, more intent on plunder than destruction, they did not stay to pull down the buildings, but swept on to the Church of the Maidens, near the aqueduct, in the precincts of which there were also a great number of monks and nuns living. They broke open the gates, dragged out more than sixty nuns who had hastily taken refuge within, pulled the very clothing off their backs, and pillaged everything they could find. Then they set fire to the Church of the Maidens, and to another hard by which had shared in the general wreck. Still unspent, the wave of destruction swept southward to Babylon.

By this time, however, the news of the outbreak had gone before them. The gates of the old fortress—which enclosed then, as now, six churches—were hastily closed, and the Egyptians prepared to defend themselves. At the same time the Sultan, hearing the noise of the riots—for another mob was engaged in destroying the churches of the Mouski and the Zawilah—sent in haste to inquire the cause, and, hearing what was going on, bestirred himself at once to prevent further mischief. Word was brought to him that the Kasr-el-Shamma (the Arab name for the old Roman fortress in Babylon) was holding out against a besieging mob, but could not do so any longer, unless help were sent speedily.

The Emir Idgamish, accompanied by four other Emirs and a troop of cavalry, galloped off to Babylon. The captain of the watch had preceded him and personally endeavoured to restrain the mob, but had been driven back by a shower of stones. The mob were in the act of firing the gate, which had resisted all their efforts to break it open, when Idgamish charged up, sword in hand, at the head of his troop and shouted his command to stop. The great crowd wavered and fell back for a moment, and Idgamish seized the occasion to make loud proclamation that any man found on that spot after the expiration of one hour should be instantly put to death.

It was enough. The multitude took to their heels with the greatest promptitude and the churches of the fortress were saved. Idgamish remained at his post till the hour of evening prayer, in case of a renewal of the attack, and on retiring he left strict orders with the commander of the watch that he should pass the night on guard before the Deyr. He left him a reinforcement of fifty men.

Meanwhile the Emir Alamas, who appears not to have relished similar orders given him to quell the riot and save the churches, found those which he had been told off to protect already level with the ground, and leisurely retraced his steps to acquaint the Sultan with the fact. The Sultan ordered the immediate arrest of the fakir who had given the signal in the mosque of the citadel, but was informed that he could not be found. The streets were full of men laden with the spoil of the churches and the Christians. On being interrogated, they invariably declared that the Sultan himself had ordered the publication of the command to destroy the churches. There appears, however, to have been no reasonable ground for this accusation against him; and as, on the succeeding days, letters arrived from town after town with the same report of riot and destruction of churches, the Sultan became furious and declared that the ringleaders should be punished.¹ From this apparently startling intention his Emirs with difficulty restrained him, pointing out to him, says Makrizi, that the events which had happened could not be attributed to human agency, since no one,

¹ The following churches are known to have been destroyed at this time.

In Cairo:—The church of Zehry; a church within the walls of the citadel on the place called 'the Ruins of the Tartars'; the church in the Hamra quarter; the Church of the Maidens, near 'the Seven Aqueducts'; the church of Mari Mina; the Church of 'the Guardians of the Leopards'; a church in the Greek quarter; another in the military quarter; two in the street of Zawilah; church near the flag depôt. One church at Khandak; four churches in Alexandria; two churches at Damanhour; four churches in the province of Garbiah; three in the province of Sharkiah; six in the province of Behnesa; eight in the province of Siout and Manfalut; eleven in the towns of Assiut and Assuan and Minieh and li Kasib; one in Atfih; nine in Fostat; the Convent of the Mule and numberless other convents.

not even the Sultan himself, however much he had wished it, could have organised so simultaneous and widespread a rising. It became him rather to recognise the hand of God, who wished to punish the Christians for the arrogance and impiety with which they clung to their own faith.

This view of the matter, however, did not commend itself to the Egyptians, exasperated by this climax to a long period of injustice and oppression, and it is to be feared that there is some truth in the Mohammedan account of a plot formed by the monks of the Toura Convent called the Monastery of the Mule to revenge themselves on their oppressors.

About a month after the destruction of the churches incendiary fires broke out in several places at once in the towns of Cairo and Fostat. From Saturday till Sunday evening the first fires lasted; and hardly had they been with great difficulty brought under than fire broke out in another quarter; and this time, aided by a wind so strong that it wrecked the boats upon the river, it bade fair to consume the whole town. The air was thick with smoke, and from every minaret the fakirs and holy men lifted up their voices in loud supplication to the Almighty. Night came, but the fire only burned more fiercely, and the air was full of shrieks and lamentations. On the Tuesday morning the Sultan gave orders to guard all the gates of the town, and to impress every water-carrier into the public service, while the carpenters and masons were set to pull down houses before the fire in order to check its onset. No one, of whatever rank, was exempt from personal service to save the town; and the great street which led from the Bab Zawilah was filled with water till it presented the appearance of a river. Still, every day fresh fires broke out, and the vigilance of the authorities could not relax for a moment. By public proclamation the inhabitants of each quarter were ordered to place in every street a cask or a *zeyr*¹ full of water, ready for emergencies, so that the price of casks and jars rose to an extraordinary height.

Popular acclamation had already accused the Christians of firing the town, and at length on a Friday in the same month (July) two monks were caught going out of the college of Kehar, just after fire had broken out in that place. The Sultan was immediately informed of the arrest, and commanded that they should be put to the torture. Hardly had the Emir bearing this order descended from the citadel than the populace dragged before him another Christian, whom they had found in the Mosque of Zahir and upon him several bags full of naphtha and pitch. On being put to torture in the presence of the Emir he declared that he had been given these bags and told to deposit one of them in the Mosque of Zahir. †

The monks under torture confessed that they belonged to the Monastery of the Mule, and that it was they who had fired the college. Kerim-el-din the Kadi, whose house had been set on fire and barely saved, suggested that the Patriarch of the Egyptians should be sent for, since he always knew everything that was going on among his people, and was consulted by them on every occasion. John IX., who had peaceably succeeded John VIII. a few months previously, was therefore sent for under cover of the night and a guard of soldiers, for fear lest he should suffer at the hands of the infuriated populace. On being confronted with the three Christians who had been arrested, in the presence of Kerim-el-Din they repeated to the Patriarch the avowal they had already made to the Mohammedan authorities. John burst into tears, and explained that there were fanatical Christians who desired to revenge themselves upon the Mohammedan madmen who had destroyed their churches.

¹ A zeyr is a very large jar of porous clay.

The Patriarch was dismissed in safety and honour, and Kerim-el-Din¹ even went so far as to order a mule to be made ready, that he might ride back to his house. But he was recognised by the wild mobs swarming in the streets; they surrounded him, and would have torn him to pieces, had not the captain of the watch stood by him and brought him off in safety. In the morning, when the Kadi, according to his custom, came out of his house to go up to the citadel, he was in turn surrounded by a howling mob, who cursed him for protecting the Christians after they had set fire to the houses of the faithful. Kerim-el-Din, however, nothing daunted, went up to make his report to the Sultan, and assured him that it was only a handful of ignorant madmen among the Christians who were really to blame. The Sultan ordered the torture to be applied again and with far greater severity to the prisoners, apparently in the expectation that they would give up the names of richer and more influential Egyptians. But in the midst of their torments they held firmly to what they had before stated—that the whole conspiracy was the work of fourteen monks of the Monastery of the Mule, eight of whom had undertaken to burn Cairo, and six the town of Fostat. Babylon was to be left untouched, since, as seems probable, the remains of that ancient city were then, as now, entirely occupied by Christians. On this second confession messengers were at once sent to the Monastery of the Mule, who brought back as prisoners all the monks they could find. Four of these were burnt in the midst an enormous crowd.

¹ Kerim-el-Din was a Copt, and his family had not been Moslems for more than a generation.

From this moment the excitement of the Mohammedans of Cairo and Fostat increased to such a frantic pitch that all pretence of law and order was abandoned. Every Christian whom they met was murdered and plundered without remorse. They turned against the Sultan, who had given them peace and prosperity for ten years past, and one morning as he descended from the citadel to the Meidan he found all the streets blocked by a surging mob, who howled at him and called aloud upon Allah to protect the faith. The Sultan held on his way, but hardly had he entered the Meidan than the captain of the watch reported to him that two Christians had been caught in the act of setting fire to a house. He gave orders that they should at once be burnt alive in the presence of the multitude. As the execution was being carried out, Kerim-el-Din in his official robes passed by the place, and the mob instantly turned their fury against the Kadi, and flung a shower of stones upon him. He was forced to retrace his steps and take refuge, pursued by the howls of the mob, in the Meidan. The Sultan hastily demanded the reason for this fresh outbreak, and on hearing from Kerim-el-Din what had happened he was furious with anger, and appealed to the Emirs with him for their counsel in the matter. Emir Seyf-el-din proposed that a messenger should be sent to ask the rioters what they wanted, and Djemal-el-Ain suggested that, as it was well known that hatred of the Christian officials was at the bottom of the affair, there was now no need to have recourse to violent measures ; it would be sufficient to pacify them by at once dismissing all the Christian officials from the Government offices. Neither of these recommendations pleased the Sultan, who, on the contrary, at once desired the Chamberlain to take with him four Emirs and a number of Mamelukes, and to patrol Cairo from the gate of the Meidan to the Bab Zawilah, and from thence to the Gate of Victory (Bab-el-Nasr), ordering them to put down the riot with a strong hand, and to spare no one. He then commanded the captain of the watch to guard Bab-el-Louk and the riverbanks, to arrest without distinction all who endeavoured to escape, and bring them to the citadel. 'And if,' he added in a fresh burst of anger, 'you do not bring those who would have stoned Kerim-el-Din, by the life of my head, but I will hang you in their place.'

The Emirs started, but, as they no doubt sympathised with the rioters in their hearts, they took care to linger long enough over their preparations to allow time to warn the mob outside. This was done to such good purpose that a regular stampede took place at once, and by the time the Emirs began their march not a soul was left to arrest; even their own servants had disappeared. The news of their approach spread before them like fire; the people scudded like rabbits to their burrows, the gates of all the bazaars were shut, and the patrol arrived at the Gate of Victory without having met a single person! Meanwhile the captain of the watch patrolled Boulac and the riverbanks, and arrested a number of beggars, sailors, and tramps. This proceeding struck such terror into the populace that many of them plunged into the Nile, which was then extremely low, and took refuge in Gizeh. Before sunset the unfortunate wretches who had not been able to escape, to the number of nearly two hundred, were brought before the Sultan. Nasr ebn Kalaoun did not bandy words about the matter. He forthwith commanded the ragged band to be divided into three companies—one to be hung, one to be cut asunder, and one to have their hands cut off. All began to bewail themselves with loud cries, declaring that it was not they who had thrown the stones at Kerim-el-Din. The Emirs joined their tears and entreaties to those of the hapless mob of prisoners, imploring mercy. In the end the Sultan allowed himself to be persuaded out of his original intention, but he ordered the captain of the watch to erect a line of gallows from the Bab Zawilah to the horse market, and on each of these a man, apparently taken at hazard from the prisoners who had been collected in this random fashion, was hung the next morning. The Emirs who were compelled to pass by them did not restrain their lamentations, and Kerim-el-Din, learning in how ghastly a fashion the street had been decorated with his supposed enemies, could not bring himself to take that road to the citadel, but went round another way.

On the next day the Sultan mounted his tribune and caused another batch of the wretched creatures who had been arrested by the captain of the watch to be brought before him. Before his face he ordered the execution to be proceeded with, and the feet and hands of three among them were cut off. The Emirs, seeing the Sultan's anger unabated, and fearing to bring it upon themselves, no longer dared to intercede for them. Kerim-el-Din alone on his arrival came forward, plucking his turban from his head and prostrating himself upon the ground, to implore forgiveness for the unfortunate men, whom he must have known were in all probability entirely innocent of offence against him. The Sultan granted him the lives of the prisoners, but ordered that they should be set to forced labour on his works along the river. He also gave permission for the removal of the dead bodies of those who had been hung. The Sultan had hardly left the tribune when a fresh alarm of fire arose. It was said that the mosque of Ahmed ebn Touloun and the citadel itself were in danger, besides two other places of importance. In the course of the morning three more Christians were arrested, who, according to Makrizi, also frankly avowed that they belonged to the conspiracy of incendiaries.

For a week the strange scene was prolonged, the populace frantic with terror, the Sultan endeavouring to restrain them, the Christians hiding in fear of their lives, and both Mohammedans and Christians alike falling victims in turn to the anger of the Sultan or the fury of the mob. On the following Saturday the tumult reached its height. As the Sultan came down from the citadel to the Meidan, according to his wont, he found himself surrounded by a mutinous mob about ten thousand strong. They were all carrying blue rags marked with a white cross (?), and, as soon as the Sultan appeared amongst them, they all began to shout with one voice: 'Let there be no faith except that of Islam! God protect the faith of Mohammed! O thou commander of the faithful, help us against the infidels. No favour to the Christians!'

The Sultan saw himself on the brink of an insurrection, and trembled. It was not enough that he had tortured and burnt alive all those accused of firing the city; the Mohammedans thirsted for Christian blood, and it was no longer safe to forbid them. His courage gave way. He made his way to the Meidan, and thence sent his Chamberlain to proclaim publicly to the multitude that they were free to kill every Christian they could find and take his property! And when the multitude heard the proclamation, they rent the air with blessings on their sovereign, and departed to carry out his orders. The terrible scenes which followed on this capitulation of the Sultan to the maddened mob, the wholesale slaughter and plunder of the Christian Egyptians in that reign of terror, are left to our imagination. The Moslem authors merely state that this thing happened, and proceed to enumerate the legal disabilities which were afterwards imposed upon the Christians who were left alive. They are the same as before—certain colours rendered compulsory; a bell hung round their neck when they entered the bath, to give warning to any of the 'faithful' who happened to be there, that they might avoid contamination; no Christian to be employed in any public office, or in the household of any Emir, or in any post under the Government in the provinces. Any Christian seen in a white turban, or riding either horse or mule, might be slain by the first Mohammedan who cared to undertake the task, and his goods were taken by the slayer. The use only of the ass was permitted to them, and then on condition that they rode with their face to the tail. And while the Sultan sat preparing these laws, the work of carnage went on, till the very fanatics themselves were satiated and began to fear for the consequences again, since they knew that they had carried out the orders of the Sultan 'with a bitterness beyond all bounds.'

It was necessary, says our Moslem authority, to reassure them, and proclaim a general amnesty for anything they might have done. So that the next day saw the Mohammedan crowd once more following its Sultan with blessings and grateful acclamations, and it is recorded that the Sultan 'smiled upon them' in his relief.

But the lull was of short duration; in the following night flames broke out again in Cairo, and spread with such rapidity that it was feared the citadel itself would be burnt down. For many a day the Christians dared not show themselves outside their doors, and the churches remained closed for more than a year and a half—until the Emperor of Byzantium and the King of Spain sent embassies to the Court of Cairo, entreating some measure of toleration for their unhappy Egyptian co-religionists. Great numbers of them, it is to be feared, had apostatised in the meantime. The Patriarch's life was spared, and he lived some fifteen years afterwards. The Melkite Patriarch, Athanasius III., took care not to venture himself in his Egyptian diocese under these circumstances, and remained the whole time in Constantinople, busying himself with the squabbles between the Emperor and the clergy of that city. At length the Emperor banished him from Constantinople, but, being still afraid to return to Egypt, he went to the isle of Embōa, and finally to Greece, where he was thrown into prison.

Like many of the Egyptian clergy, however, he was versed in the study of medicine, and, having cured his captor, he was set at liberty. It is not known whether he ever returned to Egypt.

The penal laws made against the Christian Egyptians at this time did not include the Jews, and they seem to have profited by the troubles of the Christians. Makrizi tells the story of a Jew who owed a Christian a large sum of money. The latter, being dismissed from his post and in need, disguised himself and went to the house of the Jew, begging for repayment. But the Jew at once gave the alarm, and a Mohammedan crowd collected in a few moments to seize the Christian. The latter escaped by a flank movement into the interior of the house, where he implored protection from the Jew's wife. She had compassion upon him, and concealed him on the premises for the night; but before he was allowed to depart in the morning he was compelled to give the Jew a receipt in full for the unpaid debt.

In the year 1325, when the violence of the persecution had somewhat abated, Nasr received a letter from the Emperor of Abyssinia, commanding him to rebuild the churches which had been thrown down by the Moslems, and to treat the Christians better, or he would throw down every mosque in the kingdom of Abyssinia, and intercept the course of the Nile. Nasr laughed at the Emperor's threats, and dismissed his envoys without answer. What the result was to the mosques of Abyssinia we know not, but the Nile does not seem to have been affected.

In the year 1327 there was a fresh outbreak of the Mohammedans, and the church of St. Barbara was destroyed. The only reason given for this by the Moslems is the fact that the Christians with the permission of the Sultan had ventured to repair this church, and in so doing had slightly enlarged the building. The church was not rebuilt immediately, but is now to be found on its old site within the Roman fortress. In this year John IX. died, and was succeeded by Benjamin II.

The remaining years of the reign of Nasr ebn Kalaoun passed more quietly, and he employed himself chiefly in rebuilding Cairo. Several schools and colleges owe their existence to him, also public fountains, and more than one mosque besides the beautiful one in the copper bazaar which still bears his name; nor were his public works confined to Cairo alone. He re-dug the navigable canal which formerly connected Alexandria with the Nile, but had been allowed to fall into ruin, dug another canal from Kankah to Syrakus, and strengthened the embankments of the country, besides building several bridges in different parts. It is evident that the Mameluke Emirs did not at all approve this substitution of good government for perpetual war and plunder, and Nasr became yearly more unpopular. He found occasional work for the Mamelukes in sundry expeditions against Nubia, where it had become the regular thing for the Sultan of Egypt to play off one claimant of the throne against another. The Nubian people invariably returned to their rightful sovereign, who refused to swear fealty to the Moslem Sultan of Egypt, as soon as his troops had left the country; but all the old ties of patriotism and Christianity were rapidly perishing in the continued anarchy consequent on the enforced slave trade and the perpetual invasions of the Moslems in favour of some new pretender to the throne.

Nasr was devoted to horses, and it is said that during some years of his reign 3,000 were raised in his stables annually. In the year 1337 (A.H. 738) he lost the most beloved of his sons, the Emir Anak, and never really recovered from the shock of this bereavement. Of the eight who were left to him, all but one were still children; and it must have been evident to him that there was little chance of the reforms which he had endeavoured to undertake being carried on after his death. The Mameluke Emirs waited like vultures to quarrel over his body and reintroduce the reign of violence which he had done his best for twenty years to restrain.¹ On January 6, 1341, Nasr died, almost alone; his body was hastily interred at night, and unattended. His eldest son was indeed allowed to assume the throne, but within forty days he was deposed by the Mameluke Emirs and exiled, while the harem of his father was violated and pillaged by the Mamelukes.

From the harem they brought a child of six, whom in mockery they called their Sultan for five months, before they thrust him into the dungeon where he died.

One after another the eight sons of Nasr ebn Kalaoun were set upon a nominal throne for periods varying from forty days to three years, but allowed no real power, while the Emirs fought among themselves, and Egypt was left to the government of the permanent officials, which, as they were Egyptian and Christian, was the best thing that could happen to her. Of these eight sons, all were deposed except the fourth, whose nominal reign lasted more than three years, and who died a natural death. The other seven were all deposed—two died in exile, one in a dungeon, three were murdered.

The seventh son was Nasr-el-dyn Hassan, who succeeded in 1347 (A.H. 748); and though little more than three years afterwards he was deposed and imprisoned in the citadel, he survived to recover the throne of his father and reign for a short time in earnest before the usual fate of the Mameluke Sultans overtook him. During his first reign, in the year 1348, Egypt, like Europe, was visited by the terrible plague which we call the Black Death. The mortality in Egypt was frightful; whole families were exterminated, and their property at once seized by the Regent and the other Mameluke Emirs. Makrizi declares 15,000 persons died in Cairo in one day ; but even if we include the four cities in the term Cairo, as it became more and more the custom to do, this number is incredible. As the same word—Masr—is used by Makrizi to denominate Cairo and Egypt indifferently, we must conclude that his statement here refers to the latter. In the cholera of 1883 the average number of deaths a day was about 300 in Cairo. Still, we know by our own experience that the Black Death was far more fatal than any subsequent visitation of pestilence, and a death rate of 1,000 a day in a single city was not uncommon at the height of the more severe outbreaks of plague in Egypt. The Patriarch Peter, who had succeeded Benjamin in 1340, died, and Mark IV. was elected.

¹ Nasr became suspicious of everyone before his death. Contemporary writers assure us that he poisoned at least 150 people whom he imagined to be conspiring against him and confiscated their property.

It was during the reign of one of the sons of Nasr ebn Kalaoun that John Maundeville is said to have visited Egypt. He says that he dwelt there 'a great while,' and that the Sultan was well disposed to him and would have married him to an Emir's daughter 'if I would have forsaken my law and my belief.' Sir John gives a good deal of correct information about the country, mixed with statements manifestly fabulous and others which we cannot test. He says that the Sultan and four of his nobles, who had travelled in Europe in the disguise of merchants, spoke French very well. He also says that the Sultan told him that the Christians, for their sins, had lost the lands of Egypt and Syria. 'For we know well in very truth, that when you serve God, God will help you ; and when He is with you, no man may be against you. And this know we well by our prophecies, that the Christians shall win again this land out of our hands when they shall serve God more devoutly.'

CHAPTER XXX

THE LONGEST PERSECUTION

A.D. 1351
 A.M. 1067
 A.H. 752

IN 1351 (A.H. 752) the eighth son of Nasr ebn Kalaoun reigned under the regency of the Emir Sheikhoun, and the three years of his reign were not without incidents worth recording. In 1353 a pestilence again ravaged Egypt which among others carried off the reigning Kaliph, for these shadowy Moslem Popes still continued to reside in Cairo. He was succeeded by his uncle, and he must have had some restraining influence on the Moslems, for the disorders of the country increased after his death. During this plague a Christian from the provinces arrived in Cairo, and lifted up his voice to denounce publicly the licence of the times and the evils of the Moslem faith. He was at once arrested and brought before the Kadi, where he declared that he sought to convince the Moslem world of its sin in rejecting Christianity, and that he was ready to suffer martyrdom. The Kadi kept him under torture for a whole week, after which he was beheaded and his body delivered to the flames.

Not long afterwards a Christian was denounced to the government of his native town on the frivolous pretext that his grandfather had professed the faith of Islam, and that therefore his descendant could have no possible right to be a Christian. The Kadi before whom he was brought quite agreed with this view, demanded of the man that he should at once become a Mohammedan, and on his refusal threw him into prison. His death by torture seemed inevitable; but the Christians of that district were numerous, and knew that the governor of the town was friendly towards them. With his connivance they broke into the gaol by night and delivered their co-religionist. Next day the Moslem populace were furious at being balked of their execution; they shouted for the Kadi, the shops were hastily shut, and the whole town was in insurrection. The mob attempted to seize and kill the governor, who called out his guard, but, overborne by sheer weight of numbers, he fled from the town, which remained at the mercy of the mob. Every Christian who had not succeeded in escaping was seized. The church was absolutely destroyed by the fanatical Moslems, its crosses and pictures burnt, and the materials used to build a mosque upon the same site. They next directed their fury against the Christian tombs, which were torn open in search of bodies to be burnt. All business was at a standstill, and the town was given up to the wildest anarchy.

The governor wrote up to Cairo, complaining that the Kadi by his unprovoked measures against the Christians had excited an insurrection and caused the loss of at least five hundred thousand dirhems of Government revenue. The Christians themselves wrote to one of the Emirs named Hosam to complain of the Kadi, and to demand that their church should be rebuilt. Both the Kadi and the governor were summoned to Cairo, and an inquiry held before four of the Cairo magistrates, the Wuzir, and several of the principal officials. It seemed clear that the Kadi of Nahririah had been to blame, but the four Cairo magistrates sided with him against the Christians ; and though the Emir Hosam and the Emir of Lower Egypt warmly espoused the cause of the governor, who had attempted to protect them, they stood almost alone, since the Regent of the kingdom, the Emir Sheikhoun, was entirely under the influence of the Sheikh of his mosque, Akmel-ed-din. This latter inflamed the passions of the council by an harangue in Turkish, in which he seems to have declared that under no circumstances could it be right to take the part of a Christian against a Moslem, and ended with a bitter denunciation of the Emir Hosam, declaring that he had forfeited all claim to the fellowship of the faithful, since by espousing the cause of the Christians he had blasphemed the faith. Eventually a sort of compromise was agreed to, both governor and Kadi were dismissed, but no compensation was made to the Christians.

Indeed, the feeling against the Christians and the bitter jealousy of their pre-eminence in wealth and learning could no longer be restrained from breaking into open persecution.

It has been mentioned that during the last twenty years of his reign Nasr had shown himself more and more favourable to the Copts, and that they had carried on ever since the civil administration of the country, which always fell into hopeless confusion in the hands of the ignorant Mamelukes whenever they attempted to manage it for themselves. Some of these Copts had become Moslems, notably two, who, having done so, aspired to the rank of Wuzir, and disturbed the government of the country by their quarrels. But the greater part were still Christian, and presumed upon their official rank to disregard the laws against them, and to mix on equal or superior terms with the Moslems, who saw with an evil eye their growing power and wealth. Many of them, whose Christianity was more nominal than real, behaved with the arrogance and rapacity which were considered the sole prerogatives of the Moslems; but their worst offence seems to have been their assertion of equality.

It came to this (writes the indignant Moslem historian), that one of the Christian secretaries passed before the mosque El Azhar in El Kahira, riding in boots with spurs, and white bands around his head, after the fashion of Alexandria; with footmen¹ going before him to drive away the people, lest they should throng him, and behind him a number of slaves in costly apparel, on prancing steeds.

The Mussulmans present could not brook this, so they rose up against him, made him come down from his horse, and were on the point of killing him. But, a great crowd having gathered round, they let him go. The multitude, however, had an interview with the Emir Tāz on the subject of the Christians and what they expected from him, and he promised to have justice done them by the Christians. They then sent up a memorial written in Mussulman terms, to be read to the Sultan El Melik-es-Sāleh, in presence of the Emirs and of the Kadis and the rest of the Court, wherein was contained the complaint against the Christians, (requesting that) a council should be held on their account, in order to oblige them to keep to the conditions (imposed upon them).

An order was then given to call the Patriarch of the Christians and the chief men of his religion, and to fetch the chief ruler of the Jews and their elders, and for the Emirs and the Kadis to come in presence of the Sultan. Then the Kadi Ala-ed-din Ali Ben Fassl Allah read from beginning to end the treaty which had been written between the Mussulman and the dependent population (Copts), and which they had brought with them. All who were then present bound themselves by the terms thereof, and certified it. Then were also rehearsed to them their past actions, wherein they had played false, even as at present ; so that, seeing how little they had departed from their former doings, and lest they should return to them, and again to what they had done, it was decreed that they should be shut out of everything connected with the Sultan's Court and government, and of the Courts of the Emirs, even if they professed Islamism ; but that none of them should be forced to embrace it. And the same was written to the provinces.

¹ The ordinary Egyptian syce.

The people then began to lord it over them, dogged their steps, laid hands on them in the streets, and tore down what raiment they had on ; beat them cruelly, and would not leave them until they professed Islamism. They even went so far as to light a fire to throw them in. The Christians then remained hidden in their houses, and would not venture out to walk among the people. And as it was generally made known that no hindrance would be offered to their being ill-treated, the people began to follow them into their retreats, and to pull down all houses of theirs that rose above those of the Mussulmans. At last the condition of the Christians became so very bad in their hiding-places that for a long time they ceased altogether to walk in the streets, and not one, either of them or of the Jews, was to be seen.

The Mussulmans then sent up a memorial to the court of justice, on the second day (of the week, Monday), the 14th of the month of Rejeb, wherein they complained that the Christians had begun afresh to build their churches and to enlarge them. At the same time a large crowd gathered together at the castle, and implored the Sultan's help against the Christians. He then ordered the Prefect of El Kahira to ride thither and to inquire into the matter. Yet the people did not wait for leave, but hastened before, and demolished a church anent the Bridge of Lions, and a church in the street El Asra, in Misr, and the Church of Fahhadin, within the precincts of El Kahira ; also the Convent of Nehya, in Djizah, and a church in the neighbourhood of Batag-el-Tokruri.¹ They plundered the wealth of the churches they demolished, which was great, and carried away even the woodwork and slabs of alabaster. They rushed upon the churches of Misr and of El Kahira, and were about to destroy that of El Bondokayyin in El Kahira, when the Prefect rode in among them and tried to keep them from it, but the people were so desperate that they refused to obey the Prefect's order.

A decree was then sent in writing to the several provinces and to Syria, that no Jew nor any Christian should be taken into service, even if he embraced Islamism ; but that whosoever did embrace it should not be allowed to return to his house nor to the bosom of his family, unless they also become Mussulmans. Also, that if any poor Christian embraced Islamism, he should be made to attend the five prayers and the congregation (on Fridays) at the mosques and other places of gathering for prayer. And that, when a Christian died, the Moslems should undertake the management of his property among his heirs, if he had any ; but if not, it was to be confiscated to the public treasury. The Patriarch was charged with the duty of seeing to it, and wrote an order, which was read before the Emirs, and then was taken down by the warden of the palace gates on a Friday, the 16th of the second Djomadah, and read in the mosques of El Kahira and of Misr—and that day was a high day.

Then, towards the end of the month of Rejeb, they brought from the church of Shoubra, after it had been demolished, the fingers of a martyr which were kept in a casket and used to be cast into the Nile, in order, as they thought, to make it rise.² They were then burnt in presence of the Sultan, on the plain of the Castle of the Hill, and the ashes thereof were thrown into the river, for fear lest the Christians should take possession of them.

¹ Probably a mistake for Boulac Dakrur.

² This was the second stage of the Festival of the Nile. When the heathen ceremonies were abolished, the hand of a virgin martyr (mummied) was lowered in to bless the water. It was then called the Festival of the Martyr.

At that time the news came that a number of Christians of the Said (Upper Egypt) and of the sea-coast (in Lower Egypt) had embraced Islamism and studied the Koran, and that the greater number of the churches of the Said had been pulled down and mosques built in their stead; and that in the town of Kalioub more than four hundred and fifty Christians had become Mussulmans in one day. Meanwhile the agricultural population of the country so managed by ways and means as to be employed in public offices, and to intermarry with Mussulmans, and thus to accomplish their object—so far to mix the races as that the greater portion of the population are now descendants from them.

A strict inquiry was also made all through the land of Egypt to ascertain the extent of the endowments in land belonging to the National Church, and it was found to amount to 1,025 feddans.¹

During this persecution the Patriarch Mark was thrown into prison for torture and eventual death. The King of Nubia heard of it in time, and seized all the Moslem merchants in his kingdom as hostages for the life of the Patriarch, who was released in consequence.

In the midst of this persecution of the Christians a successful plot between the Emir Tajedin and the imprisoned Nasr-el-Dyn Hassan once more replaced the latter on the throne of his father, which he occupied for nearly seven years.

Very little is really known of this prince, but his name will always be remembered as the builder of the magnificent mosque called after him, which stands below the citadel. In the year 1361 (A.H. 762) Hassan was murdered by his Emirs, and his nephew, a boy of fourteen years old, was called to be the nominal Sultan, whom the Mamelukes found it convenient to have as a figurehead. After two years he was deposed in favour of a still younger scion of the house of Kalaoun, Shaban ebn Houssein, who was allowed to reign till he was a young man of twenty-four—that is, for fourteen years—under the title of Melek-el-Ashraf III.

¹ A feddan is a little more than an acre.

The Regent, Sultan in all but the name, was El Bogha-el-Amri, who had been a slave of Sultan Hassan, but was now reckoned chief among the Mameluke Emirs. In the year 1363 the Patriarch Mark died, and the new Regent seems to have been more favourable to the Christians, for the Church elected his successor, John X., without any trouble. The next year a terrible famine visited Egypt and Syria, which in some parts of these countries continued for three years, till the unfortunate inhabitants devoured their own children. To famine succeeded, in the North of Egypt, another invasion of the Crusaders, who in 1365 made a descent on Egypt and captured Alexandria after one day's resistance. The town was given up to pillage, and large numbers of women were carried off by the Franks. No lives were lost among the invaders, it is said, though a great number of the inhabitants and defenders were killed. The garrison abandoned the place and retreated on Cairo. But again the Crusaders deliberately threw away their own chances. They had a fleet of a hundred ships, an army of ten thousand foot and fourteen hundred horse; but when the council of war was held to determine their future action, only the King of Cyprus, who nominally commanded the expedition, and the Pope's legate were in favour of a march on Cairo. The majority carried the day, and the expedition with its inglorious booty of women sailed away for Cyprus.

In 1369 (A.H. 771) an unfortunate Christian was seized and tortured to death on the suspicion of having by witchcraft caused the death of the young Sultan's wife, a daughter of the Emir Taj; but on the whole the Christians seem to have been fairly treated under this reign. John X. died in 1371, and was succeeded peaceably by Gabriel IV., who only reigned four years. In 1373 (A.H. 775) there was a famine in Egypt owing to the low Nile, and the usual liturgical processions were held in Cairo by Christian and Moslem alike, to cry aloud to the heavens for water. In one of these Makrizi relates that he took part, being then about nine years old. Famine, as usual, bred discontent, and the next year another revolution among the Mamelukes disposed of the Regent, who was cut to pieces by those of his own guard. Another Mameluke Emir, El Gai-el-Yusufi, was set upon the throne under the title of Regent. He married the mother of the young Sultan to obtain her fortune, then murdered her, and attempted to murder Melek-el-Ashraf, but by an almost unexampled instance of loyalty among his Mamelukes, who rallied round and fought for him, the Sultan escaped this time. But he was now a young man, capable of real government, and disposed to assert his right to do so; therefore the Emirs resolved to compass his destruction. Several plots against him failed, but at length he gave them the opportunity they wanted by leaving the kingdom on a pilgrimage to Mecca. The Emirs laid in wait for him, cut his escort to pieces, and supposed that the Sultan was slain also. They returned to Cairo and offered the crown to the reigning Kaliph; for the Kaliphs had, ever since their flight to Cairo more than a hundred years earlier, wielded from thence a spiritual authority which was respected or not, as it suited the Moslem world, but never enforced. Mutewakil was too wary to endanger his position by yielding to the request of the Emirs, and bade them choose whom they would, and his sanction should be ready. At this juncture it was discovered that the Sultan, who had been left for dead, had returned to Cairo and was concealed in the house of one of his friends. The Emirs instantly descended on the house, and strangled the Sultan before anyone had time to rally round him. They then set his son, whose infancy was his chief recommendation, upon the throne; and after two different Emirs had been chosen as Regent and deposed, the Emir Barkuk seized and kept that office for himself.

The father of Barkuk was one of the Christian lads bought in Circassia by the slave dealers for the Egyptian market. He was, as usual, ordered to renounce his faith in favour of Islam, and was bought in the year 1364 by the Regent El Bogha, who, struck by his beauty and intelligence, permitted him to be educated in the learning of Egypt, and finally elevated him to the rank of Emir. His son Barkuk, at the time of his master's murder, was already of sufficient importance among El Bogha's Mamelukes to be thrown into prison with his chief friend Berekeh when the rest of the Regent's bodyguard were allowed to disperse. Barkuk, however, shortly succeeded in recovering his liberty, and took service with the Governor of Damascus, till the Sultan Melek-el-Ashraf recalled him to Egypt, and gave him the command of a Mameluke regiment. After the murder of the Sultan, Barkuk served his infant son faithfully as Regent during the short reign of the latter, and showed himself well worthy of the trust committed to him.

For some time the affairs of Nubia had been going from bad to worse under the constant interference of the various Sultans of Egypt, who, however much they might disagree with their Emirs, always agreed as to the policy of encouraging civil war and the slave trade in the Soudan.

The descendants of one of the rightful kings of Nubia, who had spent much of his reign in fighting against pretenders encouraged by the Court of Egypt, had become a formidable tribe, known as 'the Children of Kenz,' who, allying themselves with the nobles of another powerful tribe of Nubia, carried on a guerilla warfare against all Moslems, and rendered all the roads between Assuan and Suakim unsafe. Under the Regency of El Bogha an expedition had been undertaken against this tribe by the Moslems, under the guise of friendship for the reigning King of Nubia, which ended in the partial destruction of the Children of Kenz and the total destruction of the old city of Dongola, which was left without inhabitants. The horrible cruelties perpetrated by the Mamelukes on this expedition provoked a popular insurrection among their own people in the province of Assuan, which was put down with equal barbarity.

When Barkuk became Regent for the youthful Ali, the Governor of Assuan was an Emir who surpassed all Moslem traditions in his barbarity, particularly towards the Children of Kenz, whenever any of that tribe fell into his power.

He sent the infant Sultan twelve heads and 200 living men of the Kenouz loaded with chains as an acceptable present. The tribe of Kenz rose against the Emir at last, pillaged the town of Assuan, killed a number of the inhabitants, and made themselves masters of the whole province, which for many years ceased to belong to the kingdom of Egypt. Before the insurrection began, the infant Sultan of Egypt died; and though his brother, who was then six years old, was elected Sultan in his stead, he was deposed within two years. In 1382 Barkuk was elected Sultan by the unanimous voice not only of the Emirs but of the Kaliph Mutewakil, the magistrates, and the Ulemas.

Nevertheless, three years later Barkuk discovered that the Kaliph was plotting to dethrone him, and threw him into prison, declaring that he was no longer Kaliph, and appointed another, who only lived a year. His successor also displeased Sultan Barkuk, and was deposed in favour of Mutewakil, whom the Sultan released from prison and restored to his honours.

Mutewakil, however, had neither forgiven nor forgotten, and this time his plot was successful. Barkuk was seized, deposed, and imprisoned at Karak. The Child Haji, who had been deposed for his sake, was recalled to the throne in 1389 (A.H. 791). He only reigned eight months, but during that time some curious scenes took place in Cairo which give the last reign of the last Baharite Mameluke an interest of its own.

It was now thirty-six years since a terrible persecution had led to an unprecedented number of Christians renouncing their faith, and reduced those who remained faithful to the lowest depths. During this time there had been many fanatical outbreaks against the Christians, but no authorised persecution on the part of the Government. Still, there was constant oppression; and though it is hardly to be supposed that many of the apostates of 1354-5 survived to take part in the scene of 1389, there had been frequent apostasies under pressure. One in particular the Moslems record with special pride, on account of his high social position about three years before this time. The renegade, Michael Sabaan, was led in triumph about the city clothed in royal robes and mounted on one of the Sultan's mules, after which he was rewarded with an important post under Government. Since the accession to the Patriarchal throne, however, of Matthew in 1375 there had been a revival of religious and patriotic feeling among the Egyptians, and many of those who had apostatised returned to the true faith.

In the year 1389 a strange procession entered Cairo—a great multitude of men and women, who cried aloud as they marched that they were Christians, and that they renounced the faith of the false prophets, which they confessed with shame that they had adopted for fear of persecution. Their object in calling attention to themselves thus publicly was to expiate their former fault by voluntarily seeking that martyrdom the fear of which had made them traitors to their Lord.

They were surrounded, and the Moslem authorities in vain demanded their instant return to the faith of Islam. They constantly exclaimed with one voice, 'We are come here to be purified from our sin, and by the sacrifice of our lives to earn the pardon of our Saviour.'

As it was found that not one could be terrified into yielding, it was resolved to make an example of the men first. They were marched to the open place under the windows of the College of Saleh, separated from the women, and beheaded one after the other. The terrible sight had no effect on the determination of the women, but rather confirmed them in their desire for death. Finding them obstinate, one of the chief Kadi took upon himself to order his guards to take the women without further delay to the foot of the citadel and behead them all. This was done; but many even of the Moslems cried shame on the Kadi for putting women to death by beheading.

The example was not lost on the Cairo Christians. Within a few days a monk, his friend, and three women connected with them, were beheaded and burnt—the first for preaching against the faith of Islam, the others for standing by him and encouraging him through his martyrdom. Towards the end of the year both the Patriarch Matthew and the Chief Rabbi of the Jews were thrown into prison; and the former had to be ransomed at the cost of 100,000 dirhems, the Rabbi at 50,000.

But the cruelties of the Emir and the Kaliph, who exercised supreme power in the name of the young Sultan, were not confined to the Christians, and the wise rule of the usurper Barkuk was fresh in men's minds. Before his imprisonment had lasted a year he was unanimously recalled by the Mamelukes to the throne, and his first act was to order a general massacre of El Mansur Haji and all his adherents.

CHAPTER XXXI

THE CIRCASSIAN SLAVE-SULTANS

A.D. 1390
A.M. 1106
A.H. 792

BARKUK, who is counted the first of the Circassian slave-dynasty, came to the throne for the second time in the year 1390 (A.H. 792), and reigned ten years. At this time two great Moslem chiefs were struggling in Europe and Asia for supreme power — one of them was Tamerlane, the general of the Tartars; the other was Bajazyd, fourth of the family of Ottoman Turks who were shortly to win the leadership of the Saracenic world. Both of them sent ambassadors to the Sultan of Egypt: Timour, or Tamerlane, with threats to desire his instant submission as vassal to the world's conqueror; Bajazyd to entreat his friendship and alliance. Barkuk for sole answer to Timour put his messengers to death, and concluded with Bajazyd the treaty which he desired. Timour was too busy pushing the conquest of India to revenge the death of his ambassadors or to make good his insolent threats.

Barkuk had therefore leisure to pay some attention to the civil government of his kingdom, and showed himself capable of other forms of government than the brute force on which the Mameluke Sultans of both dynasties almost entirely depended. He lessened the taxes, suppressed a vexatious custom-house at the port of Boulac, and even found time to bestow patronage on learned Moslems. He built a college, called, after his assumed title, El Madrassah-el-Zahiriah. Under him one of the best-known Mohammedan historians flourished, who is generally known as Makrizi. This celebrated man was of true Arab descent, and had made the most of the opportunities for study which Egypt still afforded in a greater degree than any other country which had come under the paralysing yoke of the Moslems. He was born at Cairo in 1364, and his love of learning was such that it triumphed over the deepest prejudices of race and religion. He was ready to learn even from the Christian and the Jew; and though his history of the Copts shows the uneasy hatred of a Moslem who affected to despise while compelled to acknowledge the mental superiority of the 'dependent population,' it nevertheless records for us most valuable details of some of the persecutions. He wrote many works on jurisprudence, history, theology, and topography, and took a prominent part in the civil administration of Cairo. He was officially connected both with the ancient mosque of Amr in Fostat and with that of El Hakim in Cairo, while he was one of the teachers in the college of Moawiyah and filled the office of Kadi several times. When Barkuk came to the throne in 1390 Makrizi was about twenty-six, and must have viewed with deep thankfulness the return to power of a Mameluke who had room for other ideas in his head beside those of fighting, plunder, and persecution.

Barkuk, however, was not unmindful of the traditions of his caste, and spent vast sums on the purchase of European lads to recruit the Mameluke regiments, and on the acquisition of arms and horses for warlike purposes. He reorganised the whole army; and instead of many plundering bands, each under their own Emir, he placed them under the direct orders of nine great officials appointed by himself. These were known as the (1) Atabek-el-Assaker (General in Command of all the Forces), (2) Ras Noubet-el-Omra (Head of the Emirs), (3) Emir-el-Zeloeh (Head of the Artillery), (4) Emir Meglis (Grand Marshal of the Palace), (5) Emir Akhoun (Head of the Cavalry), (6) Daoudar (Chancellor), (7) Ras Noubet-el-Thani (Second in Command of the Emirs), (8) Hageb-el-Hogab (Chief Chamberlain), (9) Naib (Governor of Cairo).

These officers formed a sort of Privy Council, and were supposed to meet the Kaliph, the Emirs, and the Kadis or magistrates of the city, to deliberate on the measures proposed by the Sultan—at whose pleasure, however, they were nominated and removed. With this assembly was to rest for the future the power of electing a new Sultan in case of a disputed succession to the throne.

In 1403 (A.H. 806) another terrible famine afflicted Egypt. Makrizi records that one of his daughters was ill, and he bought two chickens for her, but was compelled to pay for them seventy-four pieces of silver.

Only one instance of actual persecution of the Christians is recorded during Barkuk's second reign. One of the Emirs took upon himself to destroy a Christian church, where they were apparently engaged in making the sacramental wine for the year in that district; for he stole 40,000 jars of wine, which he solemnly broke before the Bab Zawilah in the square below the citadel, and poured out the wine as a libation to the faith of Islam. The same Emir then proposed in council that a regular persecution of the Christians should be organised, but Barkuk was too wise to sanction a proceeding so fatal to all good government. Still, he permitted a man to be put to death who had renounced Mohammedanism for Christianity.

In the midst of his plans, however, Barkuk was seized with epilepsy, and died at the age of sixty years. Modern Cairo owes to him two of her most splendid monuments—the mosque which bears his name, but which was built as a tomb for his daughter, in the copper bazaar; and the family mausoleum also bearing his name among the so-called tombs of the Kaliphs.

His son Farag was permitted to succeed him without dispute, and was immediately called upon to suppress the rebellion of the Governors of Syria and Aleppo. This he did with comparative ease, but a more formidable enemy awaited him. Timour, returning flushed with success from India, reconquered Aleppo. He also obtained a great victory over Bajazyd; and on the heels of the messengers who brought this news to Egypt came a fresh demand that the Sultan of Egypt should acknowledge himself the vassal of Timour and return to him two fugitives who had taken refuge some years before with Barkuk.

Farag signed the decree, and, though he would not give up the two fugitives, he imprisoned them in Cairo. By this means he purchased peace; but his Mameluke Emirs were so indignant that, on the death of Timour two years after, they deposed Farag and elected his brother. Farag would have been killed but that his hiding-place could not be discovered, and after two months he was strong enough to retake the kingdom and drive his brother into exile, where he died. Still, he was never able to recover the prestige he had lost by his compliance with the insolent demands of Timour, and four years afterwards a new plot proved more successful.

A slave who had belonged to Barkuk, and had been promoted by him to the rank of Emir, desired to attain the supreme power, and did so by working on the ambition of the reigning Kaliph, El Mustain b'Allah. The Kaliphs, ever since Bibars had received the fugitive from Baghdad, had lost all political power, and occupied very much the same position in the Eastern world that the Pope does at the present day in the Western. Sheikh El Mahmoudi, the ambitious Emir, persuaded El Mustain that by a bold coup it would be quite possible to reassert the ancient power of the Kaliphate and recover for himself the temporal sovereignty. The time was chosen when Farag was at Damascus. The Emir raised the standard of rebellion in Mustain's name, and summoned the Sultan to abdicate; but the Mamelukes hesitated, and the fortune of the revolt seemed doubtful, when the spiritual anathema of the Supreme Pontiff was thundered through the kingdom. The Prince of the Faithful declared that by his proclamation the Sultan Farag was deposed. 'The true Sultan of Egypt and Syria is now the Kaliph, descendant and Vicar of the Prophet. Pardon is offered to those who unite themselves with him. Woe to all who shall resist him.'

The effect of this laconic utterance was immediate and startling. It seems to have taken the Moslem world by surprise and compelled an awe-struck obedience. The Mamelukes of the Sultan deserted him. He was arrested and brought before the Kaliph, who formally condemned him as guilty of revolt against the representative of God on the earth. He was solemnly executed on May 7, 1412.

All the Emirs took the oath of fidelity to the Kaliph, and Sheikh El Mahmoudi obtained under the name of Grand Wuzir the end for which he had striven. A solemn entry was made into Cairo amidst the plaudits of the Moslems, and the Kaliph was installed in the palace at the citadel.

The first care of these religionists was to despoil the Jews and Christians. Three commissioners were employed to inquire into their number and resources, and a registry office to receive their names was opened in the building adjoining the mosque of Hakim. Eventually the Jews and Christians were divided into three classes; the richest were to pay four dinars a year, the second class two, and the poor one dinar a year.

The Kaliph reigned nearly three years, and, though he oppressed the Christians, he also endeavoured to restrain the vices and violence of his Moslem subjects. This, however, soon rendered him very unpopular, especially with the Mamelukes; and it was not long before Sheikh El Mahmoudi felt himself strong enough to compel the Kaliph to grant him the title as well as the power of King, and subsequently to confine the Kaliph to his own palace. The Kaliph tried again the spiritual weapon which he had found so effectual before, and published a sentence of anathema and deposition against Sheikh El Mahmoudi. But an expedient of that kind does not often succeed twice. Sheikh El Mahmoudi and his Mamelukes openly scoffed at the anathema, seized the Pontiff, declared him guilty of revolt against his legitimate sovereign, deposed and sent him into exile!

Sheikh El Mahmoudi reigned for more than eight years under the name of Melek el Muaiyad. He is well spoken of by the Moslem historians, for he patronised Makrizi, who had accompanied him to Damascus when he went to fight against Farag, and had been employed in important posts in Cairo all through his reign. But he oppressed the Christians, and permitted his Mamelukes to indulge in open violence and persecution. The commander of the watch, whose business it was to preserve order, exacted from them large sums of money, and contributions of wine for his soldiers. By the ruined heaps of Babylon there was a colony of Christian wine merchants, and the whole district was still inhabited by Christians. The commander of the watch stormed the quarters as if it were a foreign town, took away all the wine that he wanted for his troops—who, being Moslems, had no right to touch it—broke the jars and spilt most of the remainder, and allowed his soldiers to pillage until the unfortunate inhabitants had paid him large sums to go away. The Patriarch Matthew had died in the reign of the Kaliph Mustain, and had been succeeded by a native of Gizeh named Gabriel. This Patriarch reigned eighteen years, and though, for the most part, they were years of trouble and persecution, he found time to write an exposition of the Coptic Ritual in addition to his other labours. He had been a layman and one of the Government clerks before he gave up everything to enter the Church and become its Patriarch, when the dignity only rendered him a mark for abuse and persecution. He was so poor that he depended for his daily maintenance on the alms of his people, nor would he take more than was absolutely necessary for his existence. He always went on foot, and lived like the poorest of his people. For some time the decaying revenue of the Patriarchs of Egypt had been augmented by considerable sums of money sent yearly from Abyssinia to the Mother Church of Egypt; but on the accession of Gabriel this contribution ceased, apparently on the ground that, having been a layman in Government service, he was not a fit person to be chosen Patriarch.¹

Under Sheikh El Mahmoudi all the old oppressive laws were put in force against the Christians, and in the year 1418 (A.H. 821) Gabriel was summoned before the assembly (the constitution of which was described under the reign of Barkuk) and threatened with death because the Abyssinians, who were supposed to be under his authority, were oppressing the Moslems settled in their country. After stormy discussions it was decided, as usual in times of persecution, that no Christian should be employed any longer under Government. They began by making an example of Fadail, the Christian Secretary of the Grand Wuzir. By the Sultan's order he was imprisoned and tortured, and then paraded naked through the streets of Cairo, followed by an official who cried aloud, 'Thus shall it be done to every Christian in the employ of the Sultan.'

It was doubtless hoped that this demonstration would be followed, as in the previous century, by a wholesale apostasy of the Christians employed in the Government offices. But that generation had grown up under the evil influences of the Patriarch Cyril; this had learned to be capable of better things under Matthew and Gabriel. The Christian officials barricaded themselves in their houses, and waited till the Moslems should again discover that the government could not be carried on without them. Some of them apostatised at a later date under the continued stress of persecution, and chiefly in order to revenge themselves on their oppressors. In the same year the head of St. Mark was stolen from Alexandria by a Venetian privateer, and this seems to have been regarded as a national calamity by the Egyptian Christians.

¹ His unfitness probably refers to his marriage, for no respectable layman would have remained unmarried, and no married man was deemed eligible for the Patriarchate.

About this time the country again suffered, in the usual sequence, from drought, famine, and pestilence. Muaiyad ordered a pilgrimage to the sepulchre of Barkuk. He went himself with the Moslems and the Koran. At the same time processions were organised by the Jews with the Law, and the Christians with the Gospel; each chanting a Litany of supplication to the Almighty for deliverance from the plague.

During his reign Sheikh El Mahmoudi built the beautiful mosque which is called, after his second title, the Gama el Muaiyad, near the Bab Zawilah. After his death there was the usual bloody struggle for the throne. Three Sultans were successively elected and deposed within a year; but the fourth, a freed slave named Bers Bey, who had risen to the rank of Emir among the Mamelukes, succeeded in establishing himself firmly on that insecure elevation and retaining his position for the rest of his life.

CHAPTER XXXII

THE OTTOMAN CONQUEST

A.D. 1422 BERS BEY came to the throne in 1422 (A.H. 825), and A.M. 1138 reigned under the title of Melek el Ashraf. The first year of A.H. 825 his reign was signalised by a very high Nile, which brought plentiful harvests and was received by the people as a good omen for the new reign. For two years, indeed, the land enjoyed peace; then the usual revolt broke out, this time in Syria, but was soon suppressed; and in sundry expeditions against the Franks Bers Bey was entirely successful. He conquered the island of Cyprus, and obliged its Christian king, John III., to become his vassal. This John afterwards hired from the Sultan of Egypt a band of his Moslem Mamelukes, with which to make war on other Christian princes. The fame of the terrible Mamelukes was well known in Europe, and the Grand Master of the Knights of St. John was sent as an ambassador to the Court of Egypt to prevail on the Sultan to recall his soldiers. The usual arguments prevailed, and Bers Bey received a larger sum of money to recall the Mamelukes than John had paid him to send them. But John of Cyprus forthwith put himself under the protection of the rival Saracen power, the Ottoman Sultan Murad II., who, though his recent siege of Constantinople had proved fruitless, was becoming year by year more powerful, to the danger alike of the Christian empire in Europe and the Moslem empire in Egypt and Syria.

Murad tried different arguments in favour of John of Cyprus. He sent a peremptory message by his ambassador to the Court of Egypt that Bers Bey would refuse at his peril the Mamelukes which he had promised, and Bers Bey forthwith dismissed the Knight Commander (it does not say that he returned the money) and sent the Mamelukes.

In 1427 (A.H. 830) the Patriarch Gabriel died, and for some months the affairs of the Church were administered by a monk of the convent of Toura, named Michael. Indeed, Makrizi says that he was actually elected Patriarch, and deposed by the Christians, but his name is not given in either of the Christian lists as Patriarch. No doubt there was a strong party in favour of the election of a monk, but the great body of the Church prevailed in favour of a man named John (by the Arabs Abu-l-Farag), who was well known and greatly beloved, the priest in charge of an important school at Maks.

In 1429 (A.H. 832) a very curious plot was discovered, according to Makrizi; nothing less than a secret treaty between the Emperor of Abyssinia and 'the Franks' to engage in a holy war for the extermination of the Moslem religion and empire all over the world! At the same moment the Emperor of Abyssinia was to attack the kingdom of Egypt and Syria by land, and the Franks were to invade her by sea. The agent and ambassador between Abyssinia and Europe was a Christian merchant disguised as a Moslem. This man made his way through the ruined Soudan to Egypt, and thence embarked at an African port for Europe. He carried out his negotiations with 'the Franks' successfully, even to settling the uniform which was to be worn by every soldier in the Crusade—a garment embroidered with the Cross and ‘the name of Haty’¹ written in letters of gold.’ But on his return to Alexandria he was betrayed by a slave, seized before he left his vessel, and brought before the Sultan. Two Abyssinian monks were with him and a great number of the embroidered garments.

The unfortunate merchant was tried by the Moslem Kadis and sentenced to death. He was first placed upon a camel and solemnly paraded through the streets of Boulac, Cairo, and Fostat, preceded by a man who cried aloud: ‘Thus shall it be done to all who would furnish arms to our enemies, and who possess two religions.’ After this he was beheaded near the College of Saleh, in the sight of an immense crowd. The non-return of his ambassador apparently caused the collapse of the Emperor’s intended Crusade.

Bers Bey died in 1438 (A.H. 841) after the unusually long reign—for a Mameluke Sultan—of sixteen years. Under his strong hand Egypt enjoyed a brief respite from misgovernment, and learned men like Makrizi, who lived all through this reign, were protected and encouraged. It is even recorded that in his time the streets of Cairo were lighted at night and safe from scenes of riot and bloodshed! As usual, however, his son had barely reigned three months before a revolt of the Mameluke Emirs placed one of their number, Seyf-ed-din Jakmak, who had been Atabek, on the throne. Jakmak was already sixty-nine years old, and though he managed to maintain his hold upon the throne, he did not, fortunately for Egypt, engage in fresh wars.

It was in the year after his accession, 1439, that the Council of Florence was held, which for a brief period reunited the Greek and Roman Churches. The Egyptian Church also sent a delegate, John, abbot of the celebrated monastery of St. Anthony; but he arrived late, and the Greek delegates had already left the place. John obtained the insertion of a decree for the admission of his National Church into the great reunion at a later session. But the Greek Church repudiated the terms to which their delegates had consented at the Council of Florence; and in Egypt the attempt at reunion appears to have had no practical effect beyond the establishment of a kindlier feeling between the Churches.¹

¹ The name of the Emperor of Abyssinia.

In 1440 a terrible pestilence ravaged Egypt, but beyond this little occurred to mark the reign of Jakmak, who abdicated in favour of his son, Fakr-ed-din Osman, in 1453 (A.H. 857), the year in which the Greek Empire of Byzantium finally perished, and the reigning Ottoman Sultan, Mahomed II., took possession of the ancient stronghold of Christendom. Jakmak's son was deposed by the Emirs before two months were over; an old Mameluke named Inal was elected Sultan by them, and reigned ingloriously for about eight years. In the first year of his reign the Egyptian Patriarch died, and was succeeded by a man named Matthew, of whom little is known. Inal received an embassy from the King of Abyssinia commending the ¹ This temporary reunion is represented by Roman Catholic historians as the solemn submission of the Coptic Church to the Pope of Rome, 'under whom she has remained ever since.' But, if so, the Roman Pope could not possibly have acknowledged, as he did, a rival Patriarch in the same see, that of Alexandria. It was not, however, a submission, but only a righteous attempt at reconciliation, which failed in consequence of the extravagant pretensions of the Roman Pope to supreme authority. It was this which caused the Council to be rejected indignantly by the Greeks, and ignored in Egypt, when the terms of the reunion were made known to both those countries.

Christians of Egypt, whom he had been persecuting, to his favourable notice. It is evident that Egypt was miserably misgoverned during his reign. We learn that in 1458 the Mameluke Emirs repeatedly set fire to various parts of the cities—probably those quarters inhabited chiefly by Jews and Christians—in order to create opportunities for plunder. Inal's son was allowed to succeed him, but was deposed after a nominal reign of four months.

After him a Greek slave who had belonged to Bers Bey and risen to eminence among the Mamelukes was elected Sultan in the year 1461 (A.H. 865). Unlike the Turkish and Circassian slaves who had attained the throne, Kochkadam endeared himself to the Egyptians by his kindly government and courteous manners. The six years of his rule are reckoned among the golden days of which this unhappy country has known so few. Even during this happy period the Mameluke Emirs broke loose on one occasion and plundered the bazaars of the Christian quarters in the misnamed 'Old Cairo.' But during his reign European pilgrims were not afraid to visit the holy places of Egypt, particularly Heliopolis and the balsam gardens of Materieh. There is still extant an account of a later pilgrimage of some Germans in 1483, when Kait Bey was on the throne, in which they say that the Sultan had enclosed the sacred fountain and tree in the garden of his own palace built at Heliopolis, but that they were permitted to enter and visit the sacred spots. They declare that one of the most remarkable sights in the palace garden was a bath where three hundred people could bathe at once. It was probably something like the one now in the gardens of Shoubra Palace. In 1466 the Patriarch Matthew died, and was succeeded by Gabriel VI.

In the same year died the Greek Sultan, and 'all Egypt bewailed him as their father.' Two other Mamelukes who succeeded him were severally deposed after barely two months' reign of the ordinary plundering and brutal kind, which the six years of Greek rule had made appear more unbearable than ever; and at length a freed slave of Sultan Jakmak, whose nationality is not stated, was called to the vacant throne.

This man was Kait Bey, whose beautiful tomb has made him one of the best-known Mameluke Sultans. He came to the throne in 1468, and reigned nearly thirty years, most of them spent in fighting against the growing Ottoman power, which was so soon to overthrow the Mameluke rule in Egypt. But the first six years were passed in peace, and even during the constant wars which followed Egypt suffered comparatively little, as they were all carried on in Syria and Asia Minor. One of his greatest generals was an Emir called Ezbeki, who gave his name to a mosque which he built in commemoration of his Syrian victories, and to the open space or Meidan surrounding it. The mosque is gone, but the once waste space is still known as the Ezbekieh in modern Cairo. The Christians were not specially persecuted in this reign, and were still employed as architects of the mosques and colleges in Cairo. Kait Bey outlived two Patriarchal reigns. In 1475 Gabriel died, and was succeeded by Michael VI., and in 1481 the latter was succeeded by John XII.; but little has yet been discovered about either of these Patriarchs.¹

¹ In 1484 the monks of Deyr Antonius and Deyr Paulus were all massacred, and the monasteries abandoned for 80 years. During this time the greater part of the ancient library was used for fuel by wandering Bedouins.

After some years of fighting, with varying fortunes, peace was concluded between the Ottoman and Egyptian Sultans in the year 1491 (A.H. 896), and the cities of Tarsus and Adanah were ceded to the Ottomans. Kait Bey lived five years longer, and governed Egypt well. He built a mosque, which still stands, though in a greatly neglected condition, not very far from the much older mosque of Ebn Touloun; and which, like his tomb, is called after his name. In 1496 (A.H. 901) he died, and his son was permitted to succeed him. But six months of ferocious tyranny, which did not even spare the Emirs, sealed his fate, and they deposed him in favour of one of his father's slaves, named Kansu, who, after six months of a hopeless struggle to restore order, voluntarily abdicated the throne. Kait Bey's son was given another trial, and bore the name of Sultan for some eighteen months.

In January, 1499, he was murdered by the Mameluke Emirs, and three other Sultans rapidly succeeded him. Each in turn was elected by the Mamelukes; the first two were deposed, the third was murdered by the Emirs, who seem since the death of Kait Bey to have thrown off all restraint. After the murder of Tuman, however, the third of these Sultans, in 1501, the outraged Egyptians for once insisted on taking the matter into their own hands. They deputed the principal Moslem Sheikhs to elect a Sultan, and the popular feeling both in Egypt and Syria was so strong that the Mamelukes did not venture to oppose it, but associated themselves with the Sheikhs and accepted their choice.

The Sheikhs did not venture to suggest anyone but a Mameluke Emir for the post; and made choice of an old slave who had belonged to Kait Bey, of the name of Kansu el Ghuri. He was without ambition, had taken no share in the intrigues and faction fights of the other Emirs, but since he had obtained his freedom had lived a quiet life and shown himself considerate and kind to all who were dependent on him.

All the Emirs were struck with astonishment at the selection, none more so than El Ghuri himself, who at once refused the perilous honour, declaring that he was more accustomed to obey than to command. But the whole assembly were unanimous in declaring that they would accept no other sovereign than himself. El Ghuri therefore consented, exacting a solemn oath from them that if they were dissatisfied with his government there should be no rebellion or murder, but that he should be permitted to retire into private life unharmed.

Kansu el Ghuri took the throne in 1501 (A.H. 906), and reigned more than fifteen years. He enforced order, even among the Emirs, with a strong hand; he carried out important public works in Egypt, and founded schools and mosques; but in order to do this, as well as undertake the wars which became necessary for the defence of Egypt, he burdened the country with excessive taxation, the onus of which, as usual, fell most heavily on the Christians. Among his mosques the one which bears his name is still one of the show-places in Cairo, and forms a most picturesque feature in the great street which, under different names, runs across Cairo at right angles to the Mouski.

El Ghuri had to reckon with a fresh European enemy, the Portuguese, whose establishment in India seriously injured the commerce of that country with Egypt, and who were also interfering in Abyssinia.¹ El Ghuri fitted out a fleet to protect his commerce from the Portuguese, and in 1508 he gained a victory over them off the coast of Beluchistan ; but in the following year his fleet was driven back to Egypt in a shattered condition. El Ghuri fitted out a fresh fleet to return to India, but a more serious danger called his attention to the defence of Egypt itself.

¹ In 1502 Peter Martyr visited the Sultan of Egypt, sent by Ferdinand and Isabella of Arragon.

In 1512 (A.H. 918) the two sons of Bajazyd, the Ottoman Sultan, being engaged in the usual struggle for the possession of the throne on the death of their father, the unsuccessful candidate took refuge in Egypt and implored the help of El Ghuri. The Egyptian Sultan, well aware of the danger which the growing power and ambition of the Ottoman Sultans threatened to his own country, received Kurkoud with friendship, and consented to aid him against his brother, who was now reigning at Constantinople under the title of Selim I. He lent him twenty warships with which to attack Constantinople ; but on the way they fell in with the Crusading fleet of the Knights of St. John, and were defeated and captured. The only effect, therefore, of El Ghuri's attempt was to arouse the bitter enmity of the rival whom he had hoped to crush. He hastily entered into alliance with the King of Persia, who was already at war with the Ottoman Sultan ; but the combined armies were cut to pieces, and El Ghuri sent an embassy to Selim to ask for peace ' on such terms as the Ottoman Porte might choose to impose.'

His submission came too late. Selim rejected his ambassadors with scorn, and bade their master prepare for war, since he proposed to visit him in Cairo. El Ghuri assembled all his Mameluke regiments, and marched to meet the Ottoman horde before it could enter Syria. The armies met near Aleppo, but it was clear from the outset that the Egyptian cause was hopeless. Not only was the Ottoman army composed of the Janissaries, who, like the Mamelukes, were European slaves bought and trained for the sole purpose of war, but all the resources of the recent science which had invented gunpowder were brought into play by the Ottomans against the lances, arrows, and scimitars of the Egyptians. The artillery struck such terror into the Mameluke Emirs who commanded the right and left wings of the Egyptian army that they deserted to the enemy. El Ghuri, attempting to rally his troops, fell from his charger, and was crushed under the horse-hoofs of his flying Mamelukes.

The slave-dynasties were over in Egypt. A nephew of El Ghuri, Tuman Bey II., was indeed hastily elected to succeed him ; but though for a few months he gallantly upheld the uneven conflict, it was with the knowledge that he was doomed to fail, and would die fighting. Even this mournful satisfaction was denied him. He had purchased eighty guns from the Venetians, but the Mamelukes were inexperienced in their use, and the Ottomans were still incomparably better armed. It was on January 23, 1517 (A.H. 922), that the final battle was fought on Egyptian soil, and the Mamelukes entirely routed. Such of them as were left, with Tuman Bey at their head, threw themselves into Cairo, and expected the approach of the Bedouin tribes, whose alliance Tuman Bey had hired. Before their arrival Selim had already entrenched himself in the island of Rhoda, and the attack on his stronghold was repulsed with loss. Cairo was barricaded and the citadel fortified, but it was taken by storm—though the Mamelukes disputed every inch of the ground till the city was paved with corpses—the towns of Cairo and Fostat pillaged and burnt, and every Mameluke of the garrison slain. Tuman Bey, who had not yet found the soldier's death which he courted, embarked almost alone on the Nile, and made his way to Alexandria, where he hoped to make a fresh stand. But he fell into the hands of the Bedouin tribes, who sold him to the Ottoman Sultan.

Selim's conduct was marked by the usual cruelty and absence of chivalrous feeling which distinguishes Turkish warfare. He affected at first to receive his gallant foe with courtesy and consideration, and kept him in an honourable imprisonment until he had learned all that Tuman Bey could tell him about Egypt, its government, and its resources. Then, at the close of their final conference, he coolly ordered his guards to take the prisoner away and hang him. The last Mameluke Sultan was accordingly hung like a common criminal at the Bab Zawilah, and the unhappy kingdom of Egypt passed under a new form of tyranny, no better and in many respects worse than that of the Mamélukes; for the Mameluke Sultans, bad as most of them were, had at least some personal interest in the country of which they had usurped the government.

Henceforth Egypt was the prey of successive governors whose one idea was usually how soonest to enrich themselves before their inevitable recall to Constantinople and loss of the Sultan's favour, while the real power fell more and more into the hands of the tyrant Mameluke Beys.

CHAPTER XXXIII

FROM BAD TO WORSE

A.D. 1517
A.M. 1233
A.H. 923

THREE days after the murder of the last Mameluke Sultan, Selim I. made his triumphal entry into Cairo, in April 1517. The Mameluke Emirs came in and made their submission for the most part, but he barely waited for this before starting to secure the important city of Alexandria. As usual, the bulk of the population took little interest in the change of masters, and Selim had no popular insurrection to fear. The Egyptians rejoiced in their deliverance from the Mameluke tyranny, and probably few among them were far-sighted enough to see that the Ottoman yoke must needs press more heavily still. Alexandria submitted without striking a blow, and Selim went back to Cairo to reorganise the Government before himself returning to Constantinople—or Stamboul, as the Greek name became on Oriental lips.

He began by an act of tyranny which secured for himself a pre-eminent title to Moslem loyalty. The Abbaside Kaliphs still lived in Cairo under the protection of the Mameluke Sultans, and exercised a real though undefined jurisdiction over the Moslem world, in much the same manner as the present Pope of Rome reigns over the Roman Catholic world. But Selim was not inclined to admit any superior to himself, whether spiritual or temporal. He forced the reigning Kaliph, who was a prisoner in his hands, to abdicate in his favour all his authority and the rights pertaining to his office, as well as the office itself. It was publicly proclaimed that henceforth the Ottoman Sultan was also the legitimate Kaliph, sole lord, both spiritual and temporal, of the Moslem world.

The traitor Khayr Bey, who had been the first to desert to the Ottoman side at the critical moment of the great battle, was rewarded by being made the first vice-roy—or, as this official was called, the Pasha of Egypt. But Selim had no intention of leaving any Emir in such a position that he might, with some hope of success, attempt to secure the kingdom for himself.

The Pasha was to be a living figure-head, the representative of the dignity and grandeur of the Sultan, and his mouthpiece; but over the army he had no control, nor could he do anything without the consent of a Privy Council composed of the Aghas (or commanders) of the six regiments. This council had a right to suspend the execution of any order he might give, while the question was referred to Constantinople, and even to depose him if they had any reason to suspect him of treachery. The commander-in-chief of the six regiments (or Odjaks) which composed the new army of occupation resided in the citadel, but was little more than a state prisoner as far as his personal liberty was concerned, since during the whole term of his command he was strictly forbidden to leave the citadel. The first man appointed was Khayr-ed-din, one of Selim's principal generals and a stranger to Egypt. Of the six regiments under his command, only one was formed out of the Egyptian Mamelukes; but Selim's successor added a seventh, which was also composed of those Mamelukes who consented to take service under the Ottoman Sultan. From among the Mameluke Emirs whose lives had been spared on their submission to the conquering Selim he chose twelve, who, with the title of Bey, were made governors of the twelve sandjaklys (or military districts) into which Egypt was divided.

These astute arrangements certainly succeeded in their object, which was to maintain the sovereignty in Egypt of the distant Sultan, but made no provision whatever for the good government of the country. The bulk of the population, whether Moslem or Christian, was worse off than ever, as they soon discovered—since, however the different military parties might disagree with one another, they all agreed in spoiling the Egyptians. The latter also suffered from a new form of injustice and tyranny at the hands of their latest conqueror. Up to this time the ancient arts and handicrafts of Egypt had never quite died out, and under the later European, as distinct from the Turkish, Mameluke Sultans, they had even been encouraged. Most of the beautiful work now to be seen in the mosques and churches of Egypt dates from the latter half of the thirteenth and the whole of the fourteenth century, during which the European Mamelukes reigned. As Christians, the Egyptians were relentlessly persecuted; as artists, as architects, as physicians, as illuminators and scribes, as wood-carvers, as embroiderers, as silk manufacturers—in short, as ministers in any form conducive to the luxury and beauty of life, they were tolerated, and, if they adopted the Moslem religion, encouraged and rewarded. At the time of the Ottoman conquest many no doubt of the artistic classes had become Moslems, but Selim does not seem to have distinguished between the Moslem or Christian Copts in the wholesale order he gave for the forcible exportation of the best of these artists and artificers to Constantinople. So comprehensive were his directions, and so ruthlessly were they carried out, that even the Moslem eulogists of the Sultan admit that he caused the ruin of more than fifty different Egyptian industries.

The yearly tribute of Egypt was fixed at 600,000 piastres (about 6,150*l.*), in addition to a booty of a thousand camel-loads of gold and silver which Selim, according to a Moslem historian, took back with him to Constantinople. Selim only lived three years after his conquest of Egypt, and much still remained to be done by his son Suliman II., whose reign lasted nearly half a century. The latter created two deliberative assemblies in place of one, called the Great Divan and the Little Divan. He increased the number of the Mameluke Beys from twelve to twenty-four, and added another Mameluke regiment to the Egyptian army; but the radical change which he made was in the tenure of the land. In despair of ever understanding the fiscal system of Egypt, or its land tenure, he solved the difficulty by a comprehensive act of annexation. He published an edict declaring that he was himself the sole landowner of the whole country of Egypt.¹

He then farmed out the districts to different men, who were called Mouletezzims, who had the right to sub-let their concessions. They paid the Sultan so much down, and collected as much more as they could from their subordinate officials, who did the same thing in their turn. The Sultan reserved to himself the right to revoke the concessions if he did not get as much money out of them as he expected. It will be seen that by this means a premium was put upon robbery and dishonesty of every description among the Government officials. From the Pasha, who was liable to be recalled at any day, down to the smallest collector of taxes, but one idea prevailed—to make as much money as possible during their brief and uncertain tenure of office. From the conquest of Egypt by Selim to the invasion of Napoleon in 1798—a period of 281 years—the Governor of Egypt was changed by order from Stamboul 119 times, not counting temporary revolts. Sometimes the same man was reappointed after the interval of a year or two; but for the most part they were all strangers, who regarded their office as a tiresome exile, only bearable because it was a speedy road to private wealth. Occasionally, as in the case of Daoud (or David) Pasha, ninth in the list, whose government lasted twelve years, the Pasha of Egypt chanced to be a man of learning and probity, who welcomed and used the opportunities which, even in her worst days, Egypt offered to the Oriental for study both of the arts and sciences. But this happened rarely; the average duration of the Pasha's government was from one to two years, and he was lucky if in the end he was permitted to retire with his ill-gotten gains. It not infrequently happened that the cupidity of the reigning Sultan was aroused, the outgoing Pasha was put to death on some pretext, and his wealth confiscated.

¹ This Suliman II. is held up by some Western historians, particularly by a modern English writer, as an instance of the superiority of the Moslems to the Christians whom they governed. Yet even his English apologist remarks that he was spared the usual fratricide because he had no brothers to slay, and admits that he slew anyone in cold blood without pretence of trial who happened to annoy him. Still, it is true that with all his faults Suliman II. was one of the best Moslem and Turkish Sultans.

The third on the list, whose name is given by some authorities as Ahmed, and by some as Suliman, tried to make himself independent, and in the riots which were thus occasioned the archives of Egypt were burnt. The rebel was beheaded, and the rebellion met with no popular support.

The Ottoman Sultans appear to have favoured the Greek rather than the National Church in Egypt, and the Greek Patriarchs were consequently less afraid to reside there. At the time of the conquest the National Patriarch was John XII.; the Greek was Mark III. But nothing is known of either beyond their names, nor of their successors, John XIII. and Philotheus or Theophilus. All communication between the Egyptian Church and Abyssinia, which was also the scene of great revolutions at this time, was cut off. The Abyssinian Emperor was persuaded to accept an archbishop from the Portuguese settlers, a man named Joas Bermudez, who went to receive consecration from the Pope of Rome. The Pope not only ordained him Metropolitan of Abyssinia but Patriarch of Alexandria—an act of aggressive schism which, however, was simply ignored by both the Greek and Egyptian Churches in Egypt.¹ In 1526 John XIII. is said to have been succeeded by Gabriel VII.; but there is great uncertainty about the duration of the reign of John XIII., and some writers deny the fact of his existence. His name, however, is in the Christian lists, and without him we should be driven to conclude that the reigns of John XII. and Gabriel VII.

¹ This fact, however, entirely disposes of the Roman claims to an unbroken authority over the Coptic Church from the time of the Council of Florence to the present day. If the Patriarch of the Egyptian Church acknowledged the Pope's authority in Egypt, how could the latter possibly, without formal deposition, appoint another Patriarch of that Church?

covered between them the space of eighty-eight years,¹ which, considering that a Patriarch was always chosen in the prime of life, canonically not before he was fifty, seems incredible. It was probably John XIII. who ruled the Egyptian Church during the governorship of David Pasha, who governed well and devoted a good deal of his time to the collection of a valuable library.

After the death of David Pasha the country rapidly went from bad to worse. Brigandage increased to an alarming extent, and old roads became deserted. The last and the worst of the Pashas appointed by Sultan Suliman was a man named Mahmoud, who indulged his greed and cruelty without restraint, and was eventually as he rode through the streets fired at by an assassin hired to get rid of him. He fell mortally wounded, and, as the shot came from the direction of a walled garden, two innocent gardeners at work there were instantly beheaded by his guards, while the real murderer escaped. A riot was expected, and the shops were hastily shut; but the Emirs, some of whom were supposed to be responsible for the murder, calmed the people, and assured them that no further violence was intended. No one was concerned to revenge the death of the tyrant, and the Pasha who succeeded him was a welcome relief to the Egyptians, who for nearly eight years were left in comparative peace under three successive governors appointed by Sultan Selim II. The tyranny of the Mameluke Beys was always with them, but it was not till the last two years of Selim's reign that the increase of brigandage in Egypt became a scandal too great to be ignored.

The Soudanese kingdoms had now ceased to exist.

¹ John XII. succeeded in 1481 Gabriel VII. died in 1569.

Most of the country groaned under the tyranny of irresponsible Arab slave dealers, but about this time a negro tribe overran the southern kingdom, elected a king or Sultan, and fixed their capital at Sennaar.

During the reigns of Suliman I. and Selim II. the country of Abyssinia was distracted by civil and religious war. King David, hopeless of success against his Mohammedan foes without European help, had allied himself with the Portuguese against them, at the price of submitting to receive his Patriarch from the Pope of Rome instead of from Alexandria. On the death of David, his son Claudius, who was but eighteen years of age, had continued the Portuguese alliance until the forces of the Moslem ruler of Adel had in a decisive battle been thoroughly routed. But as soon as the kingdom was comparatively at peace, Claudius, while he treated the Roman clergy with all honour, refused to acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope of Rome in his dominions, and sent an embassy to Gabriel VII., the Patriarch of the Egyptian Church, to ask that his true Spiritual Head would send him an Abuna. A priest named Joseph was accordingly consecrated, and received by the Abyssinians with great honour and rejoicing. Bermudez, finding that he had no chance of success in bringing over the Abyssinians to the Latin Church, left the country, and eventually returned to Portugal, where he wrote an account of his travels.

St. Ignatius Loyola was then at Rome, and his ardent soul burned to retrieve what seemed to him a disgraceful failure. He entreated the Pope to send him to Abyssinia; but the latter, whether fearing that his zeal would outrun his discretion, or unwilling to spare him, refused permission. He took upon himself, however, to consecrate another ecclesiastic of the Latin Church, Nuno Barreto, Patriarch in the place of Bermudez, and two others as suffragan bishops in Abyssinia. These three sailed to Goa, where Barreto stayed, and only the two suffragans went on to Abyssinia. They were received by King Claudius with courteous hospitality as honoured guests, but he firmly, however politely, refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Pope of Rome, and declared that he owed no obedience save to the Chair of St. Mark. The Roman Catholic emissaries were permitted to remain in the country, but the Abyssinians were full of zeal for their National Church, and they made no converts. Claudius occupied himself with rebuilding and restoring the churches which had been overthrown by the Mohammedans in the late war. One which he rebuilt received the nick-name of the 'Mountain of Gold,' from the splendour of the materials employed in its construction.

As soon as the Moslems had recovered from their late defeat they again invaded Abyssinia, and Claudius, as before, marched against them in person. But the omens were against him, and the superstitious Abyssinians, seized with panic, fled at the first fire. Claudius, left alone with twenty of his own cavaliers and eighteen Portuguese musketeers, was surrounded by the Moslems, and, after selling their lives as dearly as possible, they were destroyed to a man. The king had no less than twenty wounds; but, notwithstanding the gallantry which would have moved the admiration of an honourable foe, his head was cut off and set up for the mockery of the Moslems for three years, till it was ransomed by an Armenian merchant and honourably buried at Antioch.

Claudius was succeeded by his brother Mena, or Mennas, and he did not show the same courtesy towards the Roman ecclesiastics, who were extremely unpopular in the country. Indignant at the coldness and dislike of the king, and unmindful of the kindness they had received from his heroic brother, the Latin clergy, having 'converted' one of the principal Abyssinian noblemen, joined him in an alliance with the Moslems against his lawful and Christian sovereign. Mennas, however, marched against the rebels and their Moslem allies, and defeated them, but died, probably of his wounds, shortly afterwards, leaving the throne to his son Segued, a boy of twelve.

Either before or on the news of the defeat the Pope, who, it is charitable to conclude, was disgusted at the conduct of his missionaries, despatched an embassy to Gabriel, the Egyptian Patriarch. Gabriel received the ambassador, a Jesuit named Christopher Rodrigo, with courtesy and honour, but firmly refused to treat on any other basis than the perfect independence of his own National Church. Owing probably to his influence, however, the traitorous Latin ecclesiastics in Abyssinia were forgiven and permitted to reside in Abyssinia; but, having by their own act enlisted the feelings of every respectable Abyssinian against them, they made no progress whatever, and reported that the conversion of Abyssinia could only be effected by the sword. The Regent of Portugal eventually persuaded Pope Pius to recall his clergy, and so ended the first Portuguese mission to Abyssinia.

CHAPTER XXXIV

INFLUENCE OF THE REFORMATION IN EGYPT

A.D. 1574
A.M. 1290
A.H. 982

THE first Governor of Egypt appointed under Sultan Murad III. in 1574 (A.H. 982) was Messih Pasha el Khadam, who had been treasurer at the Court of Constantinople. He retained his office for five years, and put down brigandage in Egypt with a strong hand. It is recorded that during those five years he put to death nearly ten thousand people, 'for the most part criminals.' He was a stern but apparently a just ruler, and, instead of using the unfortunate country as a mere stepping-stone to private wealth, he refused even the bribes which were offered to him. He was a good Moslem, and added to the number of mosques in Cairo.

With his successor, however, Hassan Pasha el Khadam, the old system returned in full force, and money was exacted with such shameless rapacity that the Sultan interfered. Hassan was recalled, and left Cairo under cover of the night by the way of the tombs for fear of popular vengeance; while his successor, Ibrahim Pasha, was bidden to institute a searching inquiry into his proceedings. The wholesale robbery which was brought to light, not only of every Egyptian official with whom the ex-governor had come in contact, but of the Sultan himself—among other things it was proved that he had stolen from the public treasury 100,442 ardebs of corn and sold them for his own profit—justified the Sultan's suspicions. He had the ex-governor strangled, and confiscated to his own use all the riches which Hassan had heaped up.

Ibrahim Pasha took the unusual step of making a visit of inspection throughout Egypt. He even travelled to the southern deserts, and made his way to the long-deserted emerald mines. They had been left unworked for more than two hundred years, but Ibrahim brought back a great number of the gems. Having thus thoroughly examined the country he applied for a recall, and returned to Constantinople.

After this brief respite Egypt again became a prey to plunder and anarchy, and an earthquake in 1583 added to its calamities. In 1584 (A.H. 997) open rebellion broke out among the Mameluke Emirs, and, though partly crushed, Egypt was more or less in a state of civil war between the Mamelukes and the adherents of the Ottoman Government for ten years. At the end of this time the revolt once more assumed formidable proportions; the Pasha in office took refuge in the citadel, and the soldiery wreaked their vengeance on the peaceable inhabitants of the town, among whom, as usual, the Christians suffered most.

During these years the Pope of Rome made fresh attempts to get the Egyptian Church to acknowledge his authority. In 1583 he prevailed so far that the Coptic Patriarch, John XIV., summoned a council of bishops at Babylon to hear the arguments of the Papal Legates and consider their proposals. The deliberations were stormy, for, as usual, the feeling of the whole Church was against any such surrender. But the personal influence of the aged Patriarch,¹ who longed for peace and was ready to sacrifice his own dignity, prevailed so far upon the council that decrees in conformity with the suggestions of the Papal Legates were drawn up. They were, however, never signed, for in the night the Patriarch died suddenly,² and the council broke up in confusion. The Moslem Government arrested the Papal Legates as foreign spies, and threw them into a dungeon. Unwelcome as their presence had been to the Egyptians, their sense of hospitality could not permit them to acquiesce in this solution of their difficulty. Between them the richer Copts raised a ransom of five thousand pieces of gold, which was afterwards honourably repaid by the Pope, and the Papal Legates were set free to return to their own country.³

The same story repeats itself again and again: rapacity and tyranny exercised by successive governors until a mutiny either killed them or caused the recall of the Pasha, but exposed the law-abiding classes, and particularly the Copts, to fresh outrage. In 1602 Ali Pasha carried his cruelty to such an extent that, according to the Moslem historians, he never went out without killing at least ten people on frivolous pretexts. In his time the misery of the country was augmented by a terrible famine, and afterwards by one of the most destructive pestilences ever known in Egypt. A man who lived near one of the gates of the town told Shamseed-din, the historian, that he had seen more than 300 corpses pass out by that gate alone in one day. The Pasha at last issued an order forbidding the ceremonial burial of the dead, and, in order to escape the contagion himself, he left Cairo to the charge of an Emir who died shortly afterwards, and did not return even to appoint another deputy.

¹ John, of course, was actuated by the belief that if he submitted to the Pope on the easy terms demanded, the Egyptian Christians would secure an efficient protector.

² Roman Catholic historians suggest that John was poisoned, but there is no ground for the supposition.

³ Baronius, the Roman historian, declares that John's successor made that submission to Rome which his predecessor had intended, and even gives a letter purporting to have been written by Gabriel VIII., besides asserting that the reunion was accepted by the whole Egyptian Church in January 1595. But in all this Baronius was deceived, and the account in his annals was shown to be entirely false.

In this year (1602) both the Patriarchs died, but whether of the plague or no is not stated; it is probable in the case of Gabriel VIII., but not likely so far as Meletius Piga, the Greek Patriarch, is concerned. The plague does not seem to have been so violent at Alexandria, where Meletius Piga spent his time when he came to Egypt, and where he died. He was, like so many of the Greek (or Melkite) Patriarchs in Egypt, a foreigner: Cretan by birth, and Exarch of the Church of Constantinople, as well as Patriarch of Alexandria. He had come to study in Alexandria about the year 1574, and was ordained priest by the Patriarch Silvester, who preceded him. He succeeded so well in Alexandria that he sent to Crete for a little boy who was related to him in some way, and who was afterwards celebrated as Cyril Lucar. Cyril, however, was not educated wholly in Alexandria, but was sent for some years to Venice, and returned to Alexandria when his kinsman was elected Patriarch in the room of Silvester. It was during the vacancy between the death of Silvester and the appointment of Meletius that the Council of Constantinople was held (in 1591) which sanctioned the creation of a new and independent Patriarchate, resident at Moscow, for the kingdom of Russia.

While Meletius Piga ruled the Greek Church in Egypt, Cyril Lucar travelled for some years in Europe. He certainly visited Italy, Geneva, and Holland, and, it is believed, England also, but the evidence on this last point is doubtful. He was very much struck by the state of religious faith and worship which he found in these countries, where the influence of the Reformation was then at its height; and being, like all patriotic members of the Greek Church, bitterly opposed to the pretensions of Rome, and, unlike most of his co-religionists, conscious that even his own Church stood in need of reform, he was deeply influenced in his own faith by what he saw and learned. But he returned to Alexandria still true to his own Church, and was shortly after ordained priest by Meletius Piga, and went with him to Constantinople. After a year's residence there he was despatched on a difficult and unsuccessful mission to Poland; and later he was sent to Crete, and to Constantinople again. It seems to have been on this occasion that he here made friends with Monsieur von Haga and acquired a still further bias towards the tenets of Calvinism.

This was the man who was chosen to succeed Meletius Piga after the famine and pestilence of the year 1602. His election was not unopposed, but his known wealth and learning prevailed against the vague suspicions of his want of orthodoxy. Contrary to the prevailing practice of the Greek Patriarchs in Egypt, he at once took up his residence in the country, and for ten years he governed well, endeavouring to reform abuses and yet remain loyal to the Church of his ancestors. The English traveller Sandys, who visited Egypt in 1611 and made friends with Cyril, was much impressed by his learning and high character. At that time, on the same testimony, Cyril had a just conception of the importance of the English Church as the only national Church which had achieved reformation without self-destruction, and considered that the points of difference between the English and the Eastern Churches were of no vital importance. Unfortunately, he does not seem to have been equally ready to extend the right hand of Christian fellowship to the long-suffering National Church.

Whilst the Greek Church in Egypt since the Ottoman conquest had been favoured by the dominant race and her position improved in consequence, the Egyptian Church was now almost at its lowest ebb. Poor and ignorant, servile from long centuries of brutal oppression and persecution, despised by the Moslems as infidels and by the Greek Christians as heretics, they were regarded with bitter jealousy by both—by the Moslems because their still superior learning and probity made it impossible to dispense with them in the Government, and because neither party ever forgot that the Copts were the old dominant race; and by the Greek Christians because of their incontestably superior claims to be considered the National Church of Egypt. Nothing can excuse Cyril's conduct in rejecting all overtures of friendship on the part of the Egyptian Patriarchs (of whom two were contemporary with him) or his obstinate refusal to acquaint himself with the most obvious facts concerning them,¹ and his supercilious contempt for their ignorance of European learning and customs. His own clergy, except the few who had been educated abroad, were in equal ignorance of the Western world, and learning of any kind was at a low ebb in both Churches.

¹ In a letter written to one of his Calvinist friends he describes the

All this time negotiations had been carried on between the Pope of Rome and successive Patriarchs of the Egyptian Church. Gregory XIII. had written to John XIV. to invite him to enter the Roman communion, and John's answer was returned to Gregory's successor, Sixtus V. The same overtures were made by Clement VIII. of Rome to Gabriel VIII., and the Oriental courtesy of the Egyptian Patriarch led the Pope of Rome to imagine for a time that he had succeeded in his efforts—so much so that Baronius included in his annals an account of the conversion of the Copts, much to the amusement of those who knew the circumstances in Egypt. When Mark V. succeeded to the Patriarchal throne, the same negotiations were carried on; and the Romans believe to this day that the Coptic Church would have joined the Roman communion in a body if Mark had not been suddenly and arbitrarily deposed by the Pasha of the year in Egypt. But as a matter of fact, even in her deepest misery, the Egyptian Church has clung fast to her ancient independence; and though desirous of intercommunion in Copts and the Jacobites as if they were two different religious sects, and identifies the latter with the Nestorians! In fact, he shows such deplorable ignorance of everything connected with them that Neale for some time doubted the genuineness of the letter, on the ground that such ignorance on the part of the Patriarch of Alexandria was impossible. It may, however, be paralleled any day in our enlightened century by the ignorance of some English Churchmen, who are now governing the same land of Egypt, and are responsible as Christians for the attitude they assume towards her National Church.

earlier years with both the Roman and Greek Churches, as of late with the Greek and English Churches, she has always maintained that no foreign Pope or potentate of any rank or nation whatever could exercise jurisdiction over the National Church of Egypt.

In 1604 the proceedings of the Roman Catholic missionaries in Abyssinia again attracted the attention of the Egyptian Patriarch. Four years before this time a Jesuit named Pedro Paez had set out for that country; and though imprisoned on his first arrival at Massowah he was afterwards set at liberty and permitted to reside in Abyssinia. Ever since he had lived in great retirement at Fremona, applying himself to so diligent a study of the Abyssinian language that, it was said, he could both speak and write it better than any native of the country. The fame of this learned man penetrated to the Court of Za Denghel, who had succeeded Segued, and the king sent to request him to come and give a specimen of his powers. Paez gladly accepted the challenge, confounded the native priests by his rapid arguments in their own language, and was allowed to preach a sermon before the king.

Carried away by his eloquence, the king declared himself ready to embrace the Roman Catholic faith, and many of his courtiers followed his example. But the nation indignantly rose against the king in defence of their National Church, the Abuna excommunicated him, and in the first battle the king was defeated and slain.

Two claimants for the throne, both of the royal family and ancient faith, presented themselves; and after a contest Shenouda (whose name is written Socinius by some historians, and who also took the name of Seltam Segued) was proclaimed emperor.

Paez was permitted to remain in the country, and being a true Jesuit, learned, tactful, zealous, and unscrupulous of means to an end, he soon acquired the same influence over the new king. Again in this attempt to force a foreign form of Christianity on the ignorant but steadfast Abyssinians the country was plunged into civil war. It became known that an embassy was about to be sent into Italy to notify the submission of Shenouda and the kingdom of Abyssinia to the see of Rome. Once more the Abuna published a solemn anathema of the Roman Catholic errors; once more the people took up arms in defence of their old religion and independence. This time the Emperor was victorious, but again and again the people broke out into fresh rebellion. At length, when one after another had been crushed, Shenouda openly embraced the Roman Catholic faith. Pedro Paez, whose personal character stands very high, died soon afterwards, in 1623, no doubt in the full belief that he had done well in ruining by civil war the Christian country which had given him hospitality.

CHAPTER XXXV

EGYPT IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

A.D. 1603 IN 1603 (A.H. 1012) Sultan Mohammed III. died, and
 A.M. 1819 was succeeded by Ahmed I. A new governor was at the
 A.H. 1012 same time sent into Egypt, named Ibrahim, who endeavoured to restrain the excesses of the soldiery, but was murdered by them in consequence after a few months. His successor was sent out with stringent orders, and having promised an amnesty if the actual murderers were given up, he succeeded in getting them into his hands. They were beheaded, but his promises were not strictly kept. In the seven months of his term of office he beheaded 200 of the most troublesome Emirs and Beys, and established among them a wholesome terror, which rendered the street-fights and mutinous outbreaks less common.

In January 1609 a new and more serious mutiny broke out under a governor named Mohammed, who is remarkable for the facts that he made no enemies in Egypt except the troops whose habits of brigandage and rapine he had endeavoured to restrain; that he maintained his post for more than four years, and resigned it without disgrace or dismissal. He had for two years been governor when the troops, who found themselves required to be content with their pay, instead of levying forced contributions at their pleasure on the unfortunate Fellaheen, whether Moslem or Christian, rose in revolt. The principal Emirs and Beys of the army met together and swore solemnly to overthrow the Ottoman power and restore the good old times when a Mameluke was above all law except the will of his particular military chief. They elected one of their number Sultan, another was named Wuzir, and they portioned out Egypt into various districts, with the avowed intention of living on the plunder of the districts assigned to them. But even among the Mamelukes and Janissaries there were some who refused to rise against a good governor, and who responded to an appeal made to them by Mohammed Pasha in person. They marched out in pursuit of the rebels, and a pitched battle took place at Khankah. Seeing that the day was going against them, some of the rebellious Emirs deserted their comrades, and made peace with the Pasha by delivering to him twenty-three of their officers. Shortly afterwards the greater part of the force surrendered, and about fifty of the ring-leaders were beheaded. No quarter was given to the rebels, and so many were afterwards captured and slain that at length the Kadi el Askar represented to the governor that it would be more politic to suspend the executions, and, when he had succeeded in arresting a sufficient number on promise of life, to send them instead into exile.

To this the Pasha consented, and eventually about three hundred Mamelukes, loaded with chains, were sent on camels to Suez, where they were put on board a ship bound for Yemen. The rest of his time this Pasha spent in endeavouring to lighten the burdens of the Egyptians, and to diminish the number of Government pensions enjoyed by the idle 'upper classes.'

In 1613 (A.H. 1022) ten thousand Janissaries were landed in Egypt on their way to Yemen, where the governor was endeavouring to suppress a rebellion, and had asked for reinforcements. The Pasha of Egypt (Mohammed-el-Soufi) was required to furnish them with the necessary provisions and means of transport through the country, and sent for the principal officers of the contingent to settle the amounts due. The Janissaries coolly returned for answer that Egypt would suit them very well to live in, and that they had no intention of proceeding any farther. They seized by force that quarter of Cairo adjoining the Bab-el-Nasr and the Bab-el-Futeh, turning the lawful inhabitants into the streets, and proceeded to barricade the district so strongly that the Pasha found it necessary to proceed against them by a regular siege. Nor would he have succeeded even then, but that one of his captains made his way through the empty cistern of a school near the district and surprised the rebels within their barricades. The advantage was well followed up, but no attempt seems to have been made to punish the mutineers; they were given full pay, and merely required to leave the country and proceed to their original destination.

The Pasha was dismissed, and when, nearly three years afterwards, another army was sent through Egypt to Persia, it is proudly recorded that the transit was accomplished without harm to the population of Egypt! In the two following years, however, both Constantinople and Egypt were torn by internal dissensions and rebellions. One Sultan succeeded another, only to be deposed in a few months; Pasha succeeded Pasha in Egypt, while the Egyptian Mamelukes openly defied the authority of either, and assassinations and street-fights resumed their sway.

In 1616 Cyril, the Patriarch of the Greek Church in Egypt, who had been absent some time in Europe, returned to his duties in Egypt. He had been more and more influenced in favour of the Calvinistic doctrines during his travels, and indeed was in disgrace for some time with his superior, the Patriarch of Constantinople; but a reconciliation had been effected before his return to Egypt. One of his first acts was to assemble the bishops of his own Church in Egypt, and anathematise solemnly the Roman Catholic missionaries who had by this time established themselves in the country.

It was not long, however, before Cyril became aware that his own clergy in Egypt were to the full as illiterate and as incapable of holding their own against the specially trained Roman intruders as the Copts whom he so much despised. Through the English ambassador at Constantinople he therefore made an application to the Archbishop of Canterbury (Abbot), and was invited by him to send a young priest to England, whom the archbishop undertook to educate and take charge of until he should be qualified to act as Cyril's right hand in Egypt. It may be interesting to insert Cyril's letter and the archbishop's reply:—

To the Most Blessed and Honourable the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England and Metropolitan—one in many respects to be most highly honoured by me—let this letter, when arrived in Britain, be delivered with honour and fitting reverence ;

Cyril, by the Grace of God, Pope and Patriarch of the great city Alexandria and Œcumenical Judge.

I wish good health to your Worship, to the advantage and increase of the flock entrusted to you. Since we are now by the Grace of Christ returned to our Egypt, and enjoy peace in the Church, we are called upon to acquit ourselves of the promise made to your Blessedness in our former letters. Christ enjoys in no Church a profounder peace than in this of ours, since no strife nor contention respecting the Faith prevails amongst us, since the enemies of the Christian religion who are the most bitter and the most opposed (the Moslems) put a bridle on the tongues of those who would stir up such contentions.¹ By whom, it is true, we are vexed and tried in many ways : and yet, for the name of Christ which we bear in our mouths, and Whose marks we carry about with us, we are delighted to suffer affliction and vexation, and, if need be, to undergo the severest penalty, that by the trial our faith may shine more and more, and the glory of God may be manifested.

From such, then, we fear nothing : but rather from those dogs and deceitful workers, those hypocrites who say one thing and mean another, who are audacious enough to attack God Himself, if they may only by any means assist the tyranny of the Roman Pontiff.¹

These emissaries exceedingly terrify us, and impose on our simplicity, and make use of many engines to bring us under their power, trusting chiefly in the show of erudition, and the thorny difficulties of the questions which they raise ; while we, meanwhile, labour under a want of learned men who can oppose these sophists on equal terms. For on account of our sins we have become the most contemptible of all nations, and with the overthrow of the Empire have lost the liberal arts.

It was continued meditation on this subject which induced me to open a communication with your Love, and to implore your counsel and assistance. But we received the greatest comfort from the reply of your Blessedness, by which, acting under the command of your king, you advised us to send some of our countrymen to study theology amongst you with diligence.

¹ These expressions refer to the Roman Catholic missionaries in Egypt.

Here, then, is a Greek, by rank a Presbyter, possessing a good knowledge of Greek literature, a child of our Alexandrian Church, of noble birth, and talents prepared to receive deeper learning. We trust that the advances he will make will be such as need not to be repented of, if Divine Grace will breathe on him from Heaven, and your Blessedness will lend him an assisting hand.

And because you say that this plan is acceptable to the most serene King James the First, who is crowned by the hand of God, we ought to be grateful for his kindness, in which he makes a near approach to the pity and goodness of the Celestial King. In this he has fulfilled our expectations, as one whom God hath blessed from Heaven and enriched with the fullest gifts of His Grace, and by His special Providence committed to his care such and so large an Empire.

Therefore we first request your Blessedness to salute in our name, with the most profound reverence and with the most humble inclination of the body, His Most Gracious Majesty, to whom, from our very hearts, we desire long life and extended old age. Then we would ask him that, of his innate, and I had almost said immense goodness, he would allow some sparkle of his benevolence to shine on our Metrophanes.

Lastly, if anything be wanting in my letter with respect to the instruction or complete education of this man, this will easily be supplied by your prudence, which God has raised up and set forth as a shining torch in an exalted place, in order that you may be able to give consolation to others, not only to your Britons, but also to our Greek countrymen.

Farewell, most Blessed Father ; may the Lord God grant you a long and happy life, and at the same time supply you with strength in order that you may be enabled to bear the cares of the State and of the Church.

Egypt, March 1, 1616 (i.e. 1617).

Metrophanes reached England in safety, was well received by the king and the archbishop, and was sent to Oxford.

Abbot's reply was as follows:—

London, Nov. 17, 1617.

George Abbot, by Divine Providence Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England and Metropolitan, to his Most Holy Lord and Brother, Cyril, Pope and Patriarch of Alexandria, and Œcumenical Judge, health in Christ.

There are many things which testify the sympathy existing between, and the sweet agreement enjoyed by, the members of the Universal Church; but at this time I feel it on this account especially, in that I am enabled to embrace with both arms your brotherhood, whom I have never seen face to face, though divided from me by many a league of land and sea, as if present; for the unity of faith binds each to each, and the common bond of love joins us by one and the selfsame Spirit, by Whom we extol Christ, Whom we both breathe: and we heartily congratulate you on the peace which your Church enjoys now, from your account disturbed by no schism or intestine commotion, and that external tranquillity which, if not altogether undisturbed, yet fills us with astonishment, which you enjoy among the bitter and determined enemies of the Christian name, according to that of the Royal Seer concerning Christ the King, 'Be Thou Ruler in the midst among Thine enemies.' We also request the congratulation of your piety on the manifold gifts of God poured out abundantly on the British Church. In which, to quote what your Chrysostom once said of our island, 'you may hear the people philosophising from Holy Scripture in a strange tongue, but a familiar faith, using the language of barbarians, professing the faith of Saints.' For our people, devoted to the worship of Christ, is conversant in the clear light of the Gospel, and abundantly satisfies its thirst in the limpid streams of living water, without hindrance from any; and this cannot be obtained in the Churches under the obedience of the Roman Pontiff. As to discipline, we differ from the other Churches which have been purged from the dregs of Popery; we retain the most ancient form of Ecclesiastical rule, and the distinct orders of ministers. God, the Giver of all good things, preserve them to us for ever; though we, after the depravity of our mind, have on account of our sins, and more especially the crime of ingratitude, deserved that our golden candlestick should be removed from its place, and ourselves entirely deprived of the light of Holy Scripture. We do not ascribe the good we have received to our own merits, for we have none; but first to the Divine loving kindness, and next to the singular love wherewith He embraces the elect instrument of His glory, our most serene King James, who, heir both to the crown and to the religion of Elizabeth of pious memory, confirms them by his laws, and renders them illustrious by his example. For he not only is a diligent hearer of holy discourses, and a guest at the tremendous Table of the Lord, especially in the more solemn feasts; but also, which is more than example and the greatest thing in this great monarch,

Qui tot sustineat, qui tanta negotia solus, he discusses learnedly the most abstruse mysteries of the schools with the bishops best practised in the arena of Divinity. He has also written much and accurately on Theology, and his works have lately been given to the Press: they are well calculated to establish the Faith and to destroy errors, particularly those of the Romanists. I congratulate you on having obtained the entire friendship of such a King who, on the perusal of the letters of your Holiness to myself, salutes your Blessedness, and speaks of you in the most flattering manner. And to give you a proof of his good-will, he has commanded me to receive your Metrophanes in a kind and friendly manner. I will cherish him as a pledge and surety of your love to me, and will gladly supply him with whatever is necessary or may be convenient. I have already planted this generous young shoot of a Grecian school in a pleasant garden, where he may flourish amongst us, and in good time bring forth fruit ; it is in the University of Oxford, where there is a most excellent library and seventeen colleges, and where a numerous race of learned men are supported at the public expense, as in a Prytanæum. Your Metrophanes is already entered on the books ; and when he has come to maturity, and brought forth fruit, then, as shall seem best to your prudence and be most for the advantage of your Church, he shall either take deep root amongst us, or be sent back to his native soil and there again planted.

I have only, Most Holy Brother, to ask that your piety will commend the British Church to God by continual prayer, as we shall intercede for that of Greece in like manner : that it, with the Divine Providence as with a wall, may be confirmed in peace and love ; and that it may be freed from these new emissaries who oppugn with their treachery alike Christian verity and Christian liberty. Among whom those pseudo-monks are chiefly to be avoided, now fresh from the potter's wheel, who arrogate to themselves the name of the Saviour,¹ who, professing to seek peace, throw all things into confusion, and desiring, as they profess, truth, teach equivocation, even where it involves perjury. The Great Shepherd of the sheep preserve His whole flock from these foxes and rapacious wolves ; and at the same time preserve your piety in peace and perpetual felicity.

Unfortunately, however, for the Greek Church in Egypt, a Dutch gentleman named David le Leu de Wilhem, who held strong Calvinistic tenets, spent some time travelling in Egypt, and acquired great influence over the mind of Cyril, so that he gradually renounced his faith in the teaching of his own Church while retaining his position as her ruler or head. Already in 1618 he writes to thank the Archbishop of Spalatro, immediately after the latter had left the Roman communion for the English Church, for a copy of 'De Republica Christiana,' which the archbishop had sent him, and the following extracts from his letter show his attitude of mind both towards the Roman and the Egyptian Churches. They also show how very far his personal opinions, here openly expressed, had diverged from the doctrines taught by his Church :—

¹ The Jesuits.

I was ill and confined to my bed when your book and your letter were brought me. I instantly read the letter, and as soon as I understood what the book was, what the argument, and who was the author, I called for the work, took it in my hands, and did not desist from its perusal until the visit of my physician put a stop to it. The physician came and felt my pulse ; I handed to him the book, for he is a Romanist by religion. What did he say ? Does your Holiness wish to hear ? Nothing else than the general accusation of the Romanists, that it was the refusal of the dignity of the Cardinalate, for which you were anxious, that caused you to fall into your apostasy ! As if it were apostasy to obey sincerity and liberty of conscience, and no longer to tolerate the ambition and delusions of the Roman Pontiff. . . . This one thing I consider a fault, that your prudence, misled by Baronius, took that Alexandrian illusion for a real embassy.¹ It was nothing in the world but the imposture of some Copt or Eutychian who went to Rome and gave himself out for a Legate of the Patriarch of Alexandria. Before the discovery of the trick, the flatterers of Clement wrote and preached wonders of this Legation, as if the time were at hand when the whole world should be one Fold under the Roman Pontiff. But on the creation of Paul and detection of the fraud the Legate was secretly banished from Rome, lest the farce should be discovered, and returned to Egypt. . . . The case was the same in that history of the Russian Bishops, of which I might speak, because I was then Nuncio from Alexandria in Poland, the Legate of Constantinople being my colleague, and was present among the whole nation of the Russians in the Council of Brzesc, assembled against those very bishops who had been to Rome, unless it were useless to waste time and to abuse your patience by entering into the deceits, wiles, and stratagems of the Romanists. . . . There was a time, when we were bewitched, before we understood what was the very pure Word of God ; and although we did not communicate with the Roman Pontiff, nor receive him for what he gave himself out, namely, the Head of the Church, yet we believed that except in some matters of little moment in which the Greek Church differs from the Latin, the dogmas of the Roman Communion were true ; and we abominated the doctrine of the Reformed Churches as opposed to the Faith, in good truth not knowing what we abominated. But when it pleased the merciful God to enlighten us, and to give us understanding of our former error, we began to reflect what it was our duty to do : and as it is the part of a good citizen in any sedition to defend the juster cause, much more did I think it the duty of a good Christian not to dissimulate his sentiments in matters pertaining to salvation, but ingenuously to embrace that side which is most consentaneous to the Word of God. What then did I do ? Having obtained, through the kindness of friends, some writings of Evangelical Doctors, which the East have not only never seen, but, through the influence of the censures of Rome, never even heard of, I invoked earnestly the assistance of the Holy Ghost, and for three years compared the doctrines of the Greek and Latin Churches with that of the Reformed. I left the Fathers, and took for my guide Scripture and the 'Analogy of Faith' alone. At length, through the Grace of God, because I discovered that the cause of the Reformers was the more just and more in accordance with the doctrine of Christ, I embraced it. I can no longer endure to hear men say that the comments of human tradition are of equal weight with Holy Scripture. As for Image worship, it is impossible to say how pernicious under present circumstances it is. God is my witness that I deplore the present state of the East, because I can see no method by which this ugly and shameful wound can be healed. Not that I think that images are, absolutely speaking, to be condemned, since when not adored they cannot occasion any mischief; but I abhor the idolatry which they cause to these blind worshippers. And although in my private prayers I have sometimes observed that the Crucifix was an assistance to my mind, as bringing more readily before it the act itself of the Passion, yet because I see that the vulgar, not to say it of some who are wise enough in their own opinions, are carried away from the true and spiritual worship and latria which is due to God alone, I had rather that all would entirely abstain from this so perilous handle of sin, rather than that by ignorantly violating God's law they should stumble on the rock of offence, and condemn themselves eternally. As for invocations of Saints, time was when I did not perceive how they eclipsed the glory of our Lord Christ, and I obstinately defended them by two works against the learned Transylvanian Marcus Fuxia. But in his answer he so completely refuted my arguments that I had need of no other book to prove my error; and now I call the Lord to witness that in reciting the Public Office it gives me the greatest pain to hear the Saints invoked circumstantially, to the dereliction of Jesus Christ and the great detriment of souls.

It was in the time of Gabriel VIII. that this supposed embassy was sent to Rome.

At first Cyril's views seem to have been those of the English Church, but the influence of his friend, M. de Wilhem, led him to become a follower of Calvin and to despair of reforming his own Church, in which he soon ceased to take any interest. Doubtless the more devout among its members regarded their Patriarch as a heretic foreigner, and the opportunity of giving new life to the Greek Church in Egypt was lost. The Egyptian Church was no better, and a new heresy at this time appeared of a more serious nature, since it was practical and not speculative. The morals of the Egyptian Christians had suffered greatly from long association with the Moslems, and it had often been necessary for the bishops to protest against concubinage in one form or another. But now for the first time one of the bishops (of Damietta) openly declared that polygamy, which is not forbidden in the New Testament, was better than fornication or adultery, and preached in favour of permitting the Christians to have more wives than one.

Finding that remonstrance had no effect, the Patriarch (Mark V.) excommunicated his bishop. If the latter had merely protested against the sentence, and endeavoured to defend his own opinions, it would be possible to consider him as a sincerely religious though much-mistaken man. But he took a course which deprived him of all claim to consideration. He used all his influence with one of those Copts who, as usual, held the offices of trust at Court, to revenge himself on his Patriarch; and the Moslem governor, a man named Jaaffa, welcomed the opportunity for humiliating the Christians. Mark was summoned before him, and so severely beaten that he died shortly afterwards.

To add to the miseries of Egypt, a terrible visitation of the plague decimated the population in the winter of this year. Those who could, fled the country; among others, M. de Wilhem, who sent Cyril a pair of globes as a parting present. The Egyptian Church was without a head, and Cyril, though he did not actually fly the country, lost what little hold over his Church he still possessed by his conduct on this occasion. He writes, apparently without any comprehension of the fact that he was shirking a plain duty: 'They reckon up to this day (the spring of 1619) that four hundred thousand have died; and yet the corners, I might almost say the whole streets of this vast city are still full, and it does not seem as if one were wanting. I remained shut up with great danger in my house, and let down from my windows the answers which I had to make to my Christians respecting the dead; and by the grace of God am safe up to this time.'

It is stated by Shamse-ed-din that a rough account was kept of the shopkeepers and people employed in the bazaars who died of the plague, and that the numbers of deaths among these alone amounted to 635,000, 'without counting those who died in other places.'

During these sad times the Egyptians elected a new Patriarch, John XV., surnamed Melawani, who lived about nine years, but of whose government we have no record. The Pasha of the year after the plague was more than usually unjust and tyrannical, and the Nile flood was so high that it did great harm instead of good to the country, so that famine was added to the plague, which broke out again, though with less virulence.

In 1621 another revolution precipitated the Sultan Osman from the throne, and replaced Mustapha I. As usual, the Pasha of Egypt was changed, and the outgoing Pasha fled up the Nile, pursued by the soldiers of his successor. Another revolution in a few months placed Murad IV. on the throne.

Between these two, in 1621, Cyril Lucar thankfully shook the Egyptian dust off his feet on his promotion to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. He was succeeded by Gerasimus, who was, like himself, a native of Crete, but who was firmly attached to the Eastern Church and had no sympathy with the Calvinists. On his arrival in Constantinople Cyril engaged in a struggle with the Jesuits, who were actively engaged in proselytising the members of his Church in that city, and published a pastoral decree commanding the faithful to withdraw from all communion with the members of the Latin Church. But he had under-estimated the strength of his enemy. The Jesuits determined to remove him, and bribed the Moslem Wuzir to exile Cyril¹ on some frivolous pretext to Rhodes. They even procured by unworthy means the election of the Archbishop of Adrianople to fill his place. This was made a personal matter between the Roman Pope and the English king. Urban VIII. wrote to thank and congratulate the French ambassador at Constantinople on the success of the Jesuits, while James I. wrote to the English ambassador to instruct him that Cyril Lucar was to be reinstated at whatever cost. In the end the English prevailed, and Cyril Lucar returned to his post. The Jesuits were unwilling to accept defeat, and the contest resolved itself into one of bribes. The melancholy history may be read at some length in Neale, but would be out of place here, since Cyril's personal connection with Egypt ceased when he resigned his Patriarchate there in November 1621. For seventeen years the Jesuits and the Greeks outbid each other in bribes to the Moslem authorities, to whom the affair was as good as a handsome yearly annuity. Eventually the Jesuits contrived to secure not only Cyril's exile but his death warrant. The unfortunate prelate was strangled by the Moslems, on a small boat, out of sight of land, lest there should be any attempt at a rescue.

¹ Chrysoculus is the authority for this statement.

His pupil Metrophanes, whom the Archbishop of Canterbury supported for the five years of his education at Oxford, did not turn out so well as they had hoped, as the following letter from the archbishop will show :—

The Grecian Critopulus Metrophanes hath taken his journey very lately into France or Holland, pretending from thence to go by land to Constantinople. I bred him full five years in Oxford, with good allowance for diet, clothes, books, chamber, and other necessaries ; so that his expense, since his coming into England, doth amount almost to three hundred pounds. While he was in that University he carried himself well : and at Michaelmas last I sent for him to Lambeth, taking care that in a very good ship he might be conveyed with accommodation of all things by the way. But by the ill-counsel of somebody, he desired to go to the Court at Newmarket, that he might see the King before his departure. His Majesty used him well, but then he was put into a conceit that he might get something to buy him books to carry home to the Patriarch. The means that he gaped after were such as you can hardly believe : as first, that he should have a knight to be made for his sake ; and then, after that, a baronet, wherein a projector should have shared with him ; after that the king was to be moved to give the advowson of a benefice, which a false simoniacal person did promise to buy of him. I caused my chaplain to dissuade him from these things, and interposed my own censure in it, as thinking these courses to be unfit, unwise, and unworthy. But, to satisfy his desire, I bought him new out of the shop many of the best Greek authors, and among them Chrysostom's eight tomes. I furnished him also with other books of worth, in Latin and in English ; so that I may boldly say it was a present fit for me to send to the Patriarch of Constantinople. In the meantime, since Michaelmas last, I lodged him in my own house ; I sat him at my own table, I clothed him, and provided all conveniences for him, and would once again have sent him away in a good ship, that he might safely have returned, but he fell into the company of certain Greeks, with whom we have been much troubled with collections and otherwise ; and although I knew them to be counterfeits and vagabonds (as sundry times you have written unto me), yet I could not keep my man within doors, but he must be abroad with them, to the expense of his time and money. In brief, writing a kind of epistle unto me that he would rather lose his books, suffer imprisonment, and loss of life, than go home in any ship ; but that he would see the parts of Christendom, and better his experience that way, I found that he meant to turn rogue and beggar, and more I cannot tell what ; and thereupon I gave him ten pounds in his purse, and leaving him to Sir Paul Pindar's care, at my removing to Croydon about a fortnight since, I dismissed him. I had heard before of the baseness and slavishness of that nation, but I could never have believed that any creature in human shape, having learning and such education as he hath had here, could after so many years have been so far from any ingenuity or any grateful respect. But he must take his fortune, and I will learn by him to entreat so well no more of his fashion. Only I have thus at large acquainted you with the unworthy carriage of this fellow, which, though it be indecent in him, yet for the Patriarch's sake I grudge it not unto him.

Croydon, August 12, 1622.

However, apparently about the year 1626, Metrophanes returned to Constantinople, and was warmly received by Cyril, who was satisfied with a very imperfect explanation of his lingering nearly four years on his way. Ten years afterwards, when Gerasimus retired into a monastery, Metrophanes was appointed Patriarch of the Greek Church in Egypt in his stead, but only survived his elevation about two years.

During the first half of this century a new Roman Catholic mission was despatched to Abyssinia, and again plunged the country into all the horrors of civil war, since almost their only convert was the king. They prevailed upon him to decree the immediate reception, on pain of death, of the Roman Catholic religion; the nation once more took up arms in defence of her National Church, and the war was carried on with the utmost bitterness for six years. At the end of that time the king died, and his son and successor at once threw off the Papal yoke, announced the re-establishment of the ancient faith, and sent to Egypt for a Metropolitan. The Roman missionaries were at first allowed to remain in the country; but when it was found that they were trying to bring in Portuguese troops, to re-establish the Roman faith by force of arms, they were kindly but firmly bidden by Facilidas the king to leave the country. Instead of doing so, they joined with an Abyssinian nobleman, who was still in rebellion against his sovereign, but he sold them to the Turks. The chief among them managed to raise money for his own ransom; the others, though pardoned by Facilidas, who endeavoured to procure their release, fell victims to the fury of the mob. Facilidas then forbade the entrance of any Roman missionaries into his kingdom, and nine Capuchins, who later made an attempt to do so, fell victims to their zeal. But Abyssinia never really recovered the miseries brought upon her by more than a century of civil war. Such was the only result of the perpetual endeavours of the Roman Pontiffs during that time to impose their yoke on this race of ignorant but loyal mountaineers.

Under Murad IV. (1623 to 1640) and the eight Pashas who ruled Egypt in his name, we have the same monotonous list of exactions, revolutions, and calamities. The best of these governors was Khalil; the worst was Hussein. The former exacted no more than his dues from the people, did his best to keep the troops in order, and repressed the brigandage which was yearly making Egypt more unsafe. In return he was dismissed before two years were out, all his goods were confiscated by the Sultan, and he was sent into exile, only two slaves being permitted to accompany him.

Hussein brought with him a large number of Druses, who were permitted to terrorise and fleece the unarmed population on their own account. There was no law in Egypt in his time but the irresponsible will of the Pasha; and, in addition to all his other acts of injustice, he paralysed trade by falsifying the currency, and put to death in the two years of his stay 12,000 persons without trial, 'not counting those whom he killed with his own hand.' Another Pasha, whose tyranny lasted three years, devoted himself especially to injuring the trade of Egypt, and imposed a new and arbitrary tax on the silk weavers which nearly ruined their industry. There were at this time about seventeen thousand silk weavers in the three towns Cairo, Embaba, and Gizeh, most of whom were probably Christians.¹

¹ Shamse-ed-din has some interesting remarks in his twelfth and thirteenth chapters on the industries and products of Egypt at this time. He remarks that the long-famous balsam gardens of Egypt had now quite disappeared, and that the balsam used by the chemist and physician was brought from the Hejaz. The beautiful linen manufactures of Assiut were also ruined, but a good deal was still made in the Fayoum, and the finer kinds of embroidered stuff at Akhmin; the cultivation of the vine lingered in some districts, and Egypt was still famous for its honey. He says in the year 1085 (A.D. 1625) the Egyptian taxes produced eighteen hundred thousand dinars, of which only six hundred thousand were sent as tribute to Constantinople, the rest served for the support of Mecca and Medina and the payment of the troops! This sum, he says, is independent of the revenue which the Beyler Bey (or Pasha of Egypt) collected for himself. It will be observed that public works or the maintenance of any arrangement for the well-being of the people are not so much as mentioned in this estimate.

During this time John XV. died, and was succeeded by Matthew III., while the Patriarch of the Greek Church was changed twice. To Gerasimus succeeded that Metrophanes who had been educated in England; and after his death, in 1638, he was replaced by a man who took the name of Nicephorus.

The accession of Sultan Ibrahim brought no change for the better. Under his first Pasha, Mustapha, brigandage increased to such an extent that even the towns were not safe, and hardly a night passed without one or more daring robberies being committed in Cairo itself, so that some quarters became deserted by the inhabitants. When the brigands were arrested, which occasionally happened, they paid a certain proportion of their ill-gotten gains in back-sheesh to the authorities, and were immediately set at liberty.

Since the conquest of Egypt by the Ottomans the outbreaks of plague had also become more frequent and severe.¹ In 1642 it broke out again with greater fury than ever.

¹ The plague of Egypt may be described as 'hunger fever.' It always breaks out after famine or a long period of under-feeding, and rarely attacks well-nourished persons.

It began at Boulac, in November 1642, and did not cease its ravages till May 1643. In no less than two hundred and thirty villages of Egypt every soul perished, and Shamse-ed-din reckons that in three months about eighteen hundred thousand burials took place in Cairo. But even if he includes, as he certainly intends to do, the five towns of Babylon, Fostat, Masr, Cairo, and Boulac in the term Cairo, this still seems an outrageous exaggeration, since the entire population of the same districts is less than six hundred thousand at the present day.

Owing to the terrible oppression and calamities of the last sixty years a number of the Egyptians, and particularly of the Christians, who were always the worst off, had been reduced to slavery. A number of Christian slaves had also been acquired in the constant wars of the Sultans, and these were employed in forced labour for the Government. Much excitement was caused in Egypt in January 1644 (A.H. 1053), by the daring escape of a number of these Christians. They were employed in shipbuilding at Alexandria, and, wishing to launch a newly built vessel, the governor called up all the slaves at work near, to the number of 600, and was compelled to order their chains to be taken off, as it was impossible otherwise to achieve the work. Instantly about 150 of them, probably Europeans, sprang together and turned upon the Moslems, who did not venture to oppose them. They forced the door of the arsenal, secured arms, marched deliberately into Alexandria, and helped themselves to everything they wanted from the shops; then, returning to the harbour, they seized one of the vessels in port and sailed away, without the loss of a man. The rest of the 600 appear to have escaped into the country before the Moslems recovered themselves sufficiently to take any action.

This might have led to reprisals on the Christians of Egypt had not the attention of the authorities been almost immediately distracted by new and more serious outbreaks among the Mameluke troops, which were not repressed for more than a year, and then only for a time. The same story is repeated year after year during the seventeenth century—the Mamelukes constantly breaking loose from all control in street-fights and robberies of the unfortunate and unarmed Egyptians; the industries of the country oppressed and overtaxed till most of them perished altogether. The military Beys of the provinces were so many petty, irresponsible tyrants, since the constantly changing Pashas dared not interfere with them, and thought only of how soon they could amass a fortune by squeezing the natives, and how best, having done so, they could manage to retain it after their dismissal. In 1650 (A.H. 1060) the Nile was so low that a famine was the result, and the Pasha of the year seized this occasion to augment the taxes, while he sent to the Sultan only two-thirds of the yearly tribute, with the excuse of the great scarcity.

In the year 1660 (A.H. 1071) the Egyptian Patriarch died, and was succeeded by Matthew IV. It was in the time of this Patriarch that the Dominican missionary Vansleb came to Egypt. To him is due the credit of being the first foreigner since the time of the Arab conquest who took any trouble to make himself really acquainted with the history of the National Church of Egypt. As a Roman missionary it was, of course, particularly difficult for him to acquire information with any degree of accuracy; and his book on the Coptic Church is of little value, though of much interest, considering the circumstances under which it was written. He falls into the usual mistake of attributing to the Copts an entire ignorance of their own language, and asserts that he conversed at Assiut with the last man who spoke Coptic. It is true that it was fast becoming a dead language at this time, but Coptic is at least as much a part of the education of a well-bred Copt as Latin or Greek is of an English gentleman. Nor can I discover that there has ever been a time when Coptic was not taught regularly in the Coptic schools, as it certainly is at this day.

There is still in existence a little book written about the middle of the seventeenth century by a Coptic Christian of 'Memphis,'¹ who is best known by his nickname of Abu Dakn, or 'Father of Beards.' We know very little about him, but he is stated to have been a man of high character, and his book is remarkable for its dispassionate tone, though it is evidently written to point out the differences of ritual and discipline between the Church of Egypt and the Church of Rome. He states that the members of the Egyptian Church were known in all other countries by the distinctive name of 'Christians of the girdle,' but does not seem aware that the origin of the name is most probably to be found in the early Moslem decree which obliged all Christians in Egypt to wear a girdle as a mark of humiliation.² He says that the Copts who served Moslems everywhere in Egypt enjoyed a certain amount of security and toleration, and were put on the same level with 'Greeks' and 'Papists.' He gives a brief account of the way in which the affairs of the Church are managed by the Patriarch and bishops, and then passes on to a description of her ritual and liturgy. We learn that in his time, as at the present day in Egypt, the sacraments of extreme unction and confession had fallen into disuse, and were administered only by special desire of the patient or the sinner. Baptism was still occasionally administered in the great tank or baptistery at the west end of the churches; and the babe was solemnly girdled with the distinctive belt by the priest, who removed and destroyed it after three days. The ceremony of the Urtass or Ghitas was still performed after the ancient manner.

?

¹ Probably Menouf-Memphis did not exist, and the two names are really the same.

² See p. 450, vol. i.

Deacons must fast forty days before their ordination, and pay a fee of three dinars to the Patriarch. They were also solemnly girdled with a belt before the gate of the sanctuary on the occasion. A priest was supposed always to refuse ordination at first on account of his unworthiness, and to consent only on the command of the Patriarch.

Abu Dakn describes also the ceremonies and customs attendant on weddings, which were then still celebrated in the churches, though now it is common for the service to be read in the bridegroom's house—doubtless a custom which was first adopted for greater security.

The period of mourning for the dead is forty days, during which alms are given to the poor and masses said for the soul of the departed.

Abu Dakn observes that the Egyptians are far more ascetic than the European monks, since they are never allowed to eat flesh except at the two great festivals of the Church, and he claims for them that they are never idle.

Convents for women, he says, were only allowed in civilised towns and near churches. No one under the age of sixteen was allowed to fast.¹ He mentions also that every pilgrim going to Jerusalem paid two taxes to the Turks—one of eight crowns, and a second (probably on entering the Holy City) of four. He says that during some of the local pilgrimages to Egyptian shrines it was still the custom to bring offerings of animals, which they sacrificed and ate. But he remarks that no saints are of much account in Egypt unless their martyrdom dates from the persecution of Diocletian or earlier.

He mentions that if a priest happened to be one of the guests at any dinner, he was expected to take bread, break it, and give to each one a piece before anyone began to eat. He also states that the Egyptian Christians still engrossed the following trades—goldsmiths, jewellers, shoemakers, smiths, tailors, sculptors, and architects. In their schools he confesses that only reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, Arabic, Coptic, and a knowledge of the Scriptures are taught. It is evidently in his mind that the education of European children was superior, but for the seventeenth century in Egypt this does not seem to be a bad curriculum.

The Coptic original of Abu Dakn's book is probably still buried in some Oxford library, but by whom brought there we do not know. A Latin translation was published at Oxford in 1675, and a translation from the Latin into English was made by Sir E. Sadleir in 1693.

On May 6, 1694 (A.H. 1105), so terrible a storm raged in Cairo that all the people thought the end of the world had come.¹ The mosque of Ebn Touloun was seriously damaged, and several houses were entirely destroyed, while clouds of dust darkened the heavens. Violent storms are very rare in Egypt, and the circumstance made all the more impression on the Moslems because it burst upon them during the hour of prayer on a Friday in Ramadan. In the same year the Nile did not rise, and the consequent dearth found the country, as usual, wholly unprepared to meet it. For some months the famine grew worse and worse, till at length the attention of the rival Beys and Emirs was called for a moment from their daily quarrels and street-fights to the condition of the people by a popular insurrection. The starving mob surrounded the citadel, howling for bread; and as no notice was taken of them, they began to throw stones. Being chased away by the governor and his soldiers, they poured down into the town and broke into the Government magazines before they could be stopped. These were thoroughly cleared out, but the relief was only temporary, and the famine grew so sore that it is said some kept themselves alive by feeding on the bodies of the dead. A new Pasha (Ismail), who arrived during this famine, was moved with compassion for the grievous misery he beheld, and obliged the Emirs to undertake the charge each of a certain number of the starving poor of Cairo. In this he set the example, and distributed free rations of bread and vegetables twice a day while the famine lasted.

¹ Boys and girls considerably under this age fast at the present day, to the great detriment of their health.

As usual, pestilence succeeded famine, and the people died about the streets in heaps. The Pasha, who was evidently extremely unlike most of his kind, undertook the burial of the pauper dead, and obliged the Emirs to follow his example. After the famine and pestilence had ceased he held a feast for the circumcision of his son, and with him a great number of children of the poor¹ were circumcised and clothed at the Pasha's expense.

¹ Rain was a rare occurrence in this century. M. de Maillet says that during three consecutive years of his stay not a single drop fell.

In the last year of the seventeenth century died the historian commonly known by the nick-name of Shamse-ed-din (or 'Light of the Faith'). He was one of the most renowned teachers in Egypt, and wrote several other works besides his history of Egypt, which is only valuable for the century in which he lived.

¹ Gabbarti puts the number at 2,336 and M. de Maillet, who gives a lengthy description of the festivities, at 5,000!

CHAPTER XXXVI

M. DE MAILLET IN EGYPT

A.D. 1694
A.M. 1410
A.H. 1108

AT the close of the seventeenth century Mustapha II. was on the Ottoman throne, and the Pasha of Egypt for the time being was Ismail, but the real power was falling more and more into the hands of the Sheikh-el-Beled, as the Governor of Cairo was called by the native Egyptians. There were two great families, from one or other of whom this officer was generally chosen at this time, and between whom there was an open and deadly feud. All the Emirs and Beys of Egypt, whether holding commands in the army or not, ranged themselves on the side of one party or another, much as in the last days of the Byzantine dominion the whole country had more or less shared in the animosity between the Green and Blue factions. The two colours in the present case were white and red, and Gabbarti tells us that they carried party feeling so far that the adherents of one house would not permit the rival colour to be used on so much as a kitchen utensil belonging to them. Even the artisan classes of Egypt, who were already split into two divisions of their own, called the Sadites and the Haramites, took sides in the great quarrel—the former wearing the white colour of the Fikarites, and the latter the red of the Kassemites.

The original quarrel began between Kassem Bey, at that time Sheikh-el-Beled (or Governor of Cairo), and Zulfikar Bey, who expected to succeed him in that dignity. Both the men were of Circassian origin, descended from a celebrated Mameluke, who on the conquest of Egypt by the Ottomans had barricaded himself in his house and remained there, according to the story, a voluntary prisoner for the rest of his days, refusing to acknowledge the new master. During the later years of the seventeenth century the strife between these rival parties often attained the dimensions of a civil war, and the monotonous record of riot, massacre, and robbery may be read at length in the pages of Gabbarti.

By the close of the seventeenth century the influx of Roman missionaries and European merchants introduced a new factor into the Egyptian world. The presence of a small but in some respects powerful body of free European settlers, who by virtue of 'the Capitulations' enjoyed a measure of security which no one attempted to obtain for the indigenous population, largely influenced the condition of affairs. The decrees which we now all refer to briefly as 'the Capitulations' are contained in a remarkable series of treaties between the early Ottoman Sultans and the principal Powers of Europe. The earliest of these date back to the fifteenth or sixteenth century,¹ and when Egypt became a part of the Ottoman Empire in the sixteenth century all such treaties and those subsequently agreed upon were held binding in the new addition to the Turkish dominion. Without such immunities it would have been absolutely impossible for any missionary or foreign trader to live in Egypt; it is only in our own century that the Capitulations have become so far-reaching and so much abused that they are an actual hindrance to the progress of the country.

¹ That with France was concluded in 1535.

France and England were represented by their Consuls-General in Cairo as early as the beginning of the sixteenth century, and we owe to the French representative, M. de Maillet, who came to Egypt in 1692, an interesting account of the state of the country at the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth centuries.

M. de Maillet was about thirty years old when he came to Egypt, and he represented King Louis for more than sixteen years in that country. He developed a keen interest in all things Egyptian, and even took the trouble to learn Arabic, though not Turkish, which was then more necessary for free communication with the 'upper' classes than it is now.

From M. de Maillet we learn that Cairo, Alexandria, Rosetta, and Damietta were all defenceless cities, at the prey of any serious invader. He says that the only town in Egypt still completely surrounded by its walls was Mansoura. Many of the great gates of Cairo still remained, but, as the line of connection between them seems to have been practically valueless, they were more like isolated fortresses than town gates. He estimates the population of Cairo in his day at 500,000, and thinks that the whole population of Egypt cannot amount to more than 4,000,000, giving the southern boundary town as Ibrim, which still held a garrison of twenty-five or thirty men. He mentions that of the two harbours of Alexandria Christian vessels were only allowed to use one, and that the most inconvenient, which was called the New Harbour. He speaks of the remains of ancient Alexandria with great admiration, particularly of a superb colonnade, much of which still stood near the mosque (which was formerly the church) of Athanasius. He says that the sea was still receding so rapidly that a house which he visited on his arrival in 1692, then only thirty steps from the sea, he found in 1718 quite seventy steps from the sea, with other houses already built between.

Besides the obelisk still standing at Heliopolis, M. de Maillet speaks of a Sphinx which he saw there, almost covered with sand and broken by treasure-hunters, but originally, he says, of the same size as the Sphinx by the Pyramids of Gizeh, and hewn likewise from a single rock or stone. He tells us that one of the obelisks was still standing also at Matarieh, but that the celebrated balsam-trees had entirely perished.

It is evident that 300 years ago the remains of ancient palaces and buildings were to be seen in far greater number than at present, and that they were being daily destroyed. M. de Maillet tells us that a Janissary one day bought a piece of waste land to make a garden, and while levelling a hillock for that purpose he found that it concealed five splendid monolith columns. As they were far too large to be removed whole, the Janissary had them cut into sections, which he sold as millstones, the usual fate, M. de Maillet remarks, of all the largest of the ancient pillars, though as millstones they fetched at most 200 crowns, and any of the enlightened princes of Europe would be glad to give 2,000 for the pillars as they stood. Indeed, he is urgent that his Majesty should be asked to sanction the purchase and removal of the great column called Pompey's Pillar, at Alexandria, before it met with a like fate at the hands of the barbarous Turks.

Incidentally, we learn that even for the French Consul-

General an expedition to the Pyramids of Gizeh or Sakhara was not lightly undertaken. Notice was given beforehand to one of the Mameluke Beys, who sent his men in advance to secure the safety and comfort of the French representative. A good deal of digging went on in the great burial-ground between Sakhara and Gizeh, in the constant hope of finding treasure, everything else being destroyed. M. de Maillet describes at some length various figures, chiefly of wood, and mummies covered with hieroglyphics, which he himself saw brought from the tombs at Sakhara, and which were at once broken up to see if any gold had been concealed inside. He is careful, however, to distinguish between the Egyptians and the Turks in this respect, saying that the former, particularly the Christians, regarded such proceedings as sacrilege. But he seems to have had no scruple in using all the power of his official position to obtain from the Christians such of these antiquities as they had been able to save from the wholesale destruction of the Moslems. He particularises a statue which he forced a Copt to sell him much against his will, since it had been preserved in his family for nearly eight hundred years. Apparently M. de Maillet thought himself extremely virtuous in that he refrained from denouncing the unfortunate Copt to the Turkish Government, and so obtaining his coveted antique without even paying for it. The statue was that of a woman, the head and the feet of pierre de touche noire, the body est en gaine, and made of verd antique variegated with white. The figure was about five feet five inches high and of great beauty. The despoiled Copt swore on the Gospel to the truth of the story he had told M. de Maillet concerning the statue: One of his ancestors, who was in service with the Moslem ruler of his time—probably Shahin, Emir El Gyoush el Alfdal—was present when the latter opened one of the pyramids and found this statue inside. It was dragged out and forthwith condemned to be broken up, when the Christian, who, according to his descendant, believed the statue to be a representation of the Virgin Mary, entreated leave to ransom it, and was permitted to do so on payment of one hundred sequins. Since then it had remained in the same family, descending from father to son as a cherished heirloom, until fear lest a refusal should involve both the statue and themselves in a common destruction obliged them to yield it to the demand of the foreign Minister.

We also learn that several sarcophagi, hewn each out of one great block of stone or marble and covered with hieroglyphic writing, were lying about in different places in Cairo. One was used as the basin of a fountain, which was called the 'fountain of lovers.' Another served à abreuver les chevaux in the house of an officer of the Janissaries. M. de Maillet also gives a careful account of the principal fruits and other growths of Egypt, which seem to be much the same as at the present day, except that we find no mention of sugar-cane. A good date-tree, he assures us, would bring its owner a yearly revenue of 10*l.* sterling! Speaking of the different animals of the country, he mentions that the cat is still held in great favour by the Egyptians, and deserves to be, he considers, though he is not himself a lover of cats. But he declares that the Egyptian cat of 1700 was not only an excellent mouser, but invariably of great beauty, marked as regularly as a tiger, and would not be out of place in the Royal Menagerie. 'That which I do find ridiculous,' he adds, 'is that they still maintain homes or hospitals for the support of these animals.' He speaks of the crocodile as common near Gizeh, though rarely seen in the Delta; and mentions that some years before his arrival a hippopotamus was killed near Damietta.

M. de Maillet discusses at some length the question of cutting a Suez Canal, but decides finally that, though perfectly practicable, it would not be a profitable undertaking. The foreign trade of Egypt, he says, had diminished, owing to the maladministration of the country by the Turks, till there was little left except the slave trade, which had attained enormous proportions. All Turkey and Europe was supplied with negroes by way of Egypt—the Soudan having already degenerated into a desolated hunting-ground for the Arab trader—and an enormous number of white European slaves from the Turkish provinces were yearly imported in exchange. The least valuable of these, he says, is worth 200 crowns, and he had seen young girls valued at eight or nine thousand pounds. Boys, too, of good white blood were still in great demand to be trained as Mamelukes. Very few of these white slaves of either sex were really of Turkish blood, and most were of Christian parents, but all were called Turks and made Moslems. As all alike were of slave origin or parentage, it was considered no disgrace to have been a slave; on the contrary, the barbarous and illiterate Turkish ex-slaves were the aristocracy of the country, and the freeborn descendants of the Arabs or native Egyptians, in whom alone a scanty knowledge of the arts and sciences survived, were despised and looked down upon, even though they were Moslems. As ever, the Copts were the least ignorant and barbarous section of the population ; but M. de Maillet is too good a Catholic to have any toleration for the members of a heretic Church. He complains pathetically that in all the world there could be no other people so obstinate in error as these schismatics. The most skilful and zealous missionaries have now, he says, been labouring among them for years without result ! He allows that the missionaries were politely received, that their zeal was respected, and their kindness gratefully accepted ; but for all that, he says, there has not been one real conversion. At one time they tried the experiment of a free distribution of alms after their service to all the Copts who had attended, and by this means they acquired quite a large congregation of the poorer sort. But when a new Superior came out, who ordered the cessation of these indiscriminate alms, the congregation disappeared ! On being reproached for their desertion they replied simply, ' No money—no church ' (Mafeesh felous—mafeesh kanisa). A few remained with the Roman Catholics who had been educated by the Fathers from infancy, and it was clearly evident that only by this means could any breach be made in the National Church. It is curious that it never seems to have occurred to M. de Maillet or his co-religionists that the proper field for their labours was among the Moslems of the country. With the Roman and Presbyterian missionaries of the present day in Egypt, there is at least an understanding that their societies exist for the conversion of the Moslems, though their schools are chiefly filled with native Christians, drawn thither by the irresistible bait of free (or nearly free) education. In the time of M. de Maillet not even this tempting offer could seduce them from their own Church.

They have tried everything (M. de Maillet assures us), and the sole way of making a convert from the Copts is to take a child almost from the birth and separate him entirely from his own people. Some (he says) who were sent at an early age to Rome, and educated there for years, returned to their errors when they returned to their country, and only used the training they had received the better to defend their theological position. They hate us so (he adds), that when they wish to put the last insult on a man they call him a Frank. If you reason with them concerning the two natures of Jesus Christ, it is impossible to make them understand. You ask them, 'Was not our Lord perfect man?' and they reply, 'Yes.' You continue, 'Was He not also perfect God?' and they as readily reply 'Yes.' And yet nothing will induce them to allow two natures in Him.

It was not even easy, he complained, to obtain Coptic children from the birth, that they might be educated in the Catholic faith; for though these Christians were for the most part miserably poor and oppressed, nothing would induce them to part with their children. 'In 1699,' he writes, 'I received orders from the king to choose three Coptic children and send them to France for their education. The Court desired that these children should be of good family and their parents in easy circumstances.' He then proceeds to relate in detail the endeavours he made and all the resources he employed to obtain three such children for the king; and ends by saying that, so far from persuading anyone of good family to part with their children for such a purpose, though only for a few years, he had not succeeded in obtaining one, even among the most miserably poor. The very rumour that such an attempt was being made, he said, emptied all the mission schools, and the poor would not come for their usual alms, not even those who were starving. M. de Maillet adds significantly that these facts will show how much reliance can be placed on the accounts of P. de Lobo, who had the hardihood to state that the Patriarch of the Copts gave permission to the Italian missionaries to take Coptic children to Rome for their education.

The Coptic Patriarch during the whole time of M. de Maillet's stay in Egypt was John XVI., and it is evident that he did not approve of the French and Italian missionaries any more than they did of him.¹ M. de Maillet speaks of a conference which he held with John on the subject of baptism, which, the French Consul-General had been horrified to find, was invariably postponed among the Copts until the mother was sufficiently recovered to attend the ceremony in church. It was often longer, since baptism was still administered, as a rule, on two occasions in the year, with great solemnity, in the different churches. The Patriarch, much to M. de Maillet's indignation, defended the Coptic practice, and told the Consul plainly that he did not consider the rite was administered with sufficient solemnity in the Roman Church. In particular he strongly disapproved of the prevalent practice among Roman Catholics of baptizing in private houses instead of in the church. With equal indignation the Frenchman records that circumcision was the rule among the Copts.

In speaking of the peculiar ceremonies in vogue among the Copts, M. de Maillet mentions one which is not found in any other account. He says that in the province of Behnesa, about two days' journey to the south of Cairo, there is a village which the Arabs call Bir-el-Gernous (or 'the Wells of Prophecy'). In this place the Copts have a sacred well, by which they can foretell the height of the yearly inundation. Every year, he says, on a particular night, a great tent is erected over this well, and the Sheikh (or governor) of the province comes himself to assist at the ceremony, accompanied by innumerable crowds.

¹ It was John XVI., surnamed John-el-Touki, who reintroduced the office of the consecration of the chrism, which had not been practised for 200 years. Neale says, on the authority of Bernati's account to Sokerius, that it was the same Patriarch who decreed that Coptic children should in future be baptized on the eighth and not on the fortieth day after birth. This, however, hardly agrees with M. de Maillet's account of his personal interview with John XVI. on the subject.

With elaborate ritual a cotton cord, marked at regular intervals by threads of white and blue, is let down into the well, so that the end of it touches the water. Then a table is placed over the mouth of the well, and the bishop celebrates a solemn mass. When the mass is finished, the table is taken away and the cord examined. The height to which the water has penetrated the cord marks the height, as they firmly believe, to which the water will rise that year.

In spite of his prejudices, M. de Maillet cannot conceal a reluctant admiration for some of the works of the Copts. He says that among their great monasteries there is one, some seven or eight leagues south of Cairo, where there are three old churches built one above another, in such good repair that they are almost like new churches.¹ At this place the Psalms of David are chanted night and day without ceasing. But the great wonder of the place was at a short distance, in the mountain above the ruins of a still older monastery. Here, he says,

. . . they have a promenade the most wonderful and splendid in the world. At some time they have cut a gallery right through the mountain, which is about twenty to thirty feet high, more than two hundred paces wide, and over three hundred paces long, the length running from west to east. From this exalted gallery, which is hewn out of the solid rock and has no sustaining pillars, the view extends far away to the Red Sea ; and two hundred monks can easily walk there at one time. In the hottest summer the air in this gallery is cool and fresh.

¹ M. de Maillet says he saw this himself, but it seems almost certain that he never went farther south than Sakhara.

John XVI. consecrated two Abunas for Abyssinia, owing to the disturbed state of affairs in that country, which was still suffering greatly from the persistent efforts of the Roman Catholic missionaries to stir up civil war between the king and his people. Thus, in 1680, there were no less than three Abunas in Abyssinia—Abuna Christodulos, deposed by the late king in favour of a priest named Shenouda ; Abuna Shenouda, who was not properly consecrated in Egypt, and who was deposed by Yasouf in favour of Abuna Marcus, who did not receive official consecration from Egypt till 1692.

Three different embassies were sent from France to intrigue against the Egyptian Church in Abyssinia during the reign of the Patriarch John XVI., who died in 1718. The third and last of these attempts was in 1706, when the Jesuits persuaded Louis XIV. to send a physician named Du Roule into Abyssinia by way of the Soudan, to pave the way for their admission by the same route. But Du Roule¹ was detained three months, and finally murdered at the Court of the petty King of Senaar, who

¹ The subjoined letter from the Emperor of Abyssinia will partly explain Roule's fate. He was detained at Senaar while a messenger went to ascertain the will of the Emperor concerning him. We gather that with the letter to Du Roule came secret instructions to the effect that if Du Roule were a bonâ fide traveller he should be allowed to proceed, but that if he were a Jesuit he was to be prevented at any cost still seems to have maintained a precarious sway over the southern kingdoms of the Soudan; though the northern kingdom had long since gone to wreck, and was now tyrannised over by a number of petty Moslem chiefs who were for the most part Arab slave traders. The King of Senaar professed the faith of Islam, but there were still from entering Abyssinia. The letter is taken from M. de Sacy's 'Chrestomathie Arabe':—

'The Sultan Thekla Haïmanout, son of the Sultan Adam Segued, son of the Sultan Alaf (or Olaf) Segued.

'The present letter is addressed by the Venerable King, the Most Worthy Emperor, the Overlord of Nations, the Shadow of the Divinity amongst men, the Most Illustrious among the Sovereigns who profess the religion of Jesus, the Most Powerful among Christian Kings, he who is the Defender of the Faith; under whose protection are the frontiers of Alexandria; he who holds the standard of justice equally between the Mohammedan and the Christian; who is of the Israelites, of the line of the prophets David and Solomon, on whom was the Divine favour in the way of salvation. The Sultan Thekla Haïmanout, son of the Sultan Adam Segued, son of the Sultan Alaf Segued, may he be for ever blessed, may his most exalted empire be ever preserved and the chiefs also of his invincible army. Amen.

'To the most illustrious, much esteemed, and greatly learned Du Roule, Franco-Syrian; who comes to us in heart as in person, may he be preserved from all accident and raised to the highest rank. Amen.

'Your interpreter Elias, whom you have sent to us, has arrived at our Court; his arrival was agreeable to us, and we admitted him to our presence. We learnt from him that you had been sent to us by our brother the King of France, but that you have been detained at Senaar. In consequence I am writing to the Sultan Badi, that he should not retain you, but permit you to proceed; that, far from insulting you, he is to treat you with honour; that he is not to harass you, but treat both you and your company with all honour; that there is betwixt you and us the same faith and the same religion, like the Syrian Elias your messenger, and all those who come with you, be it as ambassadors or as traders, from our brother the King of France or his representative in Cairo. So he must treat all those who are united with us by the same dogmas, the same laws, and the same belief. For we love to enter into the bonds of friendship and union, and into reciprocal intercourse with all, save only those who profess dogmas and recognise laws scattered Christian communities all through the Soudan, and several churches. His nominal sway must have reached nearly to the southern frontier of Egypt, as the following incident will show. On the murder of Du Roule, M. de Maillet published an official decree in Cairo commanding all French subjects in Egypt to dismiss every Berber or other subject of the King of Senaar from their houses within three days, and never to employ any such subject again, under penalty of being fined three hundred pounds! Considering that the Berberin were then, as now, the best domestic servants to be had in Egypt, the ordinance inflicted much greater injury on the subjects of the King of France than on the subjects of the King of Senaar; but the prohibition remained in force for about a hundred years.

M. de Maillet relates at some length the circumstances attending the apostasy and subsequent martyrdom of Father Clement Recollet, French Consular Chaplain in Cairo, which made a great sensation at the time. He was accused by his countrymen of malversation of charitable funds, and in a panic fled to the Turkish authorities at the citadel and declared his intention to embrace the faith of Islam. This happened on April 23, 1703. The contrary to our own, such'as Joseph and those of his society,* whom we instantly drove out from among us. Such people we will not admit into our country; they may not pass beyond Senaar, that they shall not be able to excite dissensions and disorders among us. For you, you are permitted to come to us, and are hereby assured of a favourable and gracious reception. Be therefore at ease, and fear not.'

Signed, and on the seal the following inscription: 'Jesus Son of Mary. Adam Segued son of Olaf Segued, descendant of Solomon son of David. Israelite.'

* This refers to the Jesuits. 'Joseph' is Father Bréudent, a missionary sent to Abyssinia, who perished before he reached Gondar.

next day M. de Maillet wrote the Father a long letter earnestly entreating him to return, assuring him that those who had slandered him should be punished, and adjuring him by all that he held most sacred to return while there was yet time. 'You can say you were drunk, and did not know what you were doing,' he suggests; 'at that price I can still deliver you out of their hands.'

The Father returned a short and unsatisfactory letter; yet on April 25, being brought before the Pasha, he declared that he was a Christian and would remain so. But the Moslems never allow anyone to retract. On the 28th he was circumcised by force, he was placed in splendid apartments with slaves to wait upon him, and assured that he should be married to the most beautiful women. But as he flung the turbans which they presented to him on the floor and persisted in his recantation, he was beaten and thrown half-dead into prison. M. de Maillet again endeavoured to obtain his release, but on May 8 he received a letter from the Father begging to be left to expiate his fault by martyrdom. It was proposed, indeed, by one zealous Moslem in full Divan that he should die by inches, one of his limbs being cut off at intervals of a quarter of an hour; but the Europeans were already too strong in the country for any such measures to be attempted against one of them. Indeed, the Pasha would have spared his life had he not feared the Moslem mob. In the end Father Clement was beheaded on Ascension Day, May 17, and the body was delivered to the French Consul and buried in the cemetery at Khandak. M. de Maillet adds that he received the warmest sympathy on this occasion both from the Greek and Egyptian Churches, and that a fast of three days was ordered by them in the martyr's honour.

M. de Maillet's relations with the Turks were evidently much more friendly than with the Copts, but he does not attempt to conceal his conviction that the former were solely responsible for the ruin and misery of the country. From the Pasha downwards no one thought of anything but how soonest to enrich themselves at the expense of Egypt, without regard to truth, justice, honesty, or mercy. The Pasha was rarely permitted to remain in office more than a year, though, by bribing the Sultan, some had managed to secure themselves for four. He contrived, however, always to acquire more for himself than the whole of the yearly tribute to the Sultan—'above all,' remarks M. de Maillet naïvely, 'when there is a pestilence in his year of office.' During the three or four months that it generally lasted the Pasha amassed an immense fortune. Whenever the Government tax-collector of a village died, the Pasha sold the office to the highest bidder; and sometimes the same office was sold three or four times in the same week, owing to the rapidly succeeding deaths of those who had purchased it.

Besides the Pasha, there were the five great military corps to prey upon the nation. No one who had any wealth to save, and was not prepared to fight for it, dared to carry on his business without putting himself under the protection of one or other of these corps, who were called respectively the Mustapha Agas, the Azabs (or Asaphs), the Spahis, the Bashawishes, and the Janissaries. But even so, when a man appealed to the chosen corps for whose protection he had paid so dearly in case of outrage or robbery, they took additional gifts on the pretence of inquiry and punishment which followed. Moreover, at the death of those who were under their protection they claimed the right to administer the estate; and a comparatively small share was generally allotted to the widow and children, the rest went to the corps. They even managed, we are told, to extort money from the French in return for professing to ignore the relations which, M. de Maillet tells us, generally existed between them and one or more ladies of the country; but, we are told, their exactions on this score were becoming so heavy that even the bankers were beginning to think that they could not afford to continue their harems. No Turkish official, from the highest to the lowest, ever dreamed of applying any part of the revenues he collected to the development of Egyptian industries or to public works; though great sums were sent yearly to Mecca, as well as to the Sultan of Constantinople. The land was falling yearly out of cultivation; the embankments were kept in order by forced labour, if at all; roads were almost unknown; and the five corps who lived on the plunder of the nation did not even defend her from the predatory Bedouin.

Not even the most learned and religious of the Moslems were free from the savage spirit of their age. In 1709 a difference of opinion concerning the fittest successor to the office of Sheikh El Azhar became a bloody struggle, carried on for two days within the mosque itself. Each party brought arms and guns to settle the question; the doors and lamps were broken to pieces; a great number of the students were wounded, and many killed. At the close of the second day the Governor of Cairo brought down a force strong enough to overawe both parties, cleared the mosque, and gave orders that the corpses should be taken away. One Sheikh was sent into exile, and twelve other men who had taken part in the affair were imprisoned.

CHAPTER XXXVII

THE TYRANNY OF THE MAMELUKE BEYS

A.D. 1710 IN 1710, war having broken out between Turkey and A.M. 1428 Russia, an order from the Sultan for soldiers relieved
 A.H. 1118 Egypt for a time of the presence of some three thousand of the detested army of occupation. But in Cairo the insubordination and quarrelling among those that were left increased more and more, and early in the next year civil war again declared itself. The Governor of Upper Egypt brought his troops down to take part in it, and a pitched battle was fought in the waste ground between the citadel and the mosque of Sultan Hassan. The mosque itself was turned into a fortress and strongly barricaded. Touloun and El Mowayid were also turned into forts. Indeed, the principal use of the finest mosques in Cairo at this time seems to have been as strongholds for the troops of the different Emirs.

The Governor of Upper Egypt was defeated, the Pasha who had favoured him was deposed by the Cairo Emirs, and the game went merrily on. Many Emirs' houses were set on fire by their opponents, and the flames spread to the private dwellings and shops of the peaceful inhabitants, till a good part of Cairo had been burned.
 Those which were not burned were sacked and pillaged indifferently by the soldiers of all the Emirs. All who could, escaped from the town, which was left to the soldiers. Those who remained, in the hope of protecting their property, fell into the hands of a still more formidable foe—a tribe of Bedouin—who, being called to reinforce the ranks of the Fikarites, spread themselves over the town, stealing everything they could lay hands on, and cutting off the water-supply, so that all were like to die of thirst.

After the Bedouin had been called in, the strife was no longer confined to Cairo; nor could the Bedouin be withheld from plundering any town which might come in their way. Akhmin in particular was reduced to utter ruin, and many of the inhabitants killed. It was still almost entirely a Christian city, and this no doubt accounted for the attack upon it, since no other cause of offence is recorded. At length, in another pitched battle fought near Kasr-el-Ain, Iwaz,¹ the head of the Kassemite party, fell. The Governor of Upper Egypt, who led the rival army, had posted an ambuscade behind the piers of the great aqueduct, and by a simulated flight drew Iwaz Bey through one of the arches, where he was immediately set upon and killed. His son Ismail, a lad of sixteen, who was already renowned for his beauty and courage, was elected head of the Kassemites in his place, and a truce was agreed upon for three days. After this, hostilities recommenced with renewed bitterness, and lasted till the Fikarite party were, for the time being, utterly routed, and the youthful Ismail was left, in effect, master of Egypt. A new Pasha—indeed, several new Pashas, came from ¹ This name is more correctly spelt and pronounced Oquad, but it becomes Iwaz on Turkish lips, and lately an enterprising Syrian who wishes to be taken for an Englishman has turned it into Howard!

Constantinople in the next thirteen years ; but for the most part of that time Ismail Bey was the real ruler of the country, and became the idol of the people. He obtained for his own friends the governorships of the different provinces and the principal state appointments in Cairo. He dealt a rough justice to all alike, cleared the neighbourhood of the towns of the plundering Bedouin, and for the first time in their lives the Egyptians of his generation found themselves in a state of comparative security. Even under the firm hand of Ismail Bey it was not safe for respectable women to go abroad without a strong escort. In the festival of Sham-en-Nassim of the year preceding his murder a group of women, following the immemorial custom of that day, rode out on donkeys to the suburbs of the town. When they reached a bridge over the canal a band of armed and drunken Mameluke retainers surrounded them, and, in full view of the officer on guard to preserve order in that quarter, tore off their veils and all their jewels and ornaments. When they had made off, the officer and his men came up—to console the women and escort them back in safety? Not at all! They deliberately stripped the women of everything they had left, and abandoned them absolutely naked, to entreat some charitable passer-by to fetch them the most necessary garments, that they might return to their homes.

But, as it turned out, these were not Christian or Jewish women, who could be thus outraged with impunity. They all belonged to Moslem families of high rank ; hence the notice of the incident by the historian. On the morrow the insulted ladies appealed to the Pasha for redress, giving in a list of the diamonds and other jewels which had been taken from them. The officer of the guard, with all his men, was brought before the Pasha, and two men, under threat of torture, corroborated the story of the ladies in every respect, but urged in their own defence that they had only obeyed the orders of their military superior. Other inhabitants of the quarter had looked on without venturing to interfere, but now that the rank of the victims was disclosed were eager to bear evidence. The men's excuse was accepted as sufficient; the officer was exiled to Aboukir and heavily fined.

Afterwards the Pasha made solemn proclamation throughout the city—not that anyone found guilty of assaulting defenceless women should be severely punished, but that no woman should be permitted to go outside the gates of the town or to ride on donkeys!

Ismail, however, did his best to put a stop to the open and shameless robbery carried on by the followers of the different military chiefs, and in many cases compelled restoration of the stolen goods. During Ramadan he kept open house after sunset for anyone who chose to come in and feast at his expense, and he electrified everyone by his courage in leaving Cairo to visit some of his friends in their different appointments in the provinces. No other Emir, it was said, would have dared to leave Cairo except at the head of an army, for fear of assassination.

A violent death in some form or other was, indeed, the ultimate fate of all the Mameluke Emirs, and Ismail Bey did not long escape it. Before he was thirty he was treacherously murdered by Zulfikar, the head of the Fikarite party. He left one daughter and two posthumous children by different wives, none of whom survived him more than a few months. Ismail built two mosques—one at Dessouk, Sidi Ibrahim; and one at Melig, Sidi Ali—and restored the mosque of El Azhar in Cairo. He six times personally conducted the pilgrim caravan to Mecca, and his murder in 1723 was felt as a national calamity by all Egyptians.

In the same year a great sensation was caused in Cairo by the preaching of a Moslem reformer, a Turk by origin, who drew crowds to hear him in the mosque of El Mowayid. He inveighed against the abuses which had crept into the worship of Islam, and particularly against the worship of saints and the idea that relics of the dead could work miracles. The Sheikhs of El Azhar became alarmed, and put forth a declaration condemning the opinions of the preacher and solemnly affirming that the saints could work miracles after death. They called upon the Government to punish the preacher.

Some one took a copy of this declaration and brought it to the reformer while he was preaching. He declared he would challenge the Ulemas to a discussion before the Chief Kadi, and appealed to his hearers to stand by him. With loud cries the assembled crowd assured him of their fidelity, and, surrounded by about a thousand of them, he at once repaired tumultuously to the Kadi's house. This official, in great fear, tried to temporise with and dismiss them, but met with actual ill-treatment at the hands of the howling mob, and with difficulty escaped into the safety of his harem.

On the next Tuesday even greater crowds assembled in the mosque to hear the preacher, but he did not appear, and a rumour was circulated that the Kadi had prevented him by force. Again the crowd rushed to the tribunal, seized the Kadi, and, on his denying all knowledge of their Sheikh, they dragged him before the Pasha, who appears to have equally lost his head. He signed a paper promising all that they desired, and the rescued Sheikh was borne in triumph to the mosque of Mowayid, where he delivered a most inflammatory address. Meanwhile the Pasha sent to the principal Emirs of the Fikarites and the Kassemites, declared that he had been insulted by the crowd, and should leave the country.

The Emirs were not slow to take up any quarrel. They called their dependents to arms, and marched down to arrest the preacher and his adherents; but the noise of their coming went before them, and when they reached the mosque they found no one. They swept through the town, arresting and bastinadoing all whom they could find, 'and thus the disorders ceased,' says Gabbarti. The preacher disappeared: some said that he was killed, and others that he had fled the country.

Early in June, 1734, some Christian visionary, whose name is not given, foretold that the world would come to an end in two days' time. Strangely enough, his prophecy met with instant and widespread belief among the Moslem Egyptians. From Cairo it spread, with that rapidity so often noticed among Orientals,¹ all through the provinces, and the people spoke of nothing else. Everyone bade farewell to his neighbour and set himself to prepare for the great catastrophe. All the poorer people rushed to the banks of the Nile to purify themselves by bathing in its waters. Some gave themselves up to feasting and enjoyment, some left their homes and wandered in the fields, some abandoned themselves to frantic terror, others to repentance and prayer. The Sheikhs and Emirs, though many of them doubtless shared in the common dread, endeavoured to reassure the people and persuade them to renew their daily avocations, saying that the news was doubtless false. But all their efforts were vain. 'It is only too true' was the invariable reply of the panic-struck people; 'the Copts and the Jews have said it, and who knew them ever mistaken in their predictions, since to them are known the secrets of prophecy and astrology?' They even adduced instances of the Christian prophecies which had been fulfilled in their own time; but what these were the Moslem historian does not record. The man who had uttered the prophecy was seized and brought before one of the Emirs, but he refused to recant what he had said. 'Throw me into prison until Friday,' he demanded; 'and if what I have said does not come to pass on that day, let me be slain.'

¹ In the old days this seems to have been effected by means of carrier-pigeons. It would be an interesting subject of inquiry how far the present pigeon establishments of Egypt are used for the same purpose.

The terror and despair increased hourly. All Friday people waited for the end, and, as the hour of sunset drew near without any sign from Heaven, one of the Ulemas was seized with an inspiration of genius. The Christians had clearly been wrong for once; why not turn the failure to account? So he solemnly announced that Sidi Ahmed el Bedowi, Sidi el Dessouki, and Sidi el Shaffei (three of the principal Moslem saints) had interceded for them with the Almighty, and that, in consideration of the great merits of the holy dead, Allah had granted their prayer and had consented to adjourn the end of the world until a future date. And the people blessed each other in thankfulness, saying, 'Brothers, we are still allowed to live. God grant that this respite may be useful to us.'

This happened in the Patriarchate of John XVII., who had succeeded Peter VI. in 1727, and who was succeeded in his turn by Mark VII.

After the death of Ismail the country relapsed into its normal condition of insecurity and strife. Zulfikar, who had murdered Ismail, was himself assassinated in a few years, and hardly a month passed without the assassination of one or more Emirs by each other. It was not uncommon for one Emir to invite another with his followers to his house, and then at a given signal cause his guests to be massacred by his own servants. A particularly disgraceful case of this kind happened in 1736, when eleven of the principal Emirs were murdered in the house of the Defterdar and by his order, because one of them, who was the chief at that time of the Fikarites, had refused to raise a Kassemite Mameluke to the dignity of a Sandjak. But one of the most powerful, Osman Bey Zulfikar, having made good his escape, the assassins feared reprisals and took refuge in the mosque of Sultan Hassan. They were refused admittance, but gained it by the simple expedient of burning the door down, and barricaded themselves in the mosque. This began another of the bloody struggles which hardly ever ceased during the eighteenth century; the mosques were again turned into forts, the houses of the rival parties were alternately sacked and pillaged, and the streets were strewn with corpses. The Pasha, as usual, was deposed, and a short interval of comparative peace followed, during which a pestilence broke out in the town. In one Emir's household 123 of his following died, and the corpses were carried out to burial at night.

It was during this time of comparative security that Richard Pococke came to Egypt. The existence of the 'Capitulations' had for some time rendered the country safer for travelling Europeans than for its own unfortunate inhabitants. It was clearly understood that the murder of a subject of one of the Northern Powers would be dangerous and unprofitable. It was much better to receive them with fair words, and even amusing to see how easily they could be imposed upon in all matters which did not come under their own personal observation. Almost at the same time Frederick Norden, a captain in the Danish Navy, was sent to travel in Egypt and report upon it; but his book is of little or no value. The Turkish officials soon found out that he was easily terrorised and diverted from any inconvenient purpose he might have formed; and though he went up the Nile as far as Pococke, and published some imposing volumes on his return, he seems to have learned less about the country than even a two weeks' tourist of to-day. Dr. Pococke's work is of real value, though, as far as the Copts were concerned, he laboured under the usual disadvantage of receiving all his information about them through the medium of Moslem interpreters or the zealous Roman Catholic missionaries, who could not forgive them for their loyalty to their National Church and Patriarch. Dr. Pococke landed at Alexandria in 1737, and went first to visit Cosmas, the Greek Patriarch, in Rosetta. John XVII. was then the Patriarch of the National Church; but during his travels Pococke associated almost exclusively with Moslems or with the Roman Catholic Franciscans, whose establishments along the Nile were under the protection of the English. He visited Mohalla-el-Kebir, where he was told there were 500 Copts, and Pa-Hebeit (Iseum), where he saw the remains of a great temple ; and then, after a stay in Cairo, went to the Fayoum and up the Nile. In his time the White and Red monasteries were still called by their proper names of Deyr Anbar Shenouda and Deyr Anbar Peschoi ; and at Erment the remains of the magnificent church, which was one of the oldest in Egypt, excited his astonished admiration. Though the country was quiet during the months of his sojourn in Egypt, and he saw no actual fighting, he observes that the practice of poisoning each other among the Turkish classes was so common as hardly to excite remark, and that 'the word of a Turk passes for nothing' even between themselves. Most of the Copts, he found, knew how to read and write, but hardly any other class of natives could do so. He mentions that the Turkish Janissaries used to be entrusted with the collection of the poll-tax from the native Christians ; but that now they were even worse off, as a Turk from Constantinople obtained this privilege by heavy bribes to the Sultan, and managed to squeeze even more out of the native Christians than the Janissaries could do. Pococke travelled also in Jerusalem and Cyprus, and ended his days as Bishop of Meath.

From 1736 to 1743 Osman Bey Zulfikar was the most powerful man in Egypt, of whom one quite exceptional virtue is recorded—that he never took bribes. For the rest, he was—like his compatriots—revengeful, treacherous, and merciless.

Unlike them, however, when his tyranny could be borne no longer, he was not murdered, but exiled to Constantinople, where the Sultan received him with honour and made some attempt to compel the restitution of his goods (his house having been, as usual, sacked and pillaged), but with no success.

In 1743 a Pasha named Mohammed-el-Yadaksi proposed to reform Egypt. He began by an absolute prohibition of tobacco! Three times a day he sent his officer to parade the streets of Cairo, and all those found smoking were severely punished. He was recalled within two years, and it is not recorded of him that he succeeded in achieving any other reform. A learned Sheikh also endeavoured to reform his countrymen, and preached before several of the Emirs against their wickedness. These promptly gave their followers the order to assassinate him, but he escaped, and probably gave up the attempt to influence them, since he certainly died a natural death. The most striking feature in the history of this time is the cold-blooded treachery which all the Turkish Mamelukes alike displayed the moment there seemed to be any occasion of serving their own ends thereby. No oath seemed sufficiently binding to restrain them from acts which the mere tie of common nationality would be sufficient to deter one Englishman from committing against another.

In 1745 the Pasha (Mohammed Rogheb) received secret instructions from the Sultan that the families of Katemesh and Demiati, two of the most powerful Mameluke clans, were to be exterminated. The Pasha attempted to carry out his instructions, and planned a massacre of all the Beys at a general meeting of the Divan. But neither Bey nor Emir ever went unarmed or unprepared for treachery in those days; and though in the first onset three of their number were cut down, the rest defended themselves and escaped from the citadel. They called out their followers, and another civil war took place, which ended in the death of several more Emirs and the flight of others into Upper Egypt. In 1748 a Pasha named Ahmed came to Cairo, who was devoted to science and desired to profit by the learning of the Egyptians. To this end he surrounded himself with all the most learned Sheikhs of the universities, only to discover that they knew almost nothing, and that their time was devoted for the most part to grammatical and theological subtleties. One of them, Sheikh Abdallah el Shabroni, who was the Sheikh El Azhar, he retained about him for some time, hoping to find that his first impressions were mistaken; but the Sheikh El Azhar was as ignorant as the rest. The Pasha repeatedly demanded where were the learned Egyptians of whom he had heard so much; and the Sheikh did not tell him, what he must have known, that what little learning and science still lingered in Egypt was to be found among the Christians. He searched diligently, on the other hand, to find a Moslem whose learning did come up to the modest requirements of the Turkish Pasha, and found him at last in the person of Sheikh Hassan, a man of Abyssinian extraction, father of the historian called Gabbarti, and the last teacher of astronomy in the mosque of El Azhar.

During the first half of this century the Christians had been left comparatively in peace while the Moslems quarrelled among themselves. Their arts and industries, indeed, had never quite recovered from the shock inflicted on them by the Ottoman conqueror, and were being gradually crushed out of existence by repeated exactions.

They had also suffered, in common with the Moslem Copts, from the constant brigandage of the Bedouin and the wandering armies of the Emirs. In Cairo no man who had anything to lose was safe, least of all a Christian or a Jew. In 1733 (A.H. 1146) the Kashef of each district had been ordered, in consequence of a firman received from the Sultan, to inflict a fine on every Christian or Jew in his district. They were roughly divided into three classes, according to their supposed means of payment; the first class was assessed at 420 paras a head, the second at 270, and the third at 100 a head.¹ But since the execution of Father Clement no Christian seems to have been put to death by the Government for his religion; nor had there been any formal order for the destruction of churches. Moreover, the Christians had become more and more indispensable to the Government, in consequence of the increasing ignorance and dishonesty among the Moslem 'upper' classes.

In 1731 the Roman missionaries had nine establishments south of Cairo—at Antinoe, Assiout, Abu Tige, Sedfeh, Akhmin, Girgeh, Luxor, Assuan, and even at Deyr in Nubia; for in this year we learn that Pope Clement XII. sent orders to the Superiors of all these places that they were to use their utmost endeavours to obtain Coptic children and send them to be educated in Rome. Even then the children sent were of Roman Catholic parents, since no member of the Coptic Church could be won over by threats or promises to part with his children for this purpose. Incidentally we learn that there were French and English passengers on the vessel which brought them down the Nile. When the ship reached Ansena, we are told, the French and English travellers went to see the ruins of the old city; but the Catholic Copts hastened to present themselves before the resident missionary, and attended a service in his chapel.

¹ The value of the Egyptian money was changed so often under the Ottoman Sultans that it is impossible to give an exact equivalent of this sum in English. Pococke says that in his time (1737) a purse meant in Egypt 25,000 medines, and a medine seems to have been worth about 2½d.

The same Pope wrote to John XVII. by Cardinal Belluga and another missionary, who were empowered to treat with the Coptic Patriarch in the Pope's name, if by any means he could be brought to submit himself and his Church to Rome; but the negotiations were as fruitless as usual. Clement's successor, Benedict XIV., threw off all pretence that the Coptic Church was in communion with Rome, and, instead of corresponding with the Patriarch, consecrated the first Roman Catholic Metropolitan who owned any real jurisdiction in Egypt. This man was a Copt, resident in Jerusalem, by name Athanasius, and the date of his appointment is 1741. Athanasius continued to reside in Jerusalem, and appointed a priest named Justus Maraglic his Vicar-General in Egypt, to whom in 1745 Pope Benedict addressed a long letter of instructions. About this time Raphael Tuky, a native of Girgeh, who had been caught young and educated at Rome, was appointed Bishop of Arsinoe—where, however, he does not seem to have been allowed to reside long.¹ He was a man of considerable learning, and was recalled to Rome to assist in the publication of various works in Coptic, including a grammar and some liturgies. Besides these he translated several Greek and Latin books into Coptic and Arabic.

¹ In the later years of the eighteenth century the Roman Catholics were able to record a signal triumph, viz. the conversion of the Bishop of Girgeh to the Roman Church. He was persecuted, not apparently by the Copts, but by the Moslems, and escaped to Rome, where he lived till 1807.

In 1743 the King of Abyssinia sent an embassy to the Patriarch to ask for a new Abuna, Christodulos being dead. One of the men sent was an Egyptian named George, the two others were named Likanios and Theodorus, who was a priest. By this time all the sea-coast was in the hands of Mohammedans, and Abyssinia has never yet recovered any of her ancient ports. The Moslem Governor of Massowa seized and imprisoned the three envoys, took from them half of the money which had been entrusted to them for conveyance to Egypt, and threatened them with martyrdom. George the Egyptian disappeared; whether he was murdered or contrived to effect his escape was never known. Likanios at length gave way and became a Moslem; only Theodorus, on a ransom being sent from Abyssinia, was set free, and continued his journey to Cairo. It was not till 1745 that the new Abuna was able to set out for Abyssinia, and when he arrived at Massowa the same thing happened. They were thrown into prison, but Theodorus contrived some way of effecting his companion's escape, and, strange to say, was not immediately put to death in consequence. He was again held for ransom, and finally released on its arrival, when he returned to Abyssinia.

The Roman Catholic missionaries were by this time firmly established in Egypt; and though they made few converts from the National Church, they had a large following among the Syrians settled in Egypt, and other members of the Greek Church. They had churches of their own, which were frequented by many who did not formally join them, but were doubtless counted as converts. The Sultan heard of the increase of European influence through these Latin establishments, and was disquieted thereby. He ordered the Patriarch of the Greek Church in Egypt to forbid any member of his communion to attend the European services, on pain of being fined collectively a sum of one thousand purses. The money was paid, and the Syrians continued to attend the Latin churches. One of the Egyptian Emirs seized the occasion to imprison four of the Latin missionaries and to extort a considerable sum of money for their ransom.

For some centuries the Copts had been forbidden to make the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and this prohibition was a constant source of grief to the devout among them. In the year 1753 (A.H. 1166) it was determined to make a renewed effort and try what bribery could effect. The Coptic secretary of one of the principal Emirs undertook the negotiations on behalf of his nation, and eventually the Sheikh El Azhar consented, in return for a bribe of 1,000 dinars (700*l.*), to procure them a fetwa (a permit or passport) ordering that the Copts should be permitted to make the pilgrimage in peace and safety, and that no Moslem should interfere with them. The fetwa was duly delivered to the Copts, and preparations for the pilgrimage were immediately commenced on a gigantic scale. The place of rendezvous was the desert on the east side of Cairo, and here hundreds of Christians arrived daily; gifts were prepared for offering at the Holy Sepulchre, litters were constructed for the women and children, and an escort of Bedouin was engaged for the journey. The news of the pilgrimage spread on all sides, and gave great offence to the Moslems. Abdallah el Shabroni, the Sheikh

El Azhar, found himself very unpopular in consequence of the permission which he had obtained for them, and at length the secret of his complaisance leaked out. He was openly reproached with the bribe he had taken, and at first flatly denied that he had received any money, though, as a matter of fact, he had received an extra backsheesh over and above the stipulated sum. When he perceived that denial was useless, he took another way of restoring his prestige among the Moslems. He called out the students of El Azhar, inflamed the mob by an harangue against the pilgrimage, and ended by exhorting them to fall upon the camp of the unsuspecting Christians. The crowd needed no second bidding. A tumultuous multitude, armed with sticks and stones, poured out upon the Copts, who were taken entirely by surprise. They were stoned and beaten, the whole camp was pillaged, and everything taken from them. No exertions of the Copts high in office could obtain any redress, and all the enormous expenses to which they had been put were thrown away.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

ALI BEY

A.D. 1755
A.M. 1471
A.H. 1168

THE next Emir who stands out sufficiently from the crowd of murderous brigands to be worth mention is Ali Bey. He was the freed slave of one of the principal Emirs, and after his master had met with the usual death by assassination, Ali Bey was himself in danger for some time. He had amassed considerable wealth under his late master, and spent it in buying Mamelukes, or military slaves, to strengthen himself in case of attack. When the attack came, however, after a bloody fight in the streets, Ali Bey was defeated, and took refuge in the Said with several other Beys who had espoused his cause. Collecting a considerable force, he marched again upon Cairo, defeated the rival Emirs in a pitched battle, and pursued them as far as Tanta.

Even here they were not safe, so rapidly had the power of Ali Bey increased. Tanta was taken by storm, one of the two Emirs who had entrenched themselves there was killed, and the other, who had taken refuge in the mosque, was starved into surrender, and afterwards strangled.

From this time, with the exception of two short periods in the years 1763 and 1765, when popular outbreaks of detestation drove him into exile for some months, Ali Bey reigned supreme in Egypt for ten years. It was a veritable reign of terror ; for, trusting to his private army of Mamelukes and the lack of combination among the other Beys, he exiled or murdered, by twenty or thirty at a time, all those whom he had reason to suspect of desiring to supplant him. He forbade the purchase of fresh Mamelukes —by which alone the fighting staff of the Beys could be kept up—to anyone but himself, and confiscated the wealth of those whom he had slain or exiled. He employed a physician of the Greek Church to poison a rival whom he dared not attack openly, but the attempt failed. If a man, particularly a Christian or a Jew, appeared to have money, he was liable at any moment to be arrested and tortured till he had paid down almost all that he possessed. One Jew, a clerk in the Boulac custom-house, died under the bastinado after he had already paid down 40,000 pieces of gold to purchase his release. Nor were the Moslems safe from his rapacity. In 1770 he imposed a special tax upon the whole of Egypt in addition to those under which the inhabitants groaned already. Every village was to contribute 100 dollars. It was no comfort to the Mohammedan Copts in these circumstances to know that their Christian brethren had, in addition to their share of this tax, to make up a further contribution of 100,000 dollars, and the Jews 40,000 dollars. The Moslem director of the mint having amassed an enormous fortune, Ali Bey exiled him and took everything he possessed, even to his clothes, arms, and books. He found it necessary to appoint a Christian to succeed him.

The Ottoman Sultan more than once endeavoured to compass the death of this too powerful Emir, and in 1768 formally despatched an order to the Pasha of the year in Egypt demanding the head of Ali Bey. The spies of the latter warned him in time; he laid an ambushade for the Imperial messenger, killed him, and took from him the Imperial firman. The next day he called a general assembly of the Mameluke Beys, displayed the firman, and assured them that his own murder was to have been followed by a general massacre of all the Mameluke Beys and Emirs. He invited them to throw off the Ottoman yoke and elect a Sultan from among themselves, as in the old days.

Whether desirous or not, no one dared at that time to oppose Ali Bey. The Pasha was ordered to leave the country at once, and Egypt was declared independent under Ali Bey. The coast of Syria promptly followed suit, and the Ottoman Sultan was too much occupied by his war with Russia to take any effectual action against Syria and Egypt. The Pasha of Damascus was ordered to send troops against the rebels, and did so, but was beaten by the Sheikh Zahir of Acre, who put 25,000 men to rout with 6,000 in the North of Syria. Ali Bey next directed his arms against the Hawarah Bedouin, who had invaded the Said and for some years had been masters of the country between Assiut and Assuan. They were subdued, and the whole country submitted to Ali Bey. Another Bedouin chief whose father and grandfather before him had ruled over a tract of country on the west bank of the Nile, and had been on friendly relations with Ali Bey for some time, was suddenly attacked by the latter and killed, together with forty of his men.

By the summary processes of murder and exile Ali Bey had rid himself of all formidable rivals among the Emirs, even of those who had been his friends, but who fell victims to his insatiable love of power and money. In spite of his treatment of the Christians, the only man whom he seems to have really trusted was a Christian Copt, a man named Moallem Risk, whom he raised from the position of secretary to that of Controller of the Mint.

Moallem Risk was a man of some learning and particularly devoted to the study of astronomy, which proved a fortunate circumstance for Mr. Bruce, the well-known English traveller, who penetrated into Abyssinia at this time. Bruce landed in Alexandria in 1768, and Risk sent special orders that his luggage was not to be touched at the custom-house, nor any duty charged upon his belongings. Mr. Bruce, much pleased at this unexpected good fortune, sent a very handsome backsheesh in return to Moallem Risk when he arrived at Cairo. But the Copt returned it with offerings of his own, and a message to say that, when Mr. Bruce was sufficiently rested, Risk hoped to visit him and to be permitted to see him make use of his instruments. Meanwhile he had obtained a special guarantee for Mr. Bruce's safety from Ali Bey. It was by the advice of Moallem Risk also that Bruce took up his abode in the old fortress of Babylon, where the Patriarch had ordered rooms to be prepared for him. After some delays Bruce started on his adventurous journey up the river, but, having reached Assuan, he found it his best plan to retrace his steps to Luxor and make his way across to Kosseir, whence he went to Abyssinia by sea. He succeeded, however, in coming back the whole way by land, right through the Soudan, which had sunk by this time into the distracted and degraded state in which it has remained almost ever since. A negro dynasty, nominally Moslem, had finally crushed the Christian kingdom of the south, and from Senaar their representative claimed a shadowy sovereignty over the whole of the Soudan.

The great traveller met with most undeserved unbelief and obloquy in his own day; but one very extraordinary error into which he fell does not seem to have been detected by anyone. He never discovered the existence of the Coptic Church!

Though the Patriarch of that Church gave him letters without which he could not possibly have accomplished his travels in safety, and though Bruce speaks with sincere gratitude of the help and kindness shown him by all the members of that Church, he writes all through of the Greek Church, and is evidently under the impression that the Patriarch Mark (whose name he gives correctly) was the Patriarch of the Orthodox Greek Church, to which, as Bruce thought, all Egypt and Abyssinia owned allegiance.¹ He never seems to have heard of the Greek Patriarch Cyprian, and, indeed, it is not improbable that the latter spent but little of his life in Egypt.

By the time Bruce reached Egypt again on his return journey, Ali Bey had fallen from the supreme power which he had committed so many crimes to obtain. He perished—not by the enterprise of the Ottoman Sultan, against whom he was prepared, having rebuilt the forts of Alexandria and Damietta; nor yet by the private vengeance of one of the many Emirs and Beys whom he had despoiled and exiled; but by the treachery of one of his own Mamelukes—Mohammed Abu Dahab.² This man, whom ¹ See pp. 108 and 109 of vol. i. of Mr. Bruce's Travels, p. 100 of vol. iii., p. 415 of vol. iv., and p. 199 of vol. vi.

² He owed his nickname of Abu Dahab ('Father of Gold') to the fact that when he was raised to the dignity of Sandjak his largesse to Ali had bought as a youth and afterwards enfranchised and promoted in the usual way, was to the full as ambitious and treacherous as his master. He had been appointed general in command of the army, and in this capacity had won victories in the Hejaz and in Syria. But in the midst of his conquests in Syria he conspired with the officers under him, and agreed to disobey the orders of Ali Bey. Instead of proceeding with the campaign, Mohammed quietly marched back to Egypt and refused to fight any more. As the army was plainly on his side, Ali Bey did not dare to punish him openly, but he attempted to assassinate him. His house was surrounded during the night; but Mohammed Abu Dahab, at the head of his immediate followers, broke through the ranks and escaped to the Said, where he was speedily joined by all the discontented Beys and their troops.

Ali Bey despatched an army against him, but the great part deserted to Mohammed Abu Dahab, who had been bribing right and left for some years. The small remainder returned with the news to Cairo. Ali Bey raised fresh levies, and, sending one-half under another Ali Bey to meet Mohammed, he established himself with the remainder at the convent of Basatin, of which he took possession. He threw up entrenchments which reached from the convent on the banks of the Nile to the Mokattam hills, and planted cannon at intervals. But his troops were defeated, and desertions were so frequent that Ali Bey saw the end had come. In the night he deserted his position, and, hastily collecting his personal goods and riches from Cairo, he took flight into Syria.

the crowd was flung in gold instead of silver, and that for the rest of his life he continued to give gold where others gave silver.

Mohammed Bey Abu Dahab occupied his position without striking a blow. Nevertheless, he pillaged and then burnt the unfortunate convent which had been compelled to shelter his rival. He entered Cairo as a conqueror, beheaded the man whom he had some reason to fear would remain faithful to Ali, and ordered that all the new coinage which had been struck by Moallem Risk should be withdrawn from circulation.

He then wrote to the Sultan to assure him of his submission and to express his readiness to receive a Pasha from the Sublime Porte. He ordered some of the Beys to write a letter to Ali Bey in Syria, begging him to return, and assuring him that they would betray Mohammed to him as soon as he appeared. Meanwhile Ali Bey had obtained reinforcements from two sources in Syria—he had negotiated with the Russians, who were the natural enemies of the Ottoman Turks, for the loan of artillery, munitions of war, and 3,000 Albanian soldiers; and had also renewed his alliance with Zahir of Acre. One of his officers had already reconquered Tyre and other towns on the coast of Syria besides Jaffa (which he resigned to Sheikh Zahir), Gaza, Ramleh, and Lydda. On receiving the false embassy from the Egyptian Mamelukes he at once directed his march on Egypt, and at Salahieh met with the forces of Mohammed Bey.

In the first encounter Ali Bey was victorious, but his faithless Mameluke did not trust to fighting alone. He harangued the Egyptian troops in the character of an earnest Moslem, assuring them that Allah would not permit Ali Bey, who had forsaken the faith and entered into an alliance with the Christian infidels, to triumph over them. Moreover, he intrigued with the two principal Beys who had followed the fortunes of Ali Bey—Ibrahim Bey and Murad Bey—to ensure their desertion of their master at the critical moment. Besides enormous bribes in money, Murad Bey stipulated in addition that the favourite wife of Ali Bey, Sitte Nefissa, a beautiful Georgian, should be given up to him.

The bargain was agreed upon, and at the critical moment the two Beys deserted to the side of Mohammed; the rest of Ali's army fled, the ten Mamelukes who alone remained with him were slain, and Ali Bey, mortally wounded, was carried in a litter to Cairo, where seven days afterwards he expired. It was said at the time that the doctors whom Mohammed Bey sent to attend him were instructed that their patient must not recover.

Ali Bey had done a great deal of building in Egypt during his ten years' reign, principally at Boulac, where he had constructed an embankment and a bazaar, which gave great offence, since it occupied the site of some beautiful gardens, and was, according to Gabbarti, one of the ugliest erections ever seen.

In the latter half of this century a great many buildings were constructed by an Emir named Abd-el-Rahman. This man built or restored eighteen large mosques in Cairo. The mosque of the Moghrabins; the mosque of El Saida el Setouhia, near the Bab-el-Futuh; the mosque Hussein, the mosque Saida Zeinab,¹ the mosque Saida Sekina, another called Saida Aïsha, the mosque of Abu-el-Seoud el Jarhi, the mosque Sherif-el-Din el Kurdi, the mosque of the Sheikh el Hefni, and three others whose names are not given are amongst those which were new. He also set up many schools and *sebil*s (or public fountains), besides bridges and private houses.

¹ Saida Zeinab was not finished till some years later.

With all this, Abd-el-Rahman does not receive a very good character from the Moslem historian Gabbarti, who accuses him of unbounded avarice, which led him to amass money in all sorts of illegitimate ways. He was the loyal follower of Ali Bey, who repaid his devotion, so soon as he felt strong enough to do it with impunity, by exile to the Hejaz. Abd-el-Rahman was permitted to return, when an old man, in 1776; but the journey was too much for him, and he died a few days afterwards.

Mohammed Bey Abu Dahab recalled several of the Emirs who had been exiled by Ali Bey, and restored them to their ancient privileges. He did not, however, enjoy the supreme power which he had coveted more than a few years. In 1775 he invaded Syria, which still remained for the most part in the hands of Sheikh Zahir. He took Jaffa by assault and massacred the inhabitants to a man—Moslem, Jew, and Christian alike. Most of the women were given over as prey to the soldiers, and the children were distributed as slaves. This bloody deed struck terror throughout Syria. Sheikh Zahir left Acre, bidding the inhabitants make what terms they could. Not only Acre but all the other towns submitted to Mohammed Abu Dahab without striking a blow. Cairo received orders to illuminate and decorate itself in his honour; but even as it obeyed, the news came that Mohammed was dead. It was generally believed in Egypt that he died of joy at his own success.

The death of Mohammed Abu Dahab left Egypt in the hands of the three principal Mameluke Beys, since the Pashas who went and came at intervals from Constantinople were but puppets to soothe the pride of the Ottoman Sultan and make him content with nominal sovereignty and his yearly tribute. These three Beys were Ismail Bey, who had been left in charge of Egypt during Mohammed's Syrian campaign; Ibrahim Bey, who was Governor of Cairo; and Murad Bey, who succeeded to the command of the army on Mohammed's death. All these Beys had been the slaves of Ali Bey, and had betrayed their master; the nationality of the former is not stated, but the two latter were Circassians.

It was not long before dissensions broke out between the three. Murad and Ibrahim combined against Ismail Bey, and, after petty fights had inflicted incalculable misery on the innocent population, a pitched battle left the two Circassians masters of the field. Ismail Bey fled the country, but returned in a few months with fresh forces, only to receive a more crushing defeat in the desert near Helwan. Almost all the remainder of his house perished, and he himself escaped with difficulty to one of the caves in the Mokattam hills, where he lay concealed for three days. Murad and Ibrahim now lived as conquerors in the country, plundering where they would, and mocking the Sultan with a yearly account in which they represented that the sums due to Egypt from the Sublime Porte more than balanced the amount due from Egypt as tribute.

During the years 1777-80 M. Sonnini was sent to travel in Egypt by the French Government, the objects of his inquiries being both scientific and political, since the French Court was already meditating that invasion which Bonaparte some years later carried out. M. Sonnini was no doubt an excellent man of science, but his impatient and overbearing character ill-fitted him for travel and research in Egypt. Moreover, he believed everything that was told him, however incredible, if it were to the disadvantage of the Egyptians, particularly the Christians; and he had evidently a strong partiality for their Mameluke tyrants, although he is compelled to admit that they were responsible for the ruin and misery of the country. He spent most of his time at Rosetta, where the Europeans were allowed more liberty than in any other town in Egypt; whereas in Cairo he could hardly show himself outside the gates of the French quarter, owing to the disturbed state of the town.¹ From Rosetta, however, he made an expedition to the Wady Natron; and from Cairo, armed with a letter from Murad Bey and disguised as a physician, he was able to make his way with great difficulty as far as Luxor, in the vain hope of reaching Abyssinia by way of the Soudan. Civil war broke out again, and he was compelled to return to Cairo. He mentions that all the Europeans in Cairo employed Berbers as servants except the French, who had been forbidden to do so by their own Government since the murder of De Roule in 1706. Finding that not even the money tribute was forthcoming from Egypt under Murad and Ibrahim, the Sultan of Turkey, now Abd-el-Hamid, who had succeeded to the throne in 1774, resolved to interfere. He did not care whether Egypt were oppressed or his governor reduced to a cypher, but he did care about his money, and resolved to fight for it. In the year 1786¹ (A.H. 1200) a Turkish army landed at Alexandria under Hassan Pasha, and after a bloody battle Murad and Ibrahim were defeated and fled to the Said, leaving Hassan Pasha to march to Cairo unopposed.² Submission, however, could not save the unoffending population from the miseries inseparable from the passage of a Turkish army. Behind them as they marched the country was left desolate and ruined, and those villagers were lucky who had time to fly before them, and thus escape with the loss of all their property and the ruin of their crops. Hassan entered Cairo on August 1, 1786, and began by confiscating all that belonged to the rebellious Beys, selling everything by public auction, including the inmates of their harems. He sent an expedition to the Said against Murad and Ibrahim; but, after a great deal of bloodshed on both sides and the ruin of that part of the country, the two Beys retreated into the Soudan, and the Turkish expedition returned to Cairo.

¹ Sonnini mentions that a few days after Ismail Bey had been driven into exile, Murad Bey, desiring to destroy one of Ismail's friends who had taken refuge in the citadel, sent for an English engineer named Robinson, and desired him to set the citadel on fire. The Englishman refused, alleging as an excuse that to do so would need mortars and bombs, and that none could be procured nearer than Venice. Instead of beheading Robinson, as Sonnini seems to think was to be expected, Murad dismissed him with a thousand sequins!

Hassan Pasha stayed about a year in Cairo, and restored Ismail Bey to power as Sheikh El Beled. He executed a great number of the most turbulent Mamelukes, and Cairo enjoyed a certain amount of security in the public streets during his stay. Except for this boon, however, the unfortunate country was but little better off. A terrible outbreak of cattle plague almost destroyed the beasts throughout Egypt, and the taxes, instead of being lightened in consequence, were made more burdensome than ever.

¹ Early in this year 1786 the great door of the mosque of Sultan Hassan was solemnly reopened. The shops which had been built in front of it were demolished and a wall pulled down. The door had been built up for fifty years, ever since the massacre of the eleven Fikarite Emirs in 1736, when the great door of the mosque had been burnt to effect an entrance for the murderers.

² When the Russian Government became aware that the Ottoman Sultan proposed to send an expedition to Egypt, the Russian Consul at Alexandria received instructions to arrange an alliance with the Mameluke Beys against Turkey, and he made overtures to Ibrahim and Murad Bey in consequence. But they declined European interference, believing themselves secure; and when Hassan Pasha landed, they found it was too late.

As usual, the Christians suffered most, since, besides the burdens which they shared in common with their Moslem fellow-countrymen, Hassan Pasha organised a regular system of persecution. With the accession of Mohammed Abu Dahab their brief season of prosperity had come to an end; all the old iniquitous laws were put in force against them, and every excuse sought for oppression and robbery. The Copts who had risen to power under Ali Bey were degraded, their goods confiscated, their houses and those of their children were pillaged and destroyed.¹ In addition to the old oppressions new insults were put upon them by Hassan Pasha. It was announced by heralds in the street that no Christian should be permitted to ride any animal at all, or own a single slave. Henceforth, moreover, no Christian or Jew was permitted to bear the name of any prophet or patriarch mentioned in the Old Testament. All those already known by such names were to change them at once. This order was obeyed only so far as their communication with the ¹ Nevertheless, Moallem Ibrahim-el-Johari, chief clerk of the finance department, had made himself so universally liked and respected by both Moslem and Christian that he was exempted from persecution, and under Ibrahim Bey rose once more into great favour. Through his influence the churches and monasteries were allowed a little later to be restored, and he gave a great deal of land and money for the support of the National Church. When he died, Ibrahim Bey followed the funeral in person to do him honour.

Moslems was concerned, so that from henceforth many Copts were known by one name to the Moslems and by another among their fellow-Christians. At the present time the former name has in many instances become the surname of a Coptic family.

This order was followed in a few days by a forcible confiscation of all the slaves owned by Christians. The soldiers broke into all the Christian houses—a task which must have been singularly congenial to them—and drove out by main force all the slaves whom they found. The unfortunate creatures were forced in droves up to the citadel, where by order of the Pasha they were put up to public auction. Most of them were bought in by the soldiers, who set up a regular slave market in the citadel, and sold the slaves at an increased price to all who came for them.

An inquisition was made into the number of the Christians and the houses and property belonging to them. A fine of 500 purses was imposed upon them, and the poll-tax for the year was doubled, every Christian in Egypt paying two dinars a head instead of one. In addition, the Christian families who had been in the employment of the rebel Beys Murad and Ibrahim had an extra fine to pay.

No Moslem house of any wealth or importance could carry on its business without employing Christians for all offices requiring intelligence and probity, and the number of Christians who had been engaged in the service of Murad and Ibrahim was so large that their fines produced the sum of 75,000 dollars. The Patriarch at that time was John XVIII. His treasurer was arrested, but, fortunately for him, Hassan Pasha was recalled to Turkey.

in the autumn of the year 1787¹ to take command of an expedition against the Russians. Ismail Bey was left to the exercise of almost unchecked power, for Abdi, the new Pasha sent by the Ottoman Government, was, as usual, a mere cypher. The limits of Ismail's power were indeed greatly circumscribed in one sense, for Ibrahim and Murad still held possession of the Said as far north as Minieh in open rebellion.²

For some years the monotonous record of strife and oppression continues. 'During this time,' says the Moslem historian Gabbarti, whose pages are full of detailed accounts, 'all business was at a standstill, and we were more miserable than we had ever been in our lives. The roads were destroyed, and no place anywhere was secure.' Where the Emirs were not, the predatory Bedouin took their place, and all through the country neither life nor property was safe. Not even the caravan of the Mecca pilgrimage was respected, and Ismail Bey in vain attempted to strengthen his position by importing Roumelian and Albanian soldiers; they only added fresh elements of strife among the different military corps. In the early spring of the year 1791 (A.H. 1205) one of the terrible outbreaks of pestilence which were so frequent in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries carried off Ismail Bey among thousands of lesser victims. This paved the way for the return of Murad and Ibrahim Bey, since the Emirs left in Cairo were too much divided between themselves concerning the succession to make common cause against them. They entered Cairo as the acknowledged masters of Egypt in June or July, and, their own houses and families having been destroyed and sold, they took possession of several belonging to Emirs who had lately died of the plague, married their widows, and annexed their slaves. The Albanian and Syrian soldiers who had been in the service of Ismail received three days' notice to quit the country.

¹ In the early days of this year the Christians had been subjected to a new outrage. Abdi Pasha, happening to pass through a part of the town which he had not before seen, asked Ismail Bey, who was riding with him, what was the name of the quarter. On being told that it was almost entirely occupied by Christians, he gave orders that all the houses should be at once demolished. Before the order could be carried out the principal Christians obtained its revocation on payment of a sum of 85,000 dollars, of which 17,000 was paid by the Syrians and the rest by the Copts.

² Gabbarti tells us that in the year 1789 an ambassador arrived from India, sent by the Sultan Haider, to demand aid from the Ottoman Sultan to make war against the English in India. Abd-el-Hamid permitted him to recruit in Egypt; but Gabbarti says that, as he insisted on branding everyone who came to take service under him with an ineffaceable mark, he did not obtain many followers.

That year the Nile did not rise to any height, and great scarcity of provisions was added to the other miseries of the country. In vain did Ibrahim and Murad patrol the streets to punish any tradesman caught selling goods at famine prices; they were obeyed while they passed down the street, and no longer. For themselves, the Beys brought plentiful supplies from Upper Egypt, but these they stored in their own houses and refused to share with the starving populace. 'Tyranny, injustice, and famine,' says Gabbarti, 'reigned throughout the country.' In 1793 the pilgrim caravan was again attacked by the Bedouin, the greater part of the pilgrims massacred, and all their goods stolen. A popular insurrection warned the Beys that there was a limit beyond which even the unarmed Egyptians would turn upon them. They found it expedient to sign a paper drawn up by the principal Sheikhs of the town promising to amend their ways, to abolish unjust exaction and open robbery, and to send their dues more regularly to Mecca. But this agreement was observed for about a month, and after that all the old practices were revived. At the close of the eighteenth century Egypt was perhaps in a worse condition than she had been in at any time since the Roman conquest. Her industries were paralysed, her commerce ruined, and the same relapse into barbarism which had already overtaken the Soudan was rapidly overwhelming the more fertile soil and historic civilisation of Egypt. But the little body of Europeans who, by virtue of their immunities and the foreign power at their back, kept alive the feeble spark of commercial life which was all that was left to her, had not been uninterested spectators of her increasing weakness; and the French, who all over the world at that date were dreaming of universal conquest, felt that their time had come.

CHAPTER XXXIX

THE FRENCH INVASION

A.D. 1798
A.M. 1514
A.H. 1212

It was on July 1, 1798, that Bonaparte, with his army of 37,000 men, arrived in the harbour of Alexandria, and sent a boat to bring off the French Consul before commencing hostilities. From him they learnt that on June 28, only two days before, Nelson with the English fleet had been at Alexandria in search of the French, and, finding that no one had seen or heard of them, had set sail again immediately in further search. Nelson had, however, seen Said Mohammed Kerim, the Governor of Cairo, and had warned him of the approaching danger from the French. But the Moslem authorities, with the confidence born of ignorance, refused all offers of help or alliance with the English.

‘This country belongs to the Sultan,’ they said, ‘and neither the French nor anyone else has anything to do with it.’ The English withdrew, and Said Mohammed Kerim sent the news to Cairo, where it was received with the same incredulous contempt. The Emirs loudly boasted that all the Europeans together could not stand for a single instant before them; but had only to appear, to be crushed under the feet of their horses.

Three days later, however, the French fleet came in sight, and a message of a very different character was at once despatched by the governor to Murad Bey: 'My lord, the fleet which has just approached is immense; we can discover neither its beginning nor its end. For the love of God and his Prophet, send us some fighting men.'

On the receipt of this communication Murad Bey rode straight to the house of Ibrahim Bey (now the Kasr-el-Ain Hospital), and an informal council was hastily summoned. Much time was wasted in useless recriminations, but eventually it was agreed that Murad Bey should proceed down the left bank of the Nile to meet the French army, Ibrahim should occupy Boulac with a reserve force to protect Cairo, and the Pasha (Abu Bekr Tarabulsi) was to send a courier express to Constantinople for aid.

Meanwhile the position of all the Christians in Cairo, both native and European, was one of great danger. Indeed, the proposal was at once made in the Divan that the first measure taken should be the extermination of every Christian in Cairo in a general massacre; and it was only overborne by a narrow majority of those who realised the impolicy and extreme difficulty of such a proceeding at this juncture. Ibrahim Bey, always more favourable to the Christians than Murad, was firm in his protection of them, and his wife received and preserved many Europeans and their families; but the Copts were daily insulted, and threatened with death and pillage at the earliest opportunity. Their churches, convents, and houses were searched for arms; 'in a word,' says Gabbarti, 'Egypt became from this moment the theatre of robberies and assassinations without number.'

Bonaparte landed at Alexandria almost without opposition, and his soldiers readily scaled the crumbling walls.

In the town the Moslems kept up a fire from their windows for a short time, but in the afternoon they surrendered at discretion. Said Mohammed submitted to Bonaparte, and was appointed by him civil governor of the town under Kleber, who was left in Alexandria with a garrison of 3,000 men. A sort of municipal council was at once created, the printing-presses were disembarked and set to work to turn out Arabic proclamations, of which a great many were published by Bonaparte during his stay in Egypt. They were all much in the same style : appeals to the down-trodden people of Egypt to rise and join their deliverers, assurances that the French were true Moslems, and threats of the terrible penalties which should swiftly overtake those who dared to resist.¹ Most of these proclamations are given in full by the three men who have published detailed accounts of the French invasion—M. Ryme in his 'Égypte Française,' Abderrahman Gabbarti in his 'History of Egypt since the Ottoman Conquest,' and Mr. Paton in his 'History of the Egyptian Revolution.'

On July 7 Bonaparte left Alexandria and marched to Rahmanieh, the army suffering terribly from heat and thirst on the way. From hence General Dugua was despatched to secure Rosetta, where the European population was in imminent danger ; and after this end had been achieved the French army continued its march on Cairo. Every village was deserted on their approach, the inhabitants carrying off everything that they possibly could, and the French suffered severely from want of provisions.

¹ Napoleon made one of the great blunders of his life when he proclaimed himself a Moslem and the friend of Moslems on his arrival in Egypt. No single Moslem believed in his professions ; it only mingled contempt with their terror of the French, and destroyed, so far as the French were concerned, that belief in the good faith and honesty of the Frangi which is still one of our most valuable aids in dealing with Orientals. He gave the greatest offence, too, by requiring that all who submitted to him should wear the tricoloured cockade.

At Shebreiss they met with Murad Bey and 4,000 mounted Mamelukes, but after a sharp action the latter retired and fell back towards Cairo, abandoning his artillery and baggage. He took up a position at Embaba, where he strongly entrenched himself, while Ibrahim Bey did the same thing on the opposite side of the river at Boulac. On July 21 the French army arrived at Embaba, and the same day the great battle commenced which decided the fate of Egypt. The Mamelukes fought well, but they were outnumbered and out-generalled from the beginning. After some hours of hard fighting Murad Bey took flight with his immediate followers, and halting for a few moments at his Gizeh country-house, in order to secure his money and valuables, fled precipitately into Upper Egypt. For the Mamelukes who were still left fighting at Embaba it soon became a mere massacre. Many were drowned in the river, but most were slain on the field. Ibrahim Bey, hearing that all was lost, abandoned Boulac and fled with Bekr Pasha into Cairo.

Here the panic was universal. Everyone who could fled to Upper Egypt, and every beast of burden commanded double price. All Saturday the stream of fugitives went on; but hardly had they passed beyond the gates of the town, when they were set upon by the Bedouin whom Ibrahim Bey had called to his aid. They took all the valuables which each person was bearing with him. They stripped every woman to the skin, and dis-honoured most of them, even those of high rank. They assassinated all those who made the smallest attempt at resistance. Those who were able to escape back into the town with their lives considered themselves fortunate. 'Never in the whole history of Egypt,' says Gabbarti, 'was there a night so full of horror as this. Terrible enough to hear of, it was far more terrible to see.'

On Monday the French entered Cairo, and Bonaparte established himself in the newly built palace of an Emir in the Ezbekieh. He set about organising a Divan for the government of Cairo, after the pattern of that which had been already established in Alexandria, under General du Puy, who was made Governor of Cairo, and M. Pousielgne, who became General Financial Administrator. Ten Moslem Sheikhs of Arab or Egyptian descent, three Mamelukes chosen by these Sheikhs, and two Christian Franco-Egyptians comprised this Divan, which received instructions that their first business was to raise a sum of 500,000 dollars for the necessities of the French army. The latter was also allowed free pillage of all the Mamelukes' houses; those Egyptians who did not wish to be confounded with them, and pillaged alike, obtained patents of protection in writing from Bonaparte, which they fixed upon their doors.

Public security was, however, maintained more effectually than it had been for generations in Cairo. The inhabitants were compelled, under stringent penalties, to sweep, water, and light their streets, and the massive wooden doors which for a century or two had made it possible to shut off every street and alley from any communication with the rest of the town—a most necessary precaution under the Mameluke rule—were removed, to allow free patrol to the French garrison. M. Samuel Bernand was appointed Controller of the Mint, and money continued to be struck from the old dies, with the cypher of the reigning Sultan.

A considerable force was despatched in search of Ibrahim Bey, who, with his Mamelukes, had withdrawn into the Delta, and there was a good deal of indecisive fighting, in which both sides claimed the victory. Finally, in August, Ibrahim made his way into Syria and took refuge with Djeddar at Acre.

It was on August 1 that Nelson returned to the shores of Egypt in pursuit of the French, and anchored off Aboukir, where the French fleet was stationed. At sunset on the same day the battle of Aboukir commenced, and by noon the next day every ship of the French fleet but four was taken or destroyed.

The loss of their fleet struck with consternation every Frenchman in Egypt. Bonaparte did his best to minimise the effect on the minds of the natives, and a Syrian who had ventured to tell the truth about it in Cairo was severely punished; but the Moslems slowly realised the importance of what had happened, and before two months were over a serious insurrection broke out in Cairo. In fact, the virtues of the French were as much against them as their vices; and they had contrived to set every class, nationality, and creed in Egypt against them. The Mamelukes, of course, were their avowed enemies. The Arab and Egyptian Moslems resented equally their false profession of Islam; the vexatious bureaucratic restrictions without which no Frenchman can govern; the sanitary laws which necessitated the inspection of private houses, not excepting even the harems; and last, but, we fear, not least, the licence permitted to the French soldiery in the matter of the native women.¹

The Copts, of course, not only resented the false profession of Islam, but, not conceiving that a great nation could exist without any religion at all, as was almost the case with the French of that day, they identified the invaders with the Roman Catholic Power which so constantly endeavoured to take away their place and nation.

The immediate cause of the outbreak, which took place on October 22, 1798, was the imposition of a house-tax in Cairo. The Sheikhs of El Azhar sent their readers to summon all the faithful to the mosque of El Azhar, and, when they were collected, the first attack was made upon the house of General Caffarelli. Barricades were thrown up; all the French caught walking about the streets, among whom were four members of the Institute, were murdered; and many native Christians shared the same fate. But the ignorant Moslems had taken no pains to guard the mounds which dominated the city on the south and east, and the next day they were all bristling with French cannon. Messages were sent to the Sheikhs enjoining immediate submission, but, as these were received with scorn by the insurgents, order was given for the bombardment to commence.

A few hours of heavy cannonading, principally directed against the El Azhar and Hussein quarters, reduced the Sheikhs to capitulation. The French entered the town, throwing down the barricades, and occupied the mosque of El Azhar, where they stabled their horses, broke the lamps, and effaced the extracts from the Koran. Numerous arrests were made, and several of the principal as well as a great number of lesser dignitaries were decapitated. Indeed, Bonaparte himself states, in a letter to General Regnier, that every night at this time he cut off thirty heads by way of making an example!

¹ Nothing has so astonished the Egyptian of our own time as the good behaviour of our English soldiers in this respect. It is almost the one subject on which every inhabitant of the country agrees in praising the English. 'Not even good Moslem soldiers,' they end by saying, 'could ever have been trusted as the English can be trusted!'

In August General Desaix had been despatched up the Nile in search of Murad Bey, who halted in the Fayoum to re-form his army. The first battle between them was fought on October 8 at Sediman, near Beni-Souef, in which Murad Bey was completely routed and the French lost 400 killed and wounded. Desaix occupied the Fayoum, and, leaving a garrison there, followed Murad up the Nile. Another engagement took place on January 23, 1799, in which Murad was again defeated. Still the French continued the pursuit, and occupied the frontier town of Assuan, Murad having retired into Nubia, where they did not attempt to follow him, though they occupied Philæ and fortified Assuan. On the return march another Mameluke Bey, with a large following, met them in the Thebaid, and several sharp skirmishes took place.

Meanwhile the position of the French in Cairo was very far from being comfortable. The English blockaded the coast, and no supplies for the French were allowed to enter the country. Moreover, the Turks were preparing to reconquer Egypt by way of Syria, and Bonaparte determined to be beforehand with them.

Towards the end of January, 1799, Bonaparte left Egypt with about 15,000 men. El Arish surrendered after a few days' resistance, and the Mameluke garrison was sent back to Cairo and displayed to the populace as prisoners.

Jaffa was taken by assault on March 5, and 4,000 of the garrison, who had entrenched themselves in a large Khan, offered to surrender on promise that their lives should be spared, else they would defend themselves to the death. The offer was accepted, and the 4,000 prisoners were brought disarmed to Bonaparte. He refused to sanction the agreement which his aides-de-camp had made, though they reminded him that they had been specially instructed to restrain useless carnage, and two days later the whole of the prisoners were massacred in cold blood on the sea-shore by his orders.

By his own act Bonaparte thus destroyed all chance of his success in Syria. Every Moslem in the land, warned by the fate of the prisoners at Jaffa, resolved to die fighting, if needs must, but never to surrender. Moreover, the unburied corpses caused in a few days a terrible outbreak of the plague, which carried off a large proportion of the French garrison.

The French army was next marched upon Acre, but was disagreeably surprised to find an English fleet waiting to take part in the defence. The siege began on March 18, and every effort was made by the French for the capture of the city, but in vain. Sir Sidney Smith and his followers directed the defence, and at a critical moment by a personal advance saved the town. The siege had lasted nearly a month, and on the last two days alone, when the French made a desperate assault, they lost no fewer than 700 men. Bonaparte realised that his Syrian expedition had failed, and that he must return to Egypt. He sent a letter to the Divan of Cairo, in which he assured them that he had not left one stone of Acre upon another ; but the Cairenes very well understood the real state of affairs, and their historian Abderrahman Gabbarti laughs at Bonaparte's letter, and enumerates sixteen reasons which Bonaparte might have given for his retreat from Acre had he been inclined to tell the truth.

The French army retreated in good order, but suffering greatly, to Jaffa. The town was full of the plague, and the number of the sick and wounded became so great that there were no possible means of transport for them. A great many of the most incapable were crowded into boats and told to make their way by sea to Damietta. But having neither water nor provisions, nor sufficient sailors to navigate the boats, the flotilla in despair steered straight for the English vessels which were following the French army. Sir Sidney Smith received them with the greatest kindness, supplied them with all necessaries, and sent them under safe escort to Damietta. The fate of those who filled the hospital in Jaffa was less happy. The Turks were rapidly approaching, and the French army must push on. Bonaparte therefore gave orders to poison all the wounded of his own army. The chief physician indignantly refused, and to this day it is not certainly known whether his assistant carried out the order or whether the wounded Frenchmen were all massacred by the Turks the next day.

On June 14 Bonaparte made a triumphal entry, with music and banners flying, into Cairo. Gabbarti significantly remarks that the soldiers looked pale and exhausted.

Indeed, their troubles were far from over. Murad Bey was coming down in force, having divided his army into two parts, one advancing by the left and the other by the right bank of the Nile; while at the same time the combined forces of the English and the Turks were on their way to attack by sea. Bonaparte struck promptly and with fatal effect at the Mamelukes. The force on the east, which was intended to effect a junction with Ibrahim Bey in Syria, was surprised, with such complete success that 700 camels laden with Mameluke property fell into the hands of the French, and the Mamelukes were scattered in every direction. The western force was under the command of Murad himself, whose aim was to reach the north coast, but, learning that a large body of French had been posted to intercept him, he retired upon Gizeh. Here he was attacked by Napoleon in person, defeated, and once more took refuge in the south.

On July 15, 1799, Napoleon heard that the Turkish fleet had appeared off Aboukir. He at once set out in person with his army, and arrived at Alexandria on the 23rd, to find that the Turkish army had already disembarked in force. Sir Sidney Smith, who had accompanied the Turks, in vain tried by every means to induce them to fortify their position against the rapidly advancing French army. He sent what men he could spare to see it done, but the inertia of the Turks could not be sufficiently overcome; and when the French arrived, the covering operations were by no means completed. In the battle which followed the Turks were totally defeated, their baggage and artillery taken, and many hundreds of them only escaped death by swimming for refuge to the English ships. The fort refused to surrender, but the Turks within spent their time in fighting one another, and after seven days' bombardment the remains of the garrison rushed out unarmed and begged for mercy. Two thousand of them were made prisoners. The battle was won, but the cause of the French was lost from the same date. Napoleon had heard for some time rumours of the ill-fortune of the French Republic in its recent undertakings, and was determined to obtain trustworthy news. For this end, M. Ryme says, Napoleon arranged an exchange of prisoners with Sir Sidney Smith, and his account of the transaction is so curious an instance of French prejudice that it is worth translating :—

The Englishman not only agreed at once to the proposition, he loaded the officers who brought it with kindness, and offered to send the French general all his late newspapers, being sure, he said, that neither the officers nor the privates of the French army would be sorry to receive news of the country from which they had been so long separated. Is it necessary to say that Bonaparte hastened to accept an offer which he had hoped to receive? Is it necessary to add that under this appearance of a delicate attention our enemy only concealed a ruse of war? Why should Sidney Smith wish to communicate to us his European news, if he did not foresee the disastrous result for France? It was not only that he promised himself a malicious pleasure in the regret we must feel! He saw further. He knew that the papers would excite (in Bonaparte) an irresistible desire to fly to the succour of his country, so that he would think himself fortunate to be allowed to retire from Egypt even by a species of capitulation. What happiness for Sidney Smith thus to obtain by a trick what England had made so many useless sacrifices to accomplish! Or if Bonaparte abandoned his army and set out alone, better still for Sidney Smith. He would capture him; and, Bonaparte once a prisoner, the French would soon evacuate Egypt!

Comment on this passage is needless, but if the Englishman could not guess how his simple act of courtesy would be interpreted, the Frenchman did act precisely as his countrymen seemed to expect. Napoleon from this time resolved to abandon his army in Egypt and return to a more familiar theatre of operations. He was sick of the whole thing, since his failure in Syria and the slow building up of a reformed government in Egypt was not at all to his taste. He returned to enjoy another triumphal entry into Cairo, but he at once communicated his intentions in secrecy to Berthier, Bourrienne, and Admiral Ganteaume, who was ordered to fit out the four frigates which were all that were left of the French fleet with such things as were necessary, without the knowledge of the English. To Kleber he pretended that he was going to Rosetta, and made an appointment to meet him there on August 24, at the same time that he wrote to tell Ganteaume that he should leave Egypt on August 22, for he heard on the 17th that the last ship of the English fleet had left, and this was all for which he was waiting. He left Cairo on the 18th, and the rumour that he had abandoned the army at once spread and gathered strength. When Kleber arrived at Rosetta, he first heard of the trick which had been played upon him, and almost immediately a letter was brought to him from Napoleon, resigning to him the command of the army in Egypt, with power to conclude a peace with the Ottoman Sultan if he thought fit. Kleber was extremely angry, and, at once returning to Cairo, issued a proclamation on September 26, 1799, in which he set forth that General Bonaparte had departed for France without informing anybody; that the armed force had been reduced to one-half its original strength; that the French enemies were no longer the Mamelukes, but three Great Powers—the Porte, England, and Russia.

Moreover, the proclamation stated that the soldiers were almost without clothing, and that Bonaparte, though he had forestalled the taxes, had left a deficit of almost twelve millions of francs. Murad Bey had still a large force in Upper Egypt, and the Turks were advancing from Syria, besides sending a fleet to Damietta. In this state of affairs Kleber announced that he intended to open negotiations with the Sultan.

The first attack of the Turks on Damietta was repulsed, but Kleber knew that his position was desperate, and the negotiations were begun in November—at first on board the ship of Sir Sidney Smith, and afterwards at El Arish, where the Grand Wuzir of Turkey was encamped. They were almost broken off by the Turkish attack on El Arish, where the French soldiers mutinied against their officers and refused to fight; but at length, on January 24, 1800, the Convention of El Arish was signed, which permitted the French to evacuate Egypt with all the honours of war.

The Egyptians were delighted, and a final imposition of 3,000 purses on the inhabitants of Cairo was paid with alacrity, since it was 'to hasten the departure of the French.' But a despatch from Admiral Keith,¹ dated January 8, was already on the way to inform Kleber that he had received positive orders from his Majesty not to permit the French to leave Egypt unless they surrendered their arms and the ships and stores of the port of Alexandria.

Sir Sidney Smith was almost as much disturbed at this turn of affairs as Kleber himself, and wrote to protest against this undeserved humiliation being inflicted on the ¹ Commander of the British fleet in the Mediterranean.

French army, but to no effect. Kleber absolutely refused to evacuate the country on these terms; and as the Turkish Pasha pressed upon him to withdraw from Cairo, and reminded him that the time allowed by the convention had already expired, he prepared once more for battle. He had already been reinforced by the French garrisons from Upper Egypt, and on March 20 he engaged the Turkish army in battle at Heliopolis and completely routed them. But unwarily he pursued them as far as Salahieh, and meanwhile another revolution broke out against the French in Cairo. Nasif Pasha, the commander-in-chief of the Turkish army, had only simulated flight, and while the French were in full pursuit of the Grand Wuzir he entered Cairo by a detour and took possession of the town in the name of the Sultan. He began by a massacre of the Copts and a pillage of all the Christian quarters. In particular, a Moslem fanatic raged through the whole town, searching for Christians, stripping the women naked, and cutting off the heads of the children. This terrible state of things had lasted two days before the French began to return, and it was known that they had been victorious at Heliopolis. All those who could, among the Copts and Syrians, escaped over the wall and took refuge in the French camp. Access to the river was cut off by the French, and Nasif Pasha would have consented to evacuate Cairo, but the fanatical party were in the majority, and he dared not go against them.

Boulac was taken by the French and given up to pillage and massacre, and then an entrance into Cairo was effected by mines. 'This night,' says Gabbarti, 'was the most terrible we ever spent. The French carried matches composed of oil and spirits of wine, and set fire wherever they passed.' Kleber ordered that Cairo should be illuminated for three days in honour of his victory, and meanwhile he imposed a fine¹ upon the town of 12,000,000 francs! Moreover, he now allied himself with Murad Bey, the chief of those Mamelukes whom the French had come to Egypt to destroy. Murad was permitted to retain peaceable possession of the whole of Upper Egypt on condition of assisting the French against the Turks.

The French had been abandoned at a critical moment by one general; they now lost, at a still more perilous juncture, another by assassination. On June 14 Kleber was walking after breakfast in the garden of General Damas, when he was murdered by a fanatic in the pay of the Janissaries. The command of the French army devolved upon Menou, who had really done what so many of the French professed to do—become a Moslem, and married the daughter of a low-class Cairene.

He began by removing Generals Lamisse and Damas, who were obnoxious to him, and dismissing all Christians, whether Frank or native, from the Divan of Cairo. Even the taxes were henceforth to be collected by Moslems, and the personal estates of the French in Egypt were made subject to the Moslem laws of inheritance.

On February 23, 1801—the Turks having entirely failed to dislodge the French from Egypt—an English fleet, bearing an army of 15,000 men, anchored in the Bay of Aboukir. This was still less than the number of the French army in Egypt (24,000 of whom were afterwards brought away from Egypt), who had also the advantage of being acclimatised. The English landed, in spite of General Friant and the 15,000 men who were posted to receive them, and made their way towards Alexandria. A severe action was fought a few days later, when the French had received their reinforcements, in which the English lost 1,100 men. In spite of this, they held their ground, and reinforcements were summoned in haste from Alexandria.

¹ Jacob, one of the principal Copts, who had held out in his own house against Nasif Pasha for three days, was charged with the collection of this fine. Gabbarti draws a moving picture of the poverty which the unfortunate Moslems were reduced to by this fresh exaction.

On their arrival under Menou another bloody battle was fought, and the French fell back on Alexandria, having lost 1,700 men. But the English had to mourn the loss of their general, Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who refused to pay any attention to his wound till the battle was over, when it was too late. He was succeeded by General Hutchinson, who on March 25 was reinforced by 6,000 Turks, among whom was the captain of an Albanian troop who became afterwards the ruler of Egypt, Mohammed Ali.

Events proceeded rapidly. On April 19 the French garrison of Rosetta surrendered to the Anglo-Turkish army and gave up their arms. Menou was shut up in Alexandria, which the English had isolated by cutting through the narrow ridge between the Bay of Aboukir and the bed of the ancient lake of Mareotis, which has remained a salt lake—or, rather, marsh—ever since. Rahmanieh was abandoned by the French, and exaggerated news of their losses caused a fresh panic in Cairo. On the other hand, the French published a proclamation to assure the inhabitants of Cairo that Menou was shortly returning in triumph; that many of the English were dying of dysentery, ophthalmia, hunger, and thirst; that some of them had deserted to the French; and that the latter had only withdrawn from Damietta to lure the English to their more complete destruction. The native Christians were this time prepared for the worst, and intended to sell their lives dearly. The Copt Jacob, who had fortified his house and held out against the Moslems during the three days' massacre of Nasif Pasha, now prepared to defend the whole quarter. For a long time he had occupied himself in training the Copts to resist any similar attack and to defend their lives and property. He recruited a large body of his countrymen, and drilled and armed them after the manner of the French. Most of these young men were recruited from Upper Egypt, and all responded to Jacob's appeal with the greatest alacrity. Jacob pulled down several of the lately ruined houses in the Christian quarter¹ and constructed with the material a strong wall, with towers, all round the quarter. At the two great gates he maintained regular sentinels, 'upright, with their arms over their shoulders, after the manner of the French,' says Gabbarti. Owing to the heroic efforts of Jacob, the Christians were spared the horrors of a fresh massacre on the reoccupation of the country by the Turks. But the ruined quarter was only useful as a fortress, and it was abandoned when the position of the Christians in the country was strong enough to enable them to do so. Jacob himself, indeed, did not dare to remain in his native land when it reverted to the

¹ This quarter was afterwards deserted by the Copts, and the present one built in what was then a suburb of Cairo. The old churches of Harat-el-Roum and Harat-el-Zawilah, with their surrounding precincts, are all that is left now of this old Coptic quarter.

Turks. He and many of his soldiers left Egypt with the French, and died in exile some years afterwards.

To add to the misery of the unfortunate town of Cairo, there was a frightful outbreak of plague, and in one month 500 of the French garrison died. In Upper Egypt it was still worse, and many towns were deserted. Murad Bey fell a victim to the plague at Beni-Souef, and Ibrahim Bey, a broken-down old man, voluntarily surrendered himself to General Hutchinson.

On June 10 the French issued a proclamation to Egypt in which the following words appear :—

Learn once for all that Egypt has become definitely a French possession. Get this idea well into your heads, and believe it as absolutely as you believe in the Unity of God.

Be not deceived by the invaders who approach ; they can do absolutely nothing. These English are Atheists and robbers ; they have no other object than to sow discord among the nations and excite them to hate one another.

On June 16 the combined force of the English, the Ottoman army, and various Mamelukes who had joined them, invested Cairo. On the 22nd, as they were on the point of making a general attack, the French general proposed a conference, during which hostilities were suspended. On the 26th the convention was signed by which the French army of Cairo agreed to evacuate that town and to leave Egypt by Rosetta. On July 10 the whole French army filed out, and the English took possession. General Hutchinson, however, whose instructions were not to conquer Egypt but to drive the French out of it, handed over Cairo to the Turks, and marched himself to Rosetta to superintend the embarkation of the French. Eleven hundred soldiers and 3,000 civilians were sent off from Rosetta, but a good many French soldiers deserted, having really become Moslems, and therefore desiring to remain in the country.

This division of the French army being disposed of, General Hutchinson next marched on Alexandria and besieged the rest of the French under Menou. They had had ample time to prepare, but apparently had not done so, for on August 29 they capitulated to the English, and on September 2 a convention was signed by which they were permitted to leave Egypt at once.

The English were inclined to insist on retaining the collections and drawings made by the members of the French Institute which Napoleon had established in Cairo, but yielded to the urgent representations made by the French savants, who had in vain appealed to Menou to exempt their scientific treasure from the treaty of capitulation. This Institute was indeed the one real triumph of the French invasion. All through the follies, intrigues, and disasters of this ill-fated expedition this little band of Frenchmen had worked and studied, had drawn, inquired, and collected; and the published results of their labours are still among the most valuable material for a study of Egyptian history. Of outward and visible signs of the French occupation of 1798–1801 there remain but a few windmills, for the most part falling into ruin, on the dust-hills of Cairo; a few inscriptions cut here and there on the rocks of the Nile, and a few cannon-shot still lodged in the shattered walls of some of the principal mosques.

It had not been contemplated that the expulsion of the French from Egypt would be so easily accomplished, and a body of 6,000 Indian troops under General Baird had been ordered to Egypt to share the expected campaign.

But though General Baird travelled swiftly across the country from Kosseir to Kenneh, and down the Nile through a curious but welcoming population, he arrived too late for any fighting. The Indians reached Cairo only just in time to see the French army march out of it, and remained for some weeks camped at Rhoda, before they sailed down the Nile to Rosetta.

The worst sufferers from the French invasion were, as usual, the native Christians. It is true that, in spite of their profession of Islam, the French soon realised the necessity of employing the Christian natives for offices of trust, and that they were permitted an equality with the Moslems, which filled the latter with profound disgust (Gabbarti cannot contain his wrath when he speaks of their being allowed to ride horses and to bear arms, like the Moslems), but in the struggles for the possession of Cairo which took place at the beginning of the end, and in the revolts which broke out against the French during the occupation, they were always the first to suffer; and by the end of the time their quarter was plundered and ruined beyond repair, so that those who survived were compelled to build a fresh one and a new cathedral after the French had gone.

The Egyptian Patriarch at the time of the French expedition was Mark VIII., and the following is a quotation from the Coptic record of his Patriarchate. We learn in the beginning that he was a native of Tammah, a monk of St. Anthony, and elected by the Heikeliet to the Patriarchate. On his accession his name was changed from John to Mark.

During his bishopric there were many afflictions and many adversities; and this chiefly—that two years after his coming to the Chair a multitude from the Frank countries, called the French, came and took possession of Egypt. The inhabitants of Cairo rose against them, and there was war between them for three days. Then the Patriarch changed his house from the Harat-el-Roum to the Ezbekieh. Then a Wuzir from Turkey came accompanied by certain English folk, and they drove out the French from Egypt. The people suffered very much at the hands of the French : many places were laid waste, and many of the churches made desolate. The Patriarch also suffered many adversities, for which cause he left Harat-el-Roum and came to the Ezbekieh, where he built a large precinct and a large church in the name of St. Mark the Evangelist. This is the first who inhabited the Ezbekieh. He was always repairing churches and monasteries which were in ruin ; and was ever awake to preach to the people, and to teach them night and day. Moreover, he consecrated many bishops. And when the Metropolitan of Abyssinia died, and certain monks and priests came with a letter from the King of Abyssinia asking a Metropolitan, Marcus consecrated for him one who went with the Abyssinian priests, and also sent to them books of sermons and of doctrines because he had heard that certain of them had become heretics.¹

The Greek Patriarch of Alexandria at the time of the French occupation was Parthenios, a native of Patmos, who probably fled from the country, as no indication of his presence in Egypt can be discovered. The Pope's Vicar in Egypt was Matthew Righet, but the Roman Catholics were no better off than the Greeks or the Copts during the French occupation of the country.

¹ From the translation by Mr. Butler.

CHAPTER XL

MOHAMMED ALI

A.D. 1802 THE Turks lost no time in offering up the usual holocaust
 A.M. 1518
 A.H. 1217 of blood which marks their accession or return to power in every country. Even before the departure of the English two massacres, one at Alexandria and another at Gizeh, still further reduced the number of Mameluke Beys. At Alexandria, indeed, the Turkish Pasha made use of General Hutchinson's name to induce the Beys to accept an invitation, which he well knew they would else refuse. Having embarked with them in a barge on pretext of a visit to the English general on his ship, he made some excuse to leave them in a small boat, and an attempt was made to murder the whole party. Fortunately the Mamelukes trusted the English good faith against the Turkish oaths. Seven of them were overpowered and slain, but the rest, though wounded, flung themselves into the sea and swam straight to the English vessels. 'The English,' says Gabbarti, 'were indignant. They entered Alexandria and drove out all the Turks. They shut the gates and manned the fortifications, and part of their army called upon the Turks to come out and fight. But they answered that they had no quarrel with the English, and remained in their tents.' He adds with evident astonishment and admiration that the English not only cared for the wounded Beys, but that they buried the slain with military honours, 'as if they had been English dignitaries.'

Nothing astonished the Egyptians so much as the moderation and good faith of the English. Gabbarti is unable to understand why, when the whole country was at their feet, they should have left it to the Sultan instead of taking it forthwith. He records a discussion which the Moslems held on this subject, and decides that it must have been the special favour of God for the Moslem faith which caused him to blind the English to their own self-interest and neglect such an obvious opportunity. In particular the unfortunate Christians suffered horribly. Turkish troops were quartered upon them, who plundered and outraged them at their leisure. Three of the principal Copts were put to death by the Pasha, probably because they had assisted the French against the Turks, since no reason is stated. All their property was confiscated, and a little later Moallem Malati, the Copt who had filled the office of judge under the French, was also beheaded. All those who could took flight from Cairo and went into hiding. Again and again enormous sums were demanded from the half-ruined community as fines or ransom. After the departure of the English matters became much worse. Page after page of Gabbarti is full of detailed statements of the tyranny of the Turks and the atrocities which their soldiery committed with impunity. Six weeks after the English left the country, in May 1803, a violent revolt broke out, which drove the new Turkish Pasha, a young Georgian freedman named Khosref, from Cairo; and Tahir Pasha, who had informally succeeded him, was murdered twenty-two days later.

It was at this juncture that Mohammed Ali came to the front. This remarkable man was a native of Roumelia, the ancient Macedonia, and one of the many striking facts about him is that, though free-born, he became supreme in a country where none but slaves had ruled for centuries. He had distinguished himself already in battle, and his Albanian troops, also men of Macedonia, were devoted to him all his life. Already he perceived that the road to sovereignty lay before him, and he began by allying himself with the remaining Mamelukes, who were at least less detested than the Turks. With their aid he seized Damietta and took Khosref prisoner. A new Pasha, Ali Pasha Gazailli, was sent by the Porte, but in 1804 was banished by the Mameluke party, and slain on his retreat into Syria. In the same year a Mameluke Bey surnamed Elfi, who had been on a visit to England, returned to Egypt; but, as he at once put himself at the head of a party against Mohammed Ali, that general attacked him without waiting for the opposition to assume dangerous proportions, and Elfi Bey barely escaped with his life to the protection of a Bedouin chief. On this the English Consul demanded an interview with Ibrahim Bey and Osman-el-Bardissi, and declared he would no longer remain in a country governed by men who could conduct themselves in such a manner. He solemnly withdrew from Egypt, and the French Consul proposed to do the same, but was persuaded to remain. Immediately afterwards Mohammed Ali inflicted a fine of 200,000 dollars on the Egyptian Christians, in order to obtain money to pay his troops. Fifty thousand were to be paid by Moallem Ghali, the chief steward of Elfi Bey, who was a Roman Catholic Copt; 30,000 by the inheritors of Victor, the steward of El Bardissi, who had just died; and the rest by the Copts of the National Church.

After this, Mohammed Ali, with whom no consideration of honour ever for a moment outweighed those of self-interest, suddenly surrounded and attacked the house of his principal Mameluke ally, Osman-el-Bardissi Bey, who had been the Circassian slave of Murad Bey. El Bardissi fought his way out with his Mamelukes, and escaped by the desert under cover of the dark. Still too wary to assume openly the supreme power, Mohammed Ali sent for an Ottoman officer, Ahmed Pasha Kurshid, Governor of Alexandria, and caused him to be appointed Pasha of Egypt. Upon him fell all the odium of extracting money for necessary purposes from the ruined country, while Mohammed Ali posed as the friend of the people and blamed his tyrannous exactions.

On May 14, 1805, all his plans being carefully prepared, a popular revolt broke out in favour of Mohammed Ali. All the Sheikhs immediately waited upon the latter, and implored him to assume the government. Mohammed Ali affected unwillingness, but complied; and a message was sent to inform Kurshid Pasha that he was deposed. Unlike most Turkish Pashas in such circumstances, Kurshid Pasha showed an unexpected firmness. He answered that he held his commission from the Sultan, and would not resign it at the dictation of his inferiors. He provisioned the citadel and prepared to defend himself.

But Mohammed Ali had laid his plans too well. Turkey was far off, and all Egypt was on his side. He dragged cannon up the Mokattam hills to command the citadel, while he prepared for a regular siege. Both parties sent off their own version of the affair to Constantinople, and meantime the Mokattam bombarded the citadel and the citadel bombarded the town. The siege continued to July 9, when the answers arrived from the Ottoman Sultan. Kurshid Pasha was ordered to Constantinople, and Mohammed Ali was temporarily appointed Pasha of Egypt, having shortly before been made Pasha of Jeddah. He had not yet reached the height of his ambition, and he knew well the need of caution as well as of courage. Unfortunately his measures of precaution, like those of most Orientals, generally meant treachery and assassination. The two chief Mameluke Beys, El Elfi and El Bardissi, were still at large, and forming dangerous alliances with the wild Bedouin tribes.

Mohammed Ali caused one of his tools to write to the Mameluke chiefs, offering in return for an enormous bribe to admit them into the city on a day when Mohammed Ali and his followers would be outside the walls, attending the ceremony of the cutting of the Kalig. To escape his observation they were to make a circuit of the city, and enter by the Bab-el-Nasr. This would oblige them to make their way to the citadel, right through Cairo, by the tortuous lane which had not yet been superseded by the Mohammed Ali Street.

The offer was accepted, and a very large body of the principal Mamelukes fell into the trap. Mohammed Ali had posted an ambuscade of his faithful Albanians in readiness, and no sooner were the Mamelukes entangled in the narrow lanes than they were surrounded and shot down without mercy.

Some of the principal leaders surrendered on condition that their lives were spared; but the following morning they were all massacred except two or three, who paid heavy ransoms for what proved to be only a temporary respite from murder. Mohammed Ali now sent for his family to Egypt, and prepared to take root in that country. During the next two years he successfully baffled all the attempts of the Porte to dislodge him, obtaining even, by dint of veiled threats and open bribes, a firman confirming him in his appointment.

In 1806 Osman-el-Bardissi and El Elfi, neither of whom had been his victims in the first massacre, died natural deaths; and though the English made an expedition to Egypt in 1807, which seriously threatened his newly-acquired sovereignty, they came more to reconnoitre than for any other reason; and finding a strong man in power, who might be trusted to keep both the Mamelukes and the Turks in order, they retreated after a few months' occupation of Alexandria.

From this time until 1848, when, owing to the increasing failure of his mental faculties, the government devolved upon his son, Mohammed Ali not only ruled but possessed Egypt; for in 1808-10 he successfully accomplished a repetition of the tremendous acts of spoliation for which Sulieman II., son of the first Ottoman conqueror, had given him a precedent. By one means or another, in great measure by the deliberate confiscation and suppression of title-deeds, he possessed himself of almost the whole of the land in Egypt, and declared that henceforth he was the sole owner of the soil, and all rights of possession or tenancy must be held from him. From every class in every town and province of Egypt came a passionate outcry against this wholesale robbery, but Mohammed Ali, with his terrible army of Arnouts at his back, stood firm; and the unarmed population of Egypt submitted, as usual, to a tyranny which they were powerless to resist.¹ Still, however, there remained in the country a sufficient number of the old Mamelukes to make Mohammed Ali feel that he was not yet absolute lord of everything and everybody in Egypt, and he resolved to sweep them also from his path.

In February 1811 he ordered an assembly of all the troops to witness the departure of his son Toussoun Pasha, who with 4,000 men was about to proceed to Arabia against the Wahabi reformers in that country. It was arranged that he was to go up in state to the citadel to receive the garment of investiture which marked his assumption of the command, and a grand military procession was formed to accompany him. A reception was held by Mohammed Ali in the great hall, afterwards pulled down to make room for his mosque, and coffee was served as usual. When this was over, the procession was re-formed to go down the steep narrow lane leading to the Bab-el-Azab, which has since been superseded by a broad macadamised ascent. The Mameluke band was last but one in the procession, between a corps of Albanians and one of the regular troops, who had received their instructions. When all the army before the Albanians had passed out, the gates were suddenly shut, and the Albanians, turning upon the Mamelukes, began cutting them down, while the regular troops poured volley after volley from their guns into the devoted band. Except two or three Frenchmen who had turned Moslems and Mamelukes, and who had been on different pretexts prevented from taking part in the procession, not one escaped.

¹ A great deal of this stolen property was granted to the Turkish followers of Mohammed Ali, but much of it remained to his descendants. The Domains and the Daira Sanieh estates formed part of the land thus stolen from the Egyptian peasantry.

Four hundred and sixty bodies lay, half-naked, choking up the narrow lanes, and the only Egyptian Mameluke who escaped had been shut outside the gate by accident.¹

Nor were these the only victims. The order was sent through all the land that the Mamelukes were to be caught and killed wherever found, and within a few days more than a thousand of them had been massacred. In Cairo their houses were pillaged and their women outraged by the soldiery, who had thus been let loose upon them. From this time the name of Mameluke has scarcely been heard in Egypt.²

Mohammed Ali was too wary and far-seeing to allow the part of the Mamelukes to be re-enacted over again by his own Albanians. After an arduous but eventually successful campaign against the Wahabis, the Albanians showed signs of giving trouble. Their leaders were promptly arrested and exiled from the country, but allowed to take with them the spoils they had acquired. Mohammed Ali reconstituted his army on the European model, and it was officered to a great extent by Frenchmen, ¹ There is a tradition that one other escaped by leaping his horse down the sheer wall from the top.

² A certain number escaped southwards. Of these, some probably became slave traders in the Soudan; others seized villages in Egypt, and turned them into strongholds of brigands. In 1812 a band of Mamelukes pillaged Deyr-el-Abia^h and burnt 100 parchments, the remains of the ancient library of the convent. But 90 per cent. of the Mamelukes in Egypt died a violent death before they were thirty-five, even when Mameluke rule was supreme in Egypt. Their property, houses, wives, and slaves, if not annexed by the murderer, went to the State, and were all sold for the benefit of the Treasury. Those few descendants of the Mamelukes who lived respectable lives were nicknamed Abdullawi, or Good-for-nothing, and soon became indistinguishable from the Moslem Egyptians.

some of whom had become Moslems. Mohammed Ali was a man of commanding power and ability, absolutely without the restraint of any religious scruple or principle. The aim of his life was to make himself master of Egypt, and he allowed nothing to stand in the way of this absorbing passion. He wished to be a good master, and to do his best for the country on which he had set his foot; and in this he differed from the many Moslem tyrants who had preceded him in Egypt, but no one of them all had succeeded in establishing so absolute a tyranny. He professed Islam, as so many of the greatest tyrants of the world have professed Christianity, because it was the natural and politic thing for him to do, but he was wholly untrammelled by faith in any religion. If a man, or a whole race of men, stood in his way, they were simply swept out of it—by treachery or open attack, as might seem most expedient at the time. He chose the best men for his purposes, with entire disregard of their faith, nationality, or family. Thus he surrounded himself with Europeans and Christians, because he perceived that they were invariably more intelligent, better educated, more energetic, and as a general rule more trustworthy than the Mohammedans. He abrogated all the laws against them, and severely punished any outbreak of fanaticism. At the same time he invariably chose, if possible, Armenian, Roman Catholic, or other European Christians, since he perceived the possible future danger of allowing the Copts of the National Church to obtain any preponderance of influence in the country which they never forgot was their own by inheritance. His real Minister of Finance, though not with that title, was that Moallem Ghali who had been secretary and steward to Elfi Bey, and had his house sacked and plundered in consequence. But Mohammed Ali constantly listened to false accusations against Ghali for the sake of the money which could be thus extracted from him, and in 1821 he coolly issued an order for his murder. Some say that Moallem Ghali had incurred his displeasure by furnishing the Sultan with a truthful report on the finances of Egypt; some that his crime was a remonstrance when ordered to obtain forced and illegal contributions from certain villages in Lower Egypt; but, by whatever means, he made it Mohammed Ali's interest to get rid of him, and he was murdered accordingly in the presence of Ibrahim Pasha and Tobia Bey, Ghali's own son, without any pretence of a trial or any formal accusation.

His Minister for Foreign Affairs was Boghos Bey, an Armenian Christian, who was afterwards succeeded by Artin, of the same nationality. His navy, no less than his army, was trained and officered by Frenchmen. The English being the only Power whom Mohammed Ali really feared, he employed them as little as possible; but he was compelled to send to England for many of his civil engineers.

Having crushed the Wahabis in Arabia and established his power on an unassailable basis in Egypt, Mohammed Ali next turned his attention to the Soudan. Since the downfall of the Christian kingdoms in the latter half of the fifteenth century, there had been no settled government in the great district lying between Wady Halfa and the north-western frontier of Abyssinia. The petty Kings of Senaar, negro by race and Moslem by religion, had claimed a nominal authority over Nubia since early in the sixteenth century; but, as a matter of fact, the Soudan was in the hands of a group of Arab slave traders who lived by the wholesale robbery and plunder of a dependent population, among whom the traces of Christianity were few and far between. Mohammed Ali, though without religion himself, knew well its value as a political engine, and sanctified his projected expedition in the eyes of his Moslem subjects by sending with the troops three Ulemas, with special instructions not only to prevail upon the Soudanese to profess Islam, which a large proportion of them did already, but to acknowledge that unquestioned obedience in temporal as well as in spiritual matters was undoubtedly due to the Kaliph.

In June 1820 a flotilla of 3,000 boats left Cairo on this expedition to the Soudan, under Ismail Pasha, a son of Mohammed Ali, while a force of cavalry was despatched by land to join them at Assuan. The expedition penetrated with little difficulty to Dongola, Berber, Shendy, and finally to Senaar, where they found remains of the ancient civilisation planted there by Egyptian Christians¹ as far as certain arts and manufactures were concerned.

Arriving at Senaar during the usual Oriental quarrel between two brothers for the succession to the crown, the Roumelian invader had little difficulty in disposing of both claimants. A deposed king was withdrawn from prison and replaced on the throne as a vassal of Mohammed Ali, and thus the annexation of the Soudan was accomplished. It remained nominally a part of the Egyptian dominions until 1886, but was never a peaceful or profitable possession, though under good government it could easily have been made one. But the fate of the successful invading general, Ismail Pasha, showed how little real hold the power of Egypt had on the Soudanese. On his return march Ismail Pasha, by his exactions and insults, so offended the native ruler of Shendy that the latter determined to get rid of him. He surrounded the dwelling in which Ismail Pasha and his servants were asleep, and burned it to the ground. Not one of the inmates escaped.

¹ It is popularly supposed that the ancient Christian Church had become extinct in the Soudan long before this century; but, though in great misery and secrecy, a remnant of the faithful endured still in certain districts down to our own times. When Gordon went to Khartoum in 1885, there was still a native Christian bishop of the Egyptian Church in Khartoum who had seven churches in his diocese and a convent of nuns. He brought the latter down in safety to Cairo before Khartoum fell, and has since lived in retirement; but what has become of his churches and their congregations under the Mahdi is yet unknown. (Note in 1897: the Bishop of Khartoum died this spring.)

The increasing weakness of Turkey and her occupation with the affairs of Greece rendered the Sultan incapable of interfering with his too powerful vassal in Egypt. Greece, after a slavery which had lasted well-nigh as long as that of the Egyptians, now set them an example of rising to recover her national freedom—an example which they have not yet ventured to follow.¹ Mohammed Ali readily found occupation for the greater part of his troops by sending them to assist the Sultan in his wars, and occupied himself with the development of Egypt, which he had reduced to the position of his personal estate, and was therefore naturally desirous to improve. His genius was great, and, in spite of the terrible blunders which his ignorance led him to commit, the material prosperity of Egypt was much improved during his reign. He reintroduced the cultivation of cotton, and revived other industries which had died out under the blighting rule of the Turks. He dug new canals—notably the Mahmoudieh of Alexandria—and established hospitals and medical schools under French instruction. At the same time he wasted enormous sums in the endeavour to establish unprofitable manufactories, and pulled down ancient Egyptian temples all over the country to build factories, which in some cases were never even used. He made the roads of Egypt safe, and the towns for the first time for many centuries were put under regular and more or less efficient police protection and supervision. Owing to him, the trade and mail routes were once more resumed across Egypt to India and the other countries of the East. Moreover, he set up a printing-press on a large scale at Boulac, which published translations into Arabic of European books at very low prices, in order to further the spread of knowledge among the Egyptians.

¹ Arabi Pasha, though he managed to impose on many English people, was only a military adventurer of the type which has been unfortunately common in Egypt for the last thousand years. His success would have been the greatest possible misfortune to the country. There has been no great national rising in Egypt since the ninth century.

With all this Mohammed Ali kept steadily before him his great aim—absolute independence in name as well as in reality, and in 1831 he considered that the time for action was come. The Porte was exhausted by the risings in Servia, Bosnia, and Greece—backed as they were by France, England, and Russia—and Mohammed Ali seized upon some flimsy pretext for invading Syria.

Gaza and Jaffa were taken without resistance. Acre, after a gallant defence of six months, surrendered on May 27, 1832; and Ibrahim Pasha, who commanded the invading army, marched on Damascus, fought a pitched battle with a Turkish army which the Pasha of Tripoli led against him, and gained a complete victory. All Syria lay at his feet, but he did not pause in his victorious career. In December 1832, 30,000 Egyptians under Ibrahim put 60,000 Turks to flight at Konieh, and only the intervention of the Powers, who did not wish to see a new and stronger Moslem Empire rise upon the ruins of the old, stopped the advance of the victorious army on Constantinople. Under pressure, therefore, the Sultan concluded a peace with Mohammed Ali, confirming him in the government of Syria, and giving Ibrahim the additional office of Collector of the Revenues in Adana.

The government of Syria was reorganised on much the same lines as that of Egypt had been.¹ Absolute toleration was enforced for Druses, Maronites, and all sects of Christians. The men best fitted for Mohammed Ali's work were employed, irrespective of nationality or religion. The Jews only, though not openly persecuted, were not freed from their disabilities or defended from private acts of oppression.

In 1834 a rising of some of the mountain communities of Syria, which was repressed by Mohammed Ali in person, afforded the discontented Moslems an excuse for terrible atrocities against the Jews; and the Christians of Nazareth, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem would have shared the same fate had they not defended themselves until help came from Egypt.

In 1835 cholera raged in Egypt for several months with terrible effect. A French physician, Clot Bey, who gave his name to one of Mohammed Ali's new streets in Cairo, excited the warm admiration of the Pasha by his heroic conduct on this occasion.

¹ It is said that the Moslems of Damascus complained to Ibrahim Pasha that the insolence of the Christians was becoming so great that they even appeared in the streets on horseback. Ibrahim coolly advised the malcontents to ride camels, if they wished to be mounted in a superior manner to the Christians.

Among the many European visitors for whom Egypt was a far safer and pleasanter residence than for the Egyptians came the well-known scholar Mr. Lane, whose book on the Modern Egyptians, though it would have been with more truth entitled Modern Cairenes, should still be read by everyone. It is, however, only valuable for knowledge of the Moslems, among whom he lived from 1825-28, and again from 1833-35. As he identified himself entirely with them, the Copts not unnaturally looked upon him with suspicion; and with the exception of one man who seems to have tried to win his favour by abuse of his own countrymen, Mr. Lane was unable even to obtain speech with them. It is scarcely wonderful therefore that he managed to procure but little information about them, and that for the most part inaccurate.

In 1838-39 Mohammed went on a visit of personal inspection to the Soudan, principally with a desire to ascertain the truth about the reported gold mines, and during his absence Sultan Mahmoud thought it a favourable opportunity to make war upon him. The English Ambassador, Viscount Ponsonby, in vain represented to him the suicidal folly of such a proceeding; the Sultan rushed on his own destruction. A battle fought at Nezib in June 1839, left the Turks totally defeated, but Sultan Mahmoud died before the news reached him. His son Abd-el-Hamid was proclaimed at Constantinople, and on the same day the Turkish fleet, commanded by Ferzi Pasha, after dressing the ships and firing salutes in honour of their new sovereign, set sail for Alexandria, where the treacherous admiral had covenanted to deliver the fleet bodily into the hands of Mohammed Ali. Captain Walker, a British officer attached to the Ottoman fleet, was, of course, kept completely in the dark; and when on their arrival at Alexandria they were received as friends by Mohammed Ali, he refused to return on board the Turkish fleet, and declared his intention of going back alone to Constantinople.

Mohammed Ali, however, had now to reckon with a more formidable obstacle to his plans than any he had yet encountered—the opposition of the Great Powers, and particularly of England.

To give all the reasons which influenced the European Powers in their decision would need too lengthy a digression, but it is very evident that Mohammed Ali, restricted to his allotted task of governing Egypt and the Soudan, was likely to do some real good; while Mohammed Ali, flushed with the dream of universal conquest, and over-running country after country with troops little better than the Turkish savages, could do nothing but harm. The Allied Cabinets therefore, having resolved to put a stop to his further proceedings, agreed on the course to be adopted; and the British Government despatched Colonel Hodges from Servia to intimate their decision to Mohammed Ali.

Towards the close of 1839 Colonel Hodges landed in Alexandria, but it was not until all courteous hints and suggestions had been tried, without effect, that, in January 1840, Mohammed Ali was plainly told by the English representative that his continued projects of ambition could not be sanctioned or permitted. If he would undertake to confine himself to Africa, no objection would be made to his building up as magnificent an empire as he pleased; but as far as Europe or Asia were concerned he could not be permitted to establish himself in either.

Mohammed Ali, like so many Orientals before and since, did not recognise the language of command under the guise of a courteous intimation. He refused to believe that England was in earnest, and talked about his 'rights,' thus drawing upon himself a stern reminder from the British Government that he had no 'rights,' except those derived from the Sultan and the consent of the Powers, which might be at any moment withdrawn. All representations proving useless, however, Colonel Hodges ceased in March to hold any communications with Mohammed Ali, and on July 15, 1840, a convention was signed by England, Austria, Russia, Prussia, and the Porte. That part of it which referred to Egypt provided that Mohammed Ali should be offered the hereditary Pashality of Egypt, guaranteed by the Powers, and should further be permitted to retain possession for his life of Acre and Southern Syria. But if these terms were not accepted, within ten days from the date of communication, by Mohammed Ali, the offer of Acre and Syria would be withdrawn; after twenty days he would be considered to have forfeited all right to the government of Egypt or Syria.

In August 1840 the Commissioner of the Porte, Rifaat Pasha, was received in audience by Mohammed Ali, and communicated to him this ultimatum, and on the following day the Consuls of the four Powers waited upon him to signify their concurrence in the terms proposed. But Mohammed Ali trusted in France to help him, and, though he did not in so many words refuse the terms, he prevaricated and delayed, wishing to gain time; and when at the end of twenty days he was asked for his formal decision he asked for more time, and could not believe that the Powers would really do what they had said. He was soon undeceived. Before the end of the year all Syria was in the hands of the Ottoman troops, with Sir Charles Smith as general in command. The ships of England, Austria, and Turkey blockaded the Syrian and Egyptian coasts, and France abstained from the interference which Mahommed Ali considered she had given him a right to expect. On November 21 Commodore Napier arrived at Alexandria, and shortly after sent a severe official letter to Mohammed Ali, in which he clearly intimated that the Pasha would yet be allowed to retain Egypt if he made his submission without delay. Mohammed Ali understood better now what such hints from the English might mean ; and he gladly signed a preliminary agreement drawn up by Napier and the Consul on November 27, by which he agreed to restore the Turkish fleet and to evacuate Syria, on an implied condition that the English would ensure his retaining the government of Egypt. Neither the Porte, nor the English admiral, nor Sir Charles Smith was pleased with this agreement, and they complained with some justice that Napier had exceeded his instructions. But the English Government was satisfied, and the convention was ultimately carried out. On February 4, 1841, Mohammed Ali, having withdrawn from Syria, Arabia, and Candia, was formally confirmed by the Porte in the hereditary government of Egypt, and during the fifty-six years that have elapsed since that date Egypt has been ruled by the descendants of the daring and able Macedonian adventurer.¹

Mohammed Ali himself survived the shock of these events seven years, but for more than twelve months before his death he was incapable of governing. His good fortune seemed in great measure to have deserted him after the year 1840. In 1843 Egypt was visited by a terrible outbreak of cattle-plague. It became almost impossible to obtain draught-animals for the most necessary agricultural operations, though the horses of the army were pressed into the service. In some cases a camel would be seen yoked to the plough with an ass. In many villages the peasants harnessed themselves to the plough, for in the same year the flood had lasted longer than usual, and less time was left to prepare the ground. In all, about 200,000 oxen were said to have perished. Next year was marked by a plague of locusts, and cholera also raged during the winter and spring.

¹ During the whole of these events Mohammed Ali permitted the overland route to India across Egypt to be worked as usual, and this act of far-seeing policy did him great good with the English. The Bombay merchants struck a medal in his honour, with a laudatory inscription.

The Soudan was far from being the better for its annexation to Egypt. Ahmed Pasha, whom Mohammed Ali had appointed governor, was simply a slave dealer on a gigantic scale, with the support of a regular army and a powerful over-lord at his back. Mohammed Ali cannot, however, be charged with complicity in his worst outrages, since only carefully revised reports were sent to him, and the Governor of the Soudan opened every European letter that arrived at Khartoum and burned most of them. The accounts of Ahmed Pasha's slave raids on the unfortunate natives of the outlying provinces would be incredible, if they were not attested by impartial European travellers.

From all these causes, but chiefly from the enormous number of public works which were carried on by the forced labour of the unfortunate peasants, the population of Egypt became yearly more and more impoverished; and the terrible state of misery and indebtedness to which it was reduced, whilst money was squandered on useless factories or European-built palaces and houses in one or two of the principal towns, came with a sudden shock upon Mohammed Ali when at length his Christian officials in desperation laid the truth before him. The crisis was successfully weathered for the time, but Mohammed Ali was never quite the same man afterwards. In 1846 he received an invitation to go and pay his respects to the Sultan at Constantinople, and this, of course, meant enormous expenditure in bribes and presents to the Sultan and his officials.

The last project of his life was the Barrage, which, though due in original conception to the genius of a Frenchman, waited nearly fifty years before the genius of an Englishman found the way to make it work. The foundation stone was laid by Mohammed Ali in 1847 with great state and ceremony. Towards the end of this year the health both of Mohammed Ali and of his son Ibrahim Pasha gave way. By June 1848, Mohammed Ali was an imbecile, and the government devolved upon the dying Ibrahim. Father and son passed away within a year of each other—Ibrahim dying in November 1849, and his once great father, almost unnoticed, in August of the same year.

But Mohammed Ali had laid the foundations of his family too securely for death or even imbecility to have the usual effect in Oriental countries, and Abbas, grandson of Mohammed Ali, succeeded his uncle Ibrahim without a dissentient voice.

CHAPTER XLI

THE ENGLISH OCCUPATION

A.D. 1854
 A.M. 1570
 A.H. 1270

THE history of the last fifty years in Egypt has been so well and so often written that only a short chapter will be necessary here to bring the thread of history down to the occupation of the country by the English. Abbas Pasha was the son of Toussoun Pasha, and, fortunately for Egypt, his reign did not last more than six years. His influence was entirely retrograde, and his private character was bad. He was strangled in his own harem in the year 1854.¹

Said Pasha, who succeeded him, was the son of Mohammed Ali, and like him in many ways. Both under Said and under his more brilliant and unscrupulous successor Ismail, the development and at the same time the impoverishment of Egypt went steadily on—for, with true Oriental instinct, they began at the wrong end; nor had either of them any real attachment to the Egyptian proper, whether Christian or Moslem, or any desire to benefit the poorer classes. Forced labour was habitually demanded from them for the costly works which excited the admiration of the Europeans; and the taxes reached such a point that the whole agricultural population became in debt to the Greek money-lenders, who advanced the money necessary to satisfy the demands of the Government.

¹ His cruelty in the harem was exceptional. With his own hand he sewed up the mouth of a female slave whom he found smoking, and left her to starve slowly to death.

To Said Pasha, however, is due the credit of having, under French guidance, interested himself in the wonderful records of a long-past civilisation with which the ruined country of Egypt was strewn. Mohammed Ali had pulled down the ancient temples for building material, or turned them into powder magazines. Said founded the museum at Boulac, and carried on excavations at Tanis, Sais, Themis, Kynopolis, Bubastis, Athribis, Heliopolis, Memphis, Sakhara, Abydos, Dendera, Thebes, and Edfu. In his reign also the railway was made from Alexandria to Cairo, and from Cairo to Suez. The misgovernment of the Soudan continued, and the slave trade was carried on briskly throughout Egypt. All through the reigns of Said and Ismail, Europeans—principally Greeks, Italians, and French—poured into the country. It was they who really benefited by the exploitation of Egypt; for the Egyptians little or nothing was done. The Copts were still permitted to enjoy the freedom and toleration which had been accorded to them by Mohammed Ali, and were put on a level with the Moslems in another respect, which they did not greatly appreciate. Ever since the Arab conquest in 642 no Christian Egyptian had been allowed by their Moslem rulers to bear arms; and after the suppression of the last great Coptic revolt in the ninth century it had become almost impossible for any Copt to obtain them. The special taxes which they paid, not to speak of the irregular oppressions and exactions, supplied the fighting bands of alien soldiers with the sinews of war ; but no Copt was ever permitted to enlist in the various armies of occupation, and it may be safely affirmed that none of them wished to do so. The fighting spirit of their ancestors was not, perhaps, entirely extinct, as Jacob had shown ; but there is not as much of it among the Copts as one would wish to see. Still, it is grossly unfair to conclude, as Englishmen have often done, that sheer cowardice is at the bottom of the Copt's desire to escape military service under his Moslem masters. In the first place, he can never feel sure that he will not be called upon to turn his arms against his own nation and co-religionists ; for the Moslem armies of Egypt have always been far more often employed in ill-treating the unarmed native Christians than in fair fighting against a common enemy. And when Said Pasha declared that henceforth all Egyptians, without distinction of religion, should be liable to military conscription, the decree was used as an instrument of persecution against the Christians. In Assiut all the males in some of the Christian houses were seized, not one being left to support the women and children. Once in the army, they were exposed to a regular system of bullying and persecution, in order to force them to change their religion. They had no hope of promotion, any more than they have now in the new Egyptian army.¹ So great was the misery inflicted on the Copts by Said Pasha's decree that the Coptic Patriarch—Cyril the Reformer—appealed to the English,²

¹ Though most of the English officers are unaware of the fact, it seems to be thoroughly understood among the natives that, whatever means it may be necessary to employ, no Copt is to be promoted beyond a certain grade.

² Sabbatier, the French Consul-General, had offered to use French influence to help the Copts, if the Patriarch would issue an order and pressure was put upon Said, not by the English Government, but by certain Englishmen whom the Pasha feared to displease; so that the Copts were once more exempted from military service. But the affair was not forgotten against the Patriarch, and for this and other attempts to help his people he was poisoned by order of the Government. Hundreds of Copts belonging to the National Church were dismissed from Government service. Abbas had suppressed most of the schools established by Mohammed Ali; Said took the pupils from those that were left, for his army; and the library which Mohammed Ali had begun to collect was ruined and thrown away.

Said died in 1863, and was succeeded by his nephew Ismail, the son of Ibrahim Pasha. To him chiefly Egypt owes the crushing load of unprofitable debt which would have long ago ruined any country less richly endowed by Nature, and which brought even Egypt to the verge of bankruptcy. Ismail Pasha had the same passionate desire for self-aggrandisement which characterised his ancestors, and was as little troubled with scruples of any kind. Incidentally his pursuit of fame and luxury gave much to Egypt: additional railways and canals, post and telegraph system, schools, and security for life and property—except when murder or robbery happened to be for his own individual self-interest. Almost his greatest personal expense was his harem, which amounted to nearly 1,000 women in different palaces built with borrowed money for their occupation.¹ admitting Jesuits to settle in Abyssinia. Cyril knew what this meant, and refused to purchase safety for his Egyptians at such a price.

¹ These unfortunate women would most of them have starved when Ismail was dismissed from Egypt, if it had not been for the charity of Tewfik.

The American war brought a few years of feverish prosperity to Egypt. The demand for Egyptian cotton was almost unlimited during these years, and the growers received prices which they fondly imagined were going to last for ever; but in the end many of them were ruined, and many more were left hopelessly in the power of the Greek usurer.

The most splendid, the most costly, and (to the Egyptians) the least useful achievement of Ismail's reign was the Suez Canal. It was a great French triumph, a great English convenience; but for the Egyptians it has been a doubtful benefit, purchased at the cost of thousands of lives. Ismail not only squeezed the last farthing out of the wretched peasantry, he borrowed in every country which he could get to lend him money; and when it became evident that, unless strong measures were taken, neither principal nor interest would be forthcoming, the bondholders worked on the great Powers of Europe to interfere. Various expedients of financial control were tried, but Ismail proved incorrigible.

It was the great German Chancellor who eventually took the initiative. Decisions were given in the International Tribunals¹ in favour of the German Government, which claimed certain sums from Egypt. Ismail ignored the decisions and refused to pay the money. Bismarck proposed to make this the excuse for Ismail's dismissal, and neither France nor England chose to interfere, while Turkey was powerless to do so. The intimation was given on June 19, 1879, and after a stifling khamzin week, during which the European residents waited in suspense, the news spread in Cairo that Ismail had yielded. On the 26th the fallen ruler descended after a formal abdication from the citadel, and Tewfik reigned in his stead.¹

¹ These courts are one of the real benefits conferred on Egypt in Ismail's reign. The credit of their establishment is chiefly due to the well-known Christian Prime Minister, Nubar Pasha.

Tewfik is a unique character among the Moslems of various dynasties who have ruled in Egypt. He was habitually misunderstood during his life, and even since his death but scant justice has been done to him. Both the Europeans and his own people found it difficult to believe in anyone so unlike the usual product of his surroundings and education. His self-restraint was taken for stupidity; his hesitation to strike sharply in defence of his personal interest or safety was taken for weakness; his sincere endeavour to work well with the conflicting elements around him for the good of his country sometimes laid him open to the charge of insincerity. He was a good Moslem, yet he was entirely free from the intolerance of all other religions which has become a part of the Moslem creed; and he risked unpopularity with his co-religionists to put down the doseh and other popular abuses of the Moslem religion. He was devoted to his one wife, in whom he found a companion and helpmeet; yet he showed pity on the hundreds of unfortunate women whom his father abandoned, and did his best for them. When his father sent for him on the morning of June 26th, he, in common with his whole household, believed that he was to be poisoned, in order to remove the nominee of the Powers from his father's path. His wife entreated him with tears to escape while there was yet time, instead of going to his death; she even, it is said, ran away with his clothes, in order to render his going out impossible. But, whenever Tewfik had no doubt about his duty, there was no hesitation in his movements. Years later he quietly refused the invitation of the English admiral to seek safety on board an English ship (in 1882), though he knew that he could not depend on a single man of those who were left with him, and expected all that day to be assassinated at any moment by his mutinous soldiers. During the terrible days which followed the bombardment of Alexandria, Tewfik drove almost alone through the streets, trying to restore confidence and order among the panic-stricken. It was only due to his chance recognition by a young Englishman whose father was in the Egyptian service, and who sprang forward just in time to stop the firing of a cannon, that he escaped with his life even then. It was his untimely death in 1892 that rendered the abandonment of the country by the English morally impossible. Rarely has a greater contrast been presented between two state funerals than between these two, which followed each other in the same country at so short an interval—the funerals of Tewfik and his father. The former, as we all know, was entirely unexpected; there was scarcely time to issue the necessary orders for a state ceremonial. But, on that one occasion only, this strange mingling of nations and religions which we call the Egyptian people was moved by a common sentiment of sorrow. The crowd lined all the streets, dense and silent; if a boy's voice was heard, it was hushed by one consent till the procession drew near, when a universal sound of sorrow ran like an electrical thrill through the waiting masses. Everyone was there; not only the officials but the merchants had hurried from their offices, the sailors from their boats, to join the national mourning. Some of the English who sadly watched the plainly covered bier borne above the dense crowd had seen all that there was to see of official and religious processions for a long series of years in Egypt, and had thought that nothing could sober or touch the chattering, indifferent Cairenes. They learned their mistake that day.

¹ Tewfik was not the heir according to the old Moslem law, which makes the eldest male of a family succeed. Ismail had bribed the Porte to allow the Viceroyalty of Egypt to descend to his eldest son, with whom nevertheless he was always on bad terms.

When Ismail died and the news came that he was coming back to be buried, the consternation among a large proportion of the natives was ludicrous. To begin with, they refused to believe that he was dead, and openly lamented that the English were so easily imposed upon. 'You said he should not come back for the rest of his life' was the burden of their remarks; 'then, of course, he dies—to come back with his own funeral. What is easier? Have you sent English doctors to open the coffin before it is landed and make sure that Ismail is inside? No. Then you will see what will happen. Ismail is coming back with his own funeral, and when he is once in the country he will seize it again; and then what shall we do?'

Everyone knew what was going to happen, and all who could do so kept away from the state funeral. Even those who were compelled to attend slipped away at different points along the route, and by the time the procession entered Mohammed Ali Street it was a mere disorderly rabble of chattering followers, who were manifestly either indifferent or hostile in feeling. He was hastily deposited in the unfinished mosque of Rifaiyeh, and the whole country rejoiced to believe that his body was really there and his power of doing mischief at an end.

On the other hand, it was partly the virtues of Tewfik which endangered his throne. The rebel Arabi and his immediate friends had already fallen into disgrace for insubordination and corruption under Ismail, but he had been received back into favour towards the close of the latter's reign, had been promoted to the rank of colonel in the army, and had taken a solemn oath to stand by Ismail to the death. Forty-eight hours afterwards Arabi went to offer homage to Tewfik as the new Khedive of Egypt. Tewfik, on coming to the throne, made it known that everyone should receive amnesty for the past and be given a fresh chance. Arabi might perhaps have been content with forgiveness and promotion; but the Turkish Beys and Pashas, who had always been accustomed to set laws at defiance and oppress the lower classes with impunity, saw with dismay that Tewfik intended loyally to co-operate with his European advisers in the regeneration of Egypt. They determined to use Arabi as their tool to upset the dynasty and, as they fondly believed, to rid themselves of European control. In this attempt they were greatly assisted by the well-meaning efforts of certain English tourists, who really believed that Arabi was the leader of a genuine national party, and loudly proclaimed their sympathy. Owing to their injudicious conduct, the rebellious party in Egypt were led to believe that England and France would not interfere, nor was the conduct of their respective Governments calculated to dispel that impression. All through the winter of 1881-82 the situation was becoming daily more strained. The bearing of the native soldiers became more insolent and threatening, and the old days of insecurity returned. English ladies were not safe from insult, and constant stories were rife of intended massacres. For some weeks, under secret instructions from the Agency, we lived each with a small box packed with necessaries, ready to draw together and stand on our defence at a moment's notice.

In April and May, however, no overt action having yet been taken by the rebels, people began to think that, after all, the revolt would be confined to declamation instead of deeds, and most of the residents went home for the summer as usual.

Those who remained were rudely undeceived. The outbreak and massacres of June 11, 1882, are fresh in everyone's memory, and there is no need to recapitulate the painful details. Tewfik came down from Cairo, but, though he did not hesitate to expose himself, he could do nothing, for he was almost alone. He had good reason to believe that England and France would abandon him to his fate, and he affected to credit Arabi's denial of complicity in the massacres, believing him to be the only person strong enough to restore order, and knowing that the Sultan was backing Arabi and the rebellion. Indeed, on June 25 Arabi received the Grand Cordon of the Medjideh from the Sultan. Meanwhile the Europeans were flying from the country in thousands. The ships, sent from all the nearest ports in haste, left as fast as they filled; the trains from the interior were loaded on the very roofs with passengers. As many as 4,000 arrived on June 15 alone. Trade was paralysed; the banks prepared to transfer their staffs to the warships, which sailed from all nations into the harbour; 30,000 natives were thrown out of employment and left destitute in Alexandria. Not only the natives, but all the more respectable Arab and Turkish families hastened to leave the country and disassociate themselves from the rebellion. Arabi, much alarmed, perceived too late the mistake he had made, and attempted to put Alexandria in a position of offence against the avenging warships of the European Powers. The Khedive was offered safety on an English ship, but refused, saying that he could not desert those who remained faithful to him (though all the army was against him), nor could he, merely to secure his personal safety, abandon Egypt if attacked by a foreign Power. He was left, expecting instant assassination at the hands of his mutinous army, though Sir Auckland Colvin went again on July 10 to beg him to reconsider his decision.

On the 11th, after vainly seeking the co-operation of France, England took action alone. The whole day her guns fired upon the forts of Alexandria, and by the evening they were all silent and disabled. Most unfortunately, no bluejackets were landed after the action to take possession of the town, and the consequence was that for two days it was turned into a Pandemonium by those of the mutinous soldiery who had not obeyed the order to withdraw, and the lower classes of the town. The streets were filled with a raging mob, shouting 'Death to the Christians!' and pillaging everything they could lay hands on. Houses were set on fire, and the conflagration became general. The Grand Square was totally destroyed except the English church, and most of the houses in the principal European streets. When the English forces did land—on the 13th and 14th—Alexandria was in an appalling condition.

From this time, however, there was no further failure or delay. The Suez Canal was occupied by the British navy in August, just in time to prevent its destruction by the rebels, and troops rapidly arrived from England to follow up the attack. After several skirmishes, of which the most amusing accounts were sent by Arabi Pasha to Cairo, the final and decisive battle was fought at Tel-el-Kebir on September 13. The Egyptians were completely routed. Arabi fled to Belbeis, caught a train, and arrived at Cairo the same evening, where he occupied himself in arranging a scheme for the destruction and plunder of the whole city, to begin on September 15. But the English had realised what would happen, and were too quick for him. A small division of cavalry was despatched on the 13th, under General Drury Lowe, immediately after the battle, and rode the sixty-five miles to Cairo, where they arrived about four o'clock on the next afternoon. The garrison at Abbasyieh, more than 6,000 strong, surrendered unconditionally on the first summons. But there were still nearly 4,000 at the citadel. Colonel Watson was sent on immediately with two squadrons of the 4th Dragoon Guards to take the citadel. The men had been in their saddles since daybreak, and it was now dark; but they knew how much depended on them, and were equal to the occasion. They rode up to the gates, sent for the Egyptian commander, and demanded his instant evacuation of the fortress. The Egyptian infantry were paraded in regiments to lay down their arms, and then passed out of the gates in front of the handful of English soldiers. As soon as the last of them had filed out, the English soldiers rode in and shut the gates. We learn from a letter written by one of the privates who shared in that memorable ride that it was all they could manage to do to sit upright on their horses till the last Egyptian soldier was out of sight, and then they just dropped from their saddles and lay like logs on the ground. But there was still the Mokattam fort to be taken, which commanded the citadel.

Emboldened by experience, Colonel Watson sent one of the Egyptian officers who had acted as a guide, and told him to go and order the garrison there to march down to Kasrel-Nil and pile their arms. The officer returned in two hours with the keys of the fort, and reported to Colonel Watson that his orders had been carried out.

Meanwhile Arabi had spent these two days in sending telegrams to Mahmoud Sami, translations of which will be found in Mr. Royle's account of the campaign. They are very amusing reading, especially his inquiries as to where the army which he had abandoned at Tel-el-Kebir might be. It had absolutely disappeared. In fact, the unhappy Fellaheen who had been forcibly recruited to fight for an adventurer in whom they had neither faith nor interest had raced home to their respective villages with as little delay as possible, strewing the way with their clothes and accoutrements that they might not be recognised as soldiers. At Kafr Dowar, Abukir, and Rosetta the troops also surrendered without a struggle. Abd-el-Al at Damietta refused at first, but yielded on hearing that the English were marching against him. On September 17 the Khedive signed a decree disbanding the army, which for the most part was already back in the fields. The English occupied all the abandoned posts and took charge of the country, where they have remained ever since.

This is no place to enter on a consideration of all the reasons which induced England to occupy Egypt or to remain there. It is not generally known, however, that the promptitude of the English not only saved Cairo from destruction and the Europeans from serious danger, but averted a fresh outbreak of persecution against the Copts, most of whom were fully aware of the danger of their position, and many of whom were preparing for the martyrdom which would certainly have overtaken them had Arabi succeeded. Long afterwards an Englishman, travelling in the desert churches of Nitria, found a solemn form of thanksgiving in Arabic which had been offered in the churches for the coming of the English. Almost all the talking classes of Egypt dislike us and wish to get rid of us, for reasons which we cannot discuss here, but of which no Englishman need be ashamed. And the great silent masses of patient, hard-working Egyptians, whether Moslems or Copts, dare not say that they are thankful, and would not, if they could—from the same superstitious fear which leads many Europeans to shun any expression of feeling which might provoke the jealousy of the gods.

Nevertheless, the facts are there to speak for themselves, and he who runs may read. Orientals have short memories, and the generation just out of the new schools knows nothing of the old days—the taxation which left the cultivator just enough to keep him alive to work and pay another year; the forced labour without pay; the kurbash used right and left, often in sheer wantonness; the crops left standing till they were ruined, because there was not enough money to bribe the Government assessor to come and do his work; the life-giving water taken for the rich, while the poor were left to starve, as in the year 1879. The old order of things has passed away; the new is by no means perfect, but it is an advance. It takes three generations, they say, to make a gentleman; it cannot take less to make a nation.

CHAPTER XLII

THE CHURCH OF EGYPT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

A.D. 1809 AT the beginning of the present century the Church of A.M. 1525 Egypt was at her lowest ebb, both in numbers and A.H. 1224 fortune. In every successive conquest, down to the invasion of the French, the unfortunate Copts (or Christians of the National Church of Egypt) had been the first to suffer, and all through the Ottoman dominion increasing poverty had been added to the miseries of chronic persecution. Under the Mameluke Sultans, though their lives were passed in the daily chance of plunder and persecution according to the humour of their oppressors, they were at least employed in the lucrative exercise of the arts which they had preserved. They built the beautiful mosques which are quoted as examples of Saracenic architecture; they in many cases illuminated the manuscripts which are now collected and exhibited in the Khedivial library. No doubt preference was always given to a Moslem Copt for such employment where possible, but most of the Egyptians in losing their religion seemed to lose also the artistic knowledge which their new faith taught them to despise. The wood-carving, inlaying, and brass work on a small scale for private houses was still carried on, but the art of painting had entirely died out, and after the Turkish conquest of Egypt there are very few public buildings of any architectural value, nor any such beautiful manuscripts as those which the Egyptian artists of the twelfth to the fifteenth centuries were well paid for producing. One or two private houses of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries show lingering traces of the beauty of workmanship which had once been so common in Egypt; but even when the Macedonian dynasty of Mohammed Ali became supreme the process of degradation in this respect was not checked, but rather accelerated. French taste at its worst dominated the new régime, and there was less demand than ever for the artistic handicrafts in which the Copts excelled. The business capacities of the ancient race were alone valued, and they became more and more reduced to the level of mere Government clerks. At the time of Mohammed Ali's accession to power the number of Egyptian Christians was at its lowest. Lane was misinformed when he estimated them at 150,000 only; but in 1855 the Patriarch calculated that their total number was barely more than 217,000. The whole population of Egypt was then about 5,000,000. It has been already pointed out that their position was greatly changed for the better under Mohammed Ali; and since then, in spite of drawbacks and occasional outbursts of persecution, it has steadily continued to improve.

If the National Church was at a low ebb at the beginning of this century, the Greek (or Melkite) Church was far worse. In the eighteenth century it had almost ceased to exist. A string of names is given for the successive Patriarchs; but only one of them, Samuel, who was consecrated about 1710, is more than a name. They were all foreigners, and probably few of them lived in Egypt.

They had no bishops under them, and few priests. But after the accession to power of Mohammed Ali, they also began to revive; and their Patriarch Hierotheus, who was consecrated in 1825, seems to have lived among his people, who numbered about 5,000 in all, and to have been much respected by them. His relations with the National Church were friendly, and his funeral, which was remembered for its magnificence, was attended by Coptic ecclesiastics. But on his death, which took place in 1846, there was a strife between the ecclesiastical authorities of Constantinople, who supported a strong party in Egypt, and a smaller but more respectable body of Egyptian Melkites, concerning the successor to be appointed, which again threw the community into confusion.

During the whole of the first half of the nineteenth century the throne of St. Mark was occupied by Peter VII., who succeeded Mark in 1809 and did not die till 1854, one of the longest Patriarchal reigns on record. He was a man of high character, much interested in the new developments of his time, and genuinely anxious to raise his Church and people from their melancholy condition. But the proceedings of the Roman Catholic missionaries, who in the eighteenth century had at length managed to establish a genuine Uniat Church in Egypt, principally consisting of Melkites, but also drawing many away from the National Church, had rendered him suspicious of Western influences.

The first time that any real effort was made by a Western nation to help the Church of Egypt,¹ instead of adding to her troubles by attempts to proselytise among her members, was when the Rev. Henry Tattam, whose attention had been attracted to the Copts in the course of his search for old manuscripts, wrote to urge on Archbishop Howley the duty of the Church of England towards this ancient and unhappy Church. The correspondence began in 1836, and was carried on for some years. Before this the Bible Society had published the four Gospels in Arabic and Coptic, edited by Mr. Tattam; and shortly afterwards the S.P.C.K. printed Arabic translations of the old Egyptian Commentaries.

¹ Earlier attempts by the English had all been made in favour of the Greek (or Melkite) Church in Egypt, and had ignored the National Church.

Mr. Tattam was not the first to take interest in the ancient manuscripts of Egypt, though he was almost the first Englishman to urge the National Church of England to come to the help of the downtrodden National Church of Egypt. In 1833 Mr. Curzon had come to the East in search of manuscripts, and visited some of the more important monasteries of Egypt.¹ Like most travellers, he was compelled to receive his information through Moslem interpreters, whose very presence rendered the Copts suspicious; but his personal observations and adventures are full of interest. It was chiefly in consequence of his discoveries that Mr. Tattam was able to acquire so many valuable manuscripts from the Coptic monasteries.

Mr. Tattam visited Egypt himself in 1838-39, and took very great pains to learn something about the National Church and to make friends with its members.

¹ In the monasteries of Nitria he found still hanging in the churches those beautiful glass lamps which are generally supposed to be of Arab design and confined to the decoration of mosques. But the old glass factories of Nitria had long been ruined; and almost all the early specimens of Coptic ecclesiastical glass lamps, from which the Arabs copied theirs, have perished.

Mr. Lieder, who had been sent to Egypt in 1830 by the Church Missionary Society, had also established friendly relations with the Copts, and was able to be of great use to Mr. Tattam and the Archbishop. Mr. Tattam visited the convents of Nitria, and obtained permission to bring away several valuable manuscripts. Among them was a work on the Trinity by Cyril the Great—a copy written in 611, and therefore now about 1286 years old. He also found there more than three hundred 'very old and beautiful' Syriac manuscripts on vellum, besides numerous imperfect books and loose leaves. This extremely valuable remainder of the ancient library of Deyr Suriani was afterwards acquired for the British Museum.

In March 1840, after his return to England, Mr. Tattam drew up a memorandum on the Coptic Church for the Archbishop, giving a short sketch of its condition, and ending with an earnest appeal for help from the Church of England as one peculiarly fitted to influence the Egyptians.

In the winter of 1839-40 another clergyman, the Rev. T. Grimshawe, visited Egypt, and made friends with various members of the Egyptian Church, with the result that he also wrote to the Archbishop urging that help should be given to them, and submitting, in fact, a scheme which he had requested Mr. Lieder to draw up for the establishment of a training college for young Egyptians desiring to be ordained priests of their own Church. This school was actually opened and kept up for a few years; but Mr. Lieder grew discouraged at the comparatively small success of the work, and in 1848 it was unfortunately closed. Even in those few years, however, seeds were sown which were destined to bear fruit in a subsequent generation, and perhaps Mr. Lieder would have been encouraged to persevere had he known that though none of his pupils were ordained priests, as he had hoped, his school produced in course of time the Patriarch known as Cyril the Reformer.

The Church of Egypt had never in her darkest days entirely neglected the education of her children. In every parish there was a school, where they were taught to read and write, if nothing more; but for some centuries now the girls had been left to pick up what they could in the way of education. No regular provision was made for them either at home or in schools. Cyril the Reformer, when he succeeded Peter in 1854, saw the evil of this state of things, and established a school for girls as well as for boys in Cairo, where the education was of a superior quality.

Cyril had been for some years the head of the famous monastery of St. Anthony when he was called, more literally than one could wish, by popular acclamation to fill the Patriarchal throne. Those who had been his fellow-students and knew his desire for a reform of the Church clamoured for his appointment; and when the bishops—in number then reduced to twelve—met in Cairo to elect a Patriarch, they found the name of Cyril in every mouth. But the bishops were old and timid, and hesitated to give supreme power to a young enthusiast who had been educated under foreign influences. It became known that they were about to elect an obscure monk whose very name is now forgotten, and the people rose against them in actual insurrection. Accompanied by armed Abyssinians, they broke into the cathedral where the election was proceeding and stopped it by main force. The poor old bishops fled from the building, but eventually consented to listen to the representations of the laity, and a curious compromise was agreed upon. No Patriarch was to be immediately elected; Cyril was to be consecrated Metropolitan of Babylon (Cairo) on the understanding that if he proved himself worthy as a bishop he should be shortly afterwards elected to the Patriarchate. The whole proceeding was extremely irregular, since, according to the Canon law of the Church of Egypt, translations are forbidden, and a bishop cannot be elected Patriarch. Nevertheless, the bishops faithfully carried out their compact, and, when due time had elapsed, Cyril was elected to the vacant throne.

Cyril's Pontificate lasted only seven years, of which more than two were spent in Abyssinia. Yet, in this short time he inaugurated that movement of reform from within, which never quite ceased afterward, and has quickened into a living and spreading force in the present generation. Besides the schools he established in connection with the cathedral, he rebuilt the latter entirely. It was of no archæological value, being the small and inconvenient building which had been built in haste—and chiefly by the liberality of one layman—under Mark VIII., when the old Coptic quarter was ruined on the return of the Turks in 1802. As Cyril considered that his people were guilty of idolatry in their worship of sacred pictures, he allowed none to be set up in the new cathedral, and, collecting all those which had furnished the old building, he burnt them solemnly in the presence of an immense crowd. He made them an address on the occasion explaining his action, and ended, as he pointed to the burning pile, 'Behold these wooden pictures you used to honour and even worship! They can neither avail nor harm you. God alone should be adored.'

We should be inclined to regret this action of Cyril's if it seemed at all likely that any works of art had perished in his great object-lesson.¹ But the art of painting had become almost extinct since the Ottoman conquest, and the pictures which had been executed for Mark's cathedral were probably even worse daubs than those which since Cyril's time have been placed in the cathedral which he built. If they had been beautiful, it is extremely unlikely that they would have been destroyed. For, speaking generally, the Copts have not yet lost their sense of beauty, though the days of their ignorance have almost entirely deprived them of the historic sense. A remarkable instance of this is shown in the work lately carried on at the Roman fortress by Nachli Bey el Barati. This gentleman, a devout layman of the National Church, undertook to restore at his own expense the old cathedral of Babylon which is popularly known as El Moallakah, and its precincts.² Every fragment of beautiful old work was carefully guarded and replaced, after being so well repaired that it needs careful scrutiny to tell the new work from the old. When we remember the acts of vandalism we were guilty of in England at the beginning of church restoration, and consider that El Moallakah is the earliest example of restoration here, we cannot feel proud of ourselves. Yet the English archæologists have hardly a good word for Nachli Bey, who has spent 6,000*l.* of his own money on the restoration, because this lack of historical knowledge has led him into error.

¹ It is strange that, as we gather from this incident, the Copts of Cyril's time were inclined to pay the same kind of excessive veneration to their sacred pictures as the members of the Greek Church. For there is no evidence in times past of any tendency to picture-worship among the Copts; and the Egyptian Churchmen of to-day pay no more attention to the pictures on the walls of their churches than we do to the pictures in our stained-glass windows, while devotional pictures are rarer in the Coptic houses than in our own.

² Most of the churches have been restored since the English came, but this was begun earlier, in 1879. The greatest loss it had sustained was due to a tourist, who bribed one of the inferior priests with 100*l.* to let him steal and take to Paris the beautiful sanctuary doors of carved cedar wood. They were afterwards sold to the British Museum.

Built on a half-ruined bastion of Trajan's fortress, at a time when safety and, as far as possible, concealment were the first things to be considered in the Christian strongholds, the cathedral had no fit approach, but was reached through a labyrinth of narrow passages leading from the small and sunken gate at the north-east corner of the fortress. Nachli Bey destroyed everything that stood between his new flight of steps and the nearest part of the old wall, and broke a new entrance-way through the eight feet of solid Roman masonry. Nor was this the worst. One of the two great bastions which flanked the old south entrance of the fortress was levelled to the ground in order not to break the outline of a neat new wall, and the second bastion was about to share the same fate when it was happily averted. Lord Cromer heard what was going on, and the fiat which no one in Egypt dreams of disputing went forth. Not another brick of the remaining Roman work has been touched.

Since then, with the full consent of the Copts, most of whom are sincerely glad to be protected from the results of their own historical ignorance, the ancient Coptic churches have been placed under the care of the Committee for the Preservation of 'Arab' Monuments. The Patriarch readily consented that no work of restoration should in future be undertaken without the consent of two selected members of the committee. Indeed, he begged Lord Cromer to go further, and to issue an edict forbidding the tourists to bully and bribe the guardians of the churches in order that they might plunder them of the ancient artistic treasures which still exist in some of them. Lord Cromer was obliged to confess that his power did not extend over the tourists, who now constitute the only serious danger to the antiquities of the Church of Egypt. The priests generally resort to the attitude of impenetrable reserve and depreciation which the tourists mistake for absolute ignorance and stupidity.

The work which the Church of England, as represented by the Church Missionary Society, had abandoned in the year 1848 was taken up the year after Cyril's accession to the Patriarchal throne by America, as represented by the Presbyterian Mission, which has been at work here ever since. Like the Church Missionary Society, they came, in the first place, not to help the Copts, but to convert the Mohammedans, and, like all missionaries in this country, they find the work among the Mohammedans so slow and discouraging that, though they do not abandon it, as a matter of fact their pupils and converts are mostly drawn from the National Church, which, not un-naturally, strongly disapproves of them in consequence. The modern Church Missionary Society establishment, which dates from 1884, is not so much disapproved of, because the Church of Egypt recognises that the Church of England is a true Episcopal Church, and believes that her emissaries are not likely either to teach her children heresy or lead them to acknowledge that supremacy of the Pope of Rome against which the Egyptian Church has steadfastly protested for more than fourteen centuries. But while they are deeply grateful to the American Presbyterians for the unvarying kindness and help they have received from them, they sincerely mourn the consequent spread amongst the Egyptians of disloyalty and schism. It must always be a lasting source of regret to members of the English Church that the work in the first case given to them was, through their own defection, left to be done by the members of a Church whose constitution is such that its very success must hurt the National Church of Egypt almost as much as its failure would have done. We, who put our hand to the plough and looked back, are the last people who have any right to criticise the methods of the devoted men and women who have borne the burden and heat of the day in this vineyard of the Lord.

Cyril made efforts to bring about a closer communion between the three Churches who have so much in common—the Egyptian, the Greek, and the English Churches—but his proceedings had already drawn upon him the suspicion of the Moslem authorities in Egypt, and this was considered a clear proof of his treasonable designs. He was quietly removed by poison, and a blow given to the cause of reform in Egypt from which it has hardly yet recovered.

Demetrius, who succeeded him, was good and just, but far from being capable of carrying on Cyril's work. The Copts who desired fuller religious and political life joined the Presbyterian Church in large numbers, and those members of the National Church who were sufficiently educated to value her splendid record and episcopal organisation were driven to despair. Demetrius, indeed, excommunicated the heretical Church which was obtaining so firm a hold in the country, particularly in Upper Egypt, but this was felt by the educated Coptic laity to be neither the most Christian proceeding nor one likely to be successful.¹ On the death of Demetrius they consulted together, and determined that before electing a new Patriarch they would draw up for his signature a scheme for the reform of the Church. The Cardinals of Rome have often tried to bind their future Pope in the same way, and with much the same result.

In the Canons of the Church of Egypt, as collected by Ebn-el-Assal, who lived in the thirteenth century, they found the rule upon which they acted:—

‘In all important matters the Patriarch must consult learned and pious men, both priests and laymen (especially persons attached to the Sovereign), singly and collectively. The decisions arrived at must be written down.’

On this ground the Copts, with the sanction and concurrence of Marcus, the Metropolitan of Alexandria, who acted as Vicar-General during this interregnum, drew up a scheme for the institution of a council in every diocese, composed of two houses, one clerical and the other lay, under the presidency of the bishop of the diocese. The lay members were to be elected by general suffrage every five years, and were to supervise the financial and civil affairs of the diocese. This scheme was accepted by all the bishops; but this did not content the laity, and one of their number, said to be Butros Pasha Ghali, obtained a Khedivial decree to establish the proposed council by law. After two years of discussion and experiment the present Patriarch, Cyril V., was elected in 1875, and promised to conform to the decisions which had been arrived at.

¹ Miss Whateley's well-known schools were first started in 1861, the year of the accession of Demetrius. Her work was intended for the Moslems, and she had not very much to do with the Copts, though much with the Syrian Christians.

For some time the Patriarch and the newly established council worked harmoniously together. A theological college was started in Cairo and placed in charge of Philotheus, the present Dean of St. Mark's Cathedral in Cairo and an unusually able and learned man. But mistakes were made on both sides, and Cyril grew impatient of a control which none of his predecessors had ever brooked. Dissatisfied with the results of its teaching, he abolished the theological college, so that the priests were again left without any special training for their office; and most of the members of the council, finding their advice unheeded and their remonstrances unregarded, ceased to attend the meeting. Cyril was left to govern in the old fashion till 1883, when some scandals connected with an abuse of the privileges of the Church caused an outburst of popular feeling among the Copts. A generation had now grown up which had been educated for the most part in Presbyterian or Roman Catholic schools; and though a large proportion remained faithful, in spite of this early teaching, to the Church of their fathers, still they had learned to be profoundly dissatisfied with her. They clamoured for the re-election of the council; Cyril yielded, the elections were made, the meetings were held, and various decisions were arrived at. But the Patriarch quietly ignored them, and they remained a dead letter.

In 1890 some of the younger laymen formed themselves into a society for Church reform which is called the Tewfik Society—not after the Moslem ruler whom Christian and Moslem alike respected and loved, but from an Arabic word signifying pioneer. This society began to issue pamphlets in Arabic in the hope of stirring up public opinion among all Copts able to read. Some of these pamphlets have been translated into English by their authors, and are well worth study. The society increased so rapidly and became so influential that the Patriarch and the monastic party, who dreaded change, endeavoured to suppress it. Like all young and ardent men whose horizon is limited to their own experience, the members made occasional mistakes, and these were exaggerated and misrepresented. Cyril intrigued against them with the Government, to whom their aims were represented as treasonable. In this he may have been chiefly actuated by a wish to save his own life, for Cyril well understood what had caused the early death of his reforming namesake; and though the presence of the English here can restrain open violence and persecution, they cannot altogether abolish the secret methods of removing troublesome people. Cyril also started a rival society, called the Orthodox, and the relations between the reform party and the Patriarch became daily more strained. In the spring of 1891 a great popular demonstration was arranged in Cairo, to which came delegates from all the chief Coptic communities of Egypt. Speeches were delivered, and at length a deputation was appointed to wait upon the Patriarch and urge upon him the assembling of the council and the need of reform.

Cyril, like the Popes of Rome, did not see the necessity for any council; and when the deputation became urgent, the old man broke down in tears, and left the room. The people announced a public meeting at the Patriarchate.

Cyril wrote to give information to the Governor of Cairo, and asked for police to protect him and preserve order. He then called a synod of his own, which was attended by all the bishops, the abbots of the monasteries, and the chief priests of the most important churches. He presented to them a paper for signature, the contents of which we have been unable to learn, but they were directed against the reformers, and though most of the prelates, who were all monks and for the most part ignorant, signed without reading the epistle, some of the ablest and best priests refused to do so. Among these were Philotheus, Dean of St. Mark's; Peter, Hegoumenos¹ of Faggala; Joseph, Hegoumenos of Babylon; Peschoi, Hegoumenos of Haret Zawilah; and Abd-el-Melek, Hegoumenos of Abu Sefayn.

All the priests were instructed to cause this epistle to be read aloud in the churches. Then, with some of his bishops, Cyril sought an audience of the Khedive Tewfik and asked his advice.

Tewfik carefully inquired into the whole affair, and respectfully advised the Patriarch to yield. He pointed out that he himself had gone through a similar experience. 'Before the English came here,' he is reported to have said, 'I governed my people after my own fashion, and no one could question or control what I chose to do. It is not pleasant to be set aside and controlled. But when I saw that these new ways were good for my people, then I did not stand upon my rights, but tried to learn them, and submitted to those who would help me to rule well. Go you and do likewise.'

¹ Pronounced by the Copts 'Gommos' or 'Kommus.' Almost all their Greek words and names are corrupted; in some cases they can with difficulty be recognised. The English translation of the word would be 'chief priest'; but Hegoumenos or Kommus is in Egypt applied also to the Superior of a monastery.

Unfortunately Tewfik died soon afterwards, and nothing was done for some time. Then the reform party appealed to Abbas II. against their Patriarch, and entreated the Moslem Government to issue a decree for the election of a new council. Cyril refused to be present at the elections, which thereupon took place under the presidency of the Governor of Cairo. The whole affair became more and more discreditable to both parties. The original desire for reform was obscured for the time in the struggle for the upper hand, in which both sides appealed to the Moslem Government for support, in clear contradiction to the laws of the New Testament. One bishop only sided with the reform party, the Bishop of Sanabu, whose name was Athanasius. Cyril excommunicated him; and when Athanasius went to the cathedral in Cairo, he found the doors barred against him by the Patriarch, who had gone to Alexandria. Eventually, the reform party succeeded in getting their Patriarch exiled to Nitria, and John, the Metropolitan of Alexandria, to the desert monastery of St. Paul.

This action of theirs was 'not only a crime but a blunder,' as they soon discovered. The religious feeling of the nation was shocked, and their sympathies alienated from the reform party.

Athanasius, who had had no share in the exile of his Patriarch, was called upon to act as vicar in his absence. He determined, however, notwithstanding the irregularity and invalidity of the sentence of excommunication, to respect it until he could be released from it legitimately, and by his wisdom and moderation did much to bring the reform party back into the right path. The council appointed four committees—one to supervise the schools, another to receive the Church funds and look after her property, a third to examine the condition of the churches, and a fourth to regulate the ecclesiastical courts. But their conduct to the Patriarch and the fear of excommunication had so frightened the bulk of the nation that they held aloof from the reform party, and even from the churches. Athanasius, after trying by every possible means to induce Cyril to remove the excommunication, determined to disregard it. His personal virtues did much to restore the confidence of the people, and in great measure he succeeded. But in a short time Riaz Pasha came into office, and he looked with great disfavour on any signs of reviving life among the Copts. He did his best to annoy them, and finally the older members of the Church council agreed that their wisest course was to submit to their own Patriarch and ask for his recall. Athanasius quietly resigned his vicarial office, and Cyril entered Cairo in a triumphal procession as of a returning conqueror. Moslems and Christians alike poured out to welcome him back with music and acclamations. His people insisted on unharnessing the horses from his carriage and themselves dragging him to the Patriarchate. The crowd was so great that men climbed the trees, the lamp-posts, or anything that could afford them a vantage, and all traffic in the streets leading to the Patriarchate was stopped.

It was a touching demonstration of the deep-seated loyalty which the nation feel for their Patriarch, and it is very much to be regretted that Cyril did not use his triumph wisely. But he seemed at first to have learnt nothing, and to be incapable of a magnanimous effort to start fresh on his return to power with forgiveness for the past and conciliation for the future. It was with the greatest difficulty that he was persuaded to be reconciled to Athanasius and the priests who had refused to bind themselves not to accept reforms. He would neither recognise the council nor suffer it to continue the work it had begun. He declared it to be illegally constituted, which was true, and renewed his own unlawful dealings with the Moslem Government. He even accepted the decoration of the Grand Cordon of the Medjideh from the Turkish Sultan, in return for his effort to discourage reform and the growth of national aspirations among his own people! He dissolved the council, but he did at least choose four of its members to associate with himself in the administration of affairs until the elections for a new Church council could take place. The theological school was even reopened, but it was placed in the charge of men entirely unfit for the work, and the old ecclesiastical abuses went on unchecked.

In the few years which have elapsed, however, since the re-establishment of Cyril's power, we are glad to record that there has been a steady change for the better in the affairs of the Church of Egypt. The Patriarch and the reform party have begun to perceive that the Church of Christ can neither be maintained nor reformed except in the spirit of Christ, and each party has shown a desire for peace. The incompetent teachers at the theological college have once more been replaced by men capable of teaching and not unwilling to receive new light. Some few men have already been licensed to preach from this school, and it is hoped that they will form the pioneers of a new and better generation of clergy. Much, of course, cannot be done in the lifetime of the present Patriarch, who is old and timid—afraid on the one hand of being accused of intriguing with the English, and on the other of the heretical tendencies of a generation educated in Presbyterian schools and inclined to be ignorantly scornful of their own Church.

Of the recent Anglican attempts to help the Church of Egypt little need be said. Soon after the occupation of the country by the English, a society was founded called 'The Association for the Furtherance of Christianity in Egypt.' But this society was hampered at the outset by its refusal to accept the necessary position and acknowledge the National Church as the Church of Egypt. It sought the co-operation of the Patriarch, while denying his orthodoxy; and at an early meeting of the society one of the principal speakers took occasion to proclaim that the Association would refuse all tolerance to the 'soul-destroying heresy of the Copts'! Naturally the society has been able to do very little in Egypt, and is regarded with distrust by both parties in the Egyptian Church.¹

¹ This is the actual teaching of the Church of Egypt on the subject in question, as taken from their authorised catechism:—

'Q. Did He (the Saviour at His incarnation) separate Himself from the Father and the Holy Ghost?

'A. God forbid that any separation or removal be attributed to Him, for He is the Eternal and Infinite Word of God, who cannot reasonably have become separated from God and His Spirit; but by His condescension is meant His accepting, although eternal, to appear on earth in human form in order to save man, His creature, and make him attain by His incarnation the high position of happiness in His kingdom. And yet He was never separated from the Father and the Holy Ghost.

'Q. What is the meaning of "He united himself"?

'A. That the Son of God took His manhood (i.e. His Body and Soul) and made it with Him one, personal, and substantial union, above mixture or confusion, or transubstantiation, or separation. By this Nevertheless, there is a wide field of work in Egypt where help is greatly needed. But it can only be done by those who are willing to face the facts of the case, and to lay aside the prejudices of the fifth century in dealing with the problems of the twentieth.

Including the Bishopric of Khartoum, there are thirteen sees now existing in the Church of Egypt, of which six have still the title of Metropolitan or Archbishop. There are 837 priests of her communion and about 375 churches still in the provinces, which, with the churches of Alexandria and Cairo, bring the total up to 418. Besides this, there are several important monasteries and three convents of nuns.¹

real union of substance He became one person, one distinct substance, with one nature, one will, and one action, i.e. the one Incarnated Son.

‘Q. What gives an approximate example of this Holy union?’

‘A. The union of the speaking soul with the human body, for the soul is a pure spiritual substance, and the body is a coarse earthly substance. By this mutual union without mixture or transubstantiation they become one person, one substance, one nature. This union of the soul and body in every man gives an example of the union of the eternal Godhead with manhood in the person of the Lord Christ in unity of substance.’

¹ The full title of the Patriarch of the Church of Egypt is: The Most Holy Pope; Patriarch of Alexandria and all the land of Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, Pentapolis, and all the Preaching of St. Mark.

The Egyptian Church is called El Kanissa, or to outsiders, El Kanissa Gupti (the Church of Egypt). The Greek Church is called El Kanissa Roumi (the Church of Rome). The Roman Church is called El Kanissa Katolika, or Latina (the Catholic or Latin Church). The English Church is called El Kanissa Inglesi, or Anglikana (the English or Anglican Church). The Presbyterian Church and all Dissenters are comprehended under the general term Protestant.

CHAPTER XLIII

SOCIAL LIFE AND CUSTOMS

A.D. 1897
 A.M. 1613
 A.H. 1315

WITH the spread of education and the freedom which the Copts have enjoyed of late years, many of their old customs are passing away, in particular those which were foreign to their race and only adopted in times of persecution from the Moslems. Thus, while twenty years ago a Christian Egyptian would have been as much ashamed of being seen with his wife or other female relations as if he were a Moslem, the younger men are now aware that in ancient times the Egyptian women were as free and as much respected as their Western sisters are now, and are anxious to do away with the evil customs borrowed from the Moslems in this respect. Fortunately, this movement of reform seems to be in good hands, and will proceed slowly and wisely as the Egyptian women fit themselves to resume their proper station. So far the Coptic women are trying to copy Englishwomen in the right way, in their intellectual freedom and moral self-restraint, while retaining their own graceful and modest fashions in dress and manners. Before long it is hoped that they will go about freely with their husbands and brothers, or under any other proper escort, and bring an elevating influence to bear on the lives of those around them; but fortunately they do not seem likely to begin at the outside, as their mankind have often done, and imagine that when they have cased themselves in unhealthy and unbecoming European clothes they have adopted European civilisation. The Coptic women of my acquaintance are for the most part full of natural intelligence, graceful and animated in conversation, and extremely well mannered.

Some of the customs which still exist have an earlier origin; they come straight down from pagan Egypt, and little can be said in their favour. As with all other nations, it is on the occasion of a death that these pagan rites have lingered longest. Immediately after the death the hired wailing women arrive and take possession of the women's apartments, where the scene becomes one of frantic excitement and uproar. Down below, the principal mourners among the men sit silently in the corner of the room to receive the visits of the men, who merely touch their hands on entering, and then take their seats in solemn silence. The only respect in which their behaviour differs from their far-off ancestors is that they smoke the whole time. Meanwhile in the women's apartment the corpse lies upon the floor covered with a shawl, surrounded by the women of the family in their richest garments,¹ exciting each other to a state of frenzy. Their hair is dishevelled and torn; they beat their faces with hands dyed in indigo, and shriek with the wailing women, the beating of whose tom-toms adds another element of unholy discord. Sometimes they fall fainting from sheer exhaustion, but the terrible scene continues till the corpse is removed.

¹ For three days rich and bright-coloured garments are worn by the women of the family; only on the fourth day they put on mourning clothes, which they continue to wear for one whole year. The widow of the deceased wears black for several years.

Among the lower classes the women follow the corpse, shrieking, to the grave, and sometimes even indulge in a kind of wild funeral dance, while the men sit passively round upon the tombstones ; but this last rarely happens now, and, it is hoped, will soon be entirely a thing of the past. The Church and even the Government have tried to interfere to prevent these scandalous scenes at funerals, but are powerless to effect any real reform till public opinion comes to their aid.

The funeral procession is generally preceded by the sexton bearing a large silver cross,¹ then the choir-boys carrying flags, after them the priests, followed by the bier and the mourners. The Copts have always buried in coffins, but these are now made in the ordinary European shape.² The funeral service is read in the church before the corpse is taken to the cemetery to be buried. The near relations of the dead fast the whole time between the death and burial ; immediately afterwards their friends bring them food, and continue to do so on the second day. During all three days the women on the upper storey, and the men on the ground floor, receive the condolence of their friends. The wailing continues among the women, and the hired singers recite impromptu monologues in praise of the departed. On the third day, the priest comes to the house to comfort the bereaved family, who join him in prayer, at the conclusion of which all the rooms of the house are sprinkled with holy water. The women call this (probably representing ancient tradition) the ceremony for dismissing the spirit of the deceased, which is believed to hover about the house until then. But many of the Copts believe, like their pagan forefathers, that the soul remains forty days before its final destiny is pronounced; and that it is weighed in a scale by the Archangel Michael, who here takes the place of Thoth. These forty days of waiting and trial are the only form of purgatory which the Copts acknowledge. But some among them believe that the spirits are let out from Hades, where they await the final judgment of the world, for forty days after Easter; and there is an old Coptic legend which clearly indicates belief in a purgatory not unlike that of the Romish Church at the time when the legend was written. In it Michael is represented as having power, on one day in the year, to open the doors of purgatory and bring out into peace as many of the suffering souls as he can carry on his wings.

¹ It is only during the last thirty years that the Copts have been allowed to use their crosses on such occasions.

² In Upper Egypt they still bury all the clothes and most of the ornaments of the deceased with them. In Cairo this is no longer the case, though ornaments in wearing are not often removed.

The ceremonies of a wedding, on the other hand, are most of them beautiful and symbolic. Unhappily, Moslem influence has affected even these, and till quite lately it was thought improper for a man even to see beforehand the girl he was going to marry, much more to have any personal acquaintance with her. The young people had, indeed, no voice in the matter. Matches were often arranged long before the intended husband and wife were of age to marry. At one time fifteen was considered a suitable age to marry a boy, and twelve for the girl. Already, however, public opinion, backed by the remonstrances of the Church, has improved in this respect, and now a man must be twenty and a girl sixteen before the Patriarch or Bishop will grant the licence without which no priest can celebrate a marriage. In 1895 the Patriarch issued an encyclical letter to all his clergy reminding them that, in accordance with the Canons of the Church, young people intending to marry should not only see but mix with each other, so as to know one another well, and calling upon the priests to ascertain whether there was mutual knowledge and consent to the marriage on the part of both man and woman before the ceremony was performed.

As soon as a marriage has been arranged, the young man sends to the maiden, by a priest, a gold or diamond ring called El Shabka (or the engagement-ring), and a day is fixed for the betrothal ceremony (or Jepeniok). On the evening of the betrothal day the groom, accompanied by a number of his relatives and friends, goes with a priest to the maiden's house, where her relatives are assembled to receive them. All present join in reciting the Lord's Prayer. Then the priest delivers an appropriate speech or sermon, in which he generally alludes to the betrothal of Rebecca to Isaac.

After this the conditions of the civil contract are discussed, the dowry is paid by the bridegroom, and an agreement is drawn up in which the date of the wedding is fixed. The dowry varies in amount, according to the pecuniary resources of the bridegroom; it is usually from 20*l.* to 100*l.* The bride's father generally contributes double the sum paid, and the whole amount is spent in buying ornaments and on the trousseau. After partaking of refreshments, supplied by the groom, the guests disperse. If the date fixed for the wedding be a distant one, the young man is expected to send to his bride-elect from time to time gifts of flowers and fruit. If a festival such as Christmas or Easter intervene, he sends her a robe, with some cakes and sweetmeats. But he does not visit her himself or correspond with her.

Weddings are generally celebrated on the nights of Saturday and Sunday; but not during Lent, or any of the fasts of the Church, except under very exceptional circumstances. The first, Saturday night, is called the bride's night. In the course of the day the bride goes to the bath with her friends and relatives; at night she is robed in her best, and holds a reception, to which all relatives and friends are bidden.¹ All stay to dinner and spend the evening listening to singers or other people hired to amuse them—for among Orientals it is considered beneath your dignity to do anything to amuse your guests yourself; those who rejoice with you and those who weep with you are alike hired for the purpose.

The house is decorated with flowers and flags, and is brilliantly illuminated at night; but the women and the men remain apart, as with the Moslems. Very often, indeed, the men do not enter the house at all, but a large tent is erected in the garden for their reception. These tents, as well as the china, plate, and decorations, are supplied by contractors called farasheen. Dinner is served in the usual Oriental fashion, on large circular metal trays, round which as many as ten people can sit comfortably. Every guest is provided with a napkin, a spoon for the soup, and a cake of bread to serve as a plate, but no knives or forks. The washing before eating is done in public, as with the Moslems, and not in privacy beforehand, as with us. Everyone eats with their fingers, but all wait for the most important man at table to begin. If a priest is present, he takes precedence over all others, whatever their rank. He begins by saying grace, and then, taking a loaf of bread, he blesses it, breaks it, and gives a small piece to each person present. As many trays are brought as can be conveniently set out in the dining-hall at once, and the guests are served in relays. The bridegroom does not appear on this first night, but he sends two or three of his nearest relatives with a bouquet of flowers and a wax candle, which must be as long as the bride is tall. This candle remains lighted in the maiden's bedchamber during the whole night.

¹ The Christians stain their hands and feet with henna, as well as the Moslems.

In the evening of the Sunday—called the bridegroom's night—the shebeen (or best man), accompanied by two or three of the nearest relatives of the bridegroom, goes to fetch the bride and escort her in procession to the house of her husband. Some years ago these Christian processions could only venture to move by night, and were then far more effective. The band went first, escorted by torchbearers; then the men, carrying each a candle in a bouquet; then pages carrying incense burners and perfume bottles, walking backwards, with their faces to the bride; and then the bride, leaning on the arm of the best man and followed by the ladies, with the servants in the rear. Now the bride and her ladies are conveyed in close carriages, preceded by music and escorted by the best man and his friends. The carriage which contains the bride is covered with a shawl or carpet of some value.

On arriving at the house a sheep or calf is slain upon the threshold, and the flesh is given to the poor. This is a custom which has come down straight from the ancient Egyptians. The bride is then taken up to the ladies' apartment by the best man. As the procession leaves the bride's maiden home, and as it enters the groom's house, it is sprinkled with salt and sometimes with rose-leaves, to ward off the effects of the evil eye. The company rest a little, and light refreshments are served, after which the wedding ceremony takes place.

This service used to be held in the church, but in the days when Christians could be attacked with impunity it became unsafe, and for some time now it has been the custom to celebrate the wedding in the bridegroom's house. Due preparation is made, however, and the service conducted with reverence. A table is set in the centre of the largest room in the house, on which a sealed copy of the Holy Gospels in a silver case is placed.¹ Around this are six silver crosses, to each of which three wax candles are fixed. (The triple light is intended to symbolise the Holy Trinity.) Two armchairs are set in front of the table for the accommodation of the couple about to be married; everyone else remains standing the whole time. The bridegroom is clothed in another room with his wedding garment—a cope of white silk richly embroidered, which covers his whole person.² He does not, however, uncover his head, though this is in defiance of all Christian tradition, and the effect of the white robe is marred by the unbecoming red fez at the top. The bride is robed in white, and covered with a thin veil, like an English bride, though I have seen a Coptic bride in the red silk wedding-dress of the Moslems. She ought, of course, to be placed in the chair at the right of the bridegroom from the beginning; but Moslem ideas have so far prevailed over Egyptian customs that it occasionally happens that the bride's throne is left empty, and the poor little bride peeps at her own wedding from behind the door. She is not fetched in till the service could not proceed without her, and then none of the other Coptic ladies come with her. Sometimes, however, an enlightened husband keeps her with him after the ceremony, and even introduces her to some of his English friends. The wedding service is not unlike our own, but the custom of crowning both bride and bridegroom (unless either of them have been married before), and covering their heads together with an embroidered scarf, to symbolise a tent, still survives among the Egyptian Christians, and it may be hoped will continue to do so.¹

¹ Some of these sealed copies have not been opened for four hundred years, and it is not impossible that they may contain copies of great antiquity, sealed up when they could no longer be used. It is a wholesome practice to use silver-cased Gospels, which can be cleaned, for these purposes; and it would be well if the example were followed in our courts of justice.

² These copes belong to the church, and are lent for the occasion, like the crowns.

After the wedding most of the guests remain to dinner, and spend a great part of the night in the house, listening to singers, &c. It is a point of honour for the host to keep open house on the occasion. No one is refused hospitality. The Moslem dragomans often presume on this to bring in tourists without any sort of invitation on a wedding-night, knowing that, whatever his private feelings may be, the master of the house must courteously entertain his unsought guests. As a rule the tourists who take advantage of their dragoman's intrusion are too ignorant to know whether their hosts are Moslem or Christian, and their behaviour is not calculated to inspire belief in the superior breeding or civilisation of the European visitors to Cairo. They come in, wearing the same shabby, dusty garments in which they have been rushing about all day; they walk about as if they were looking at a waxwork show; they make ill-bred remarks in loud tones, without considering that most of the native gentlemen present understand French and English (though unfortunately they do not always know the difference between English and American); in short, they make the English who may happen to be present as guests of the family extremely uncomfortable. Even those tourists who at least know enough to ask for an invitation to a native wedding, instead of going in with a dragoman, leave so much to be desired in their behaviour when they get there that some of the great Moslem families have announced that no invitations will be issued in future to any European visitors.

¹ Divorce is very rare among the Copts, and is only granted for adultery. The innocent party may marry again with the permission of his or her bishop or the Patriarch; but the religious service is slightly different and the ceremony of crowning is omitted, as it is for a widow or widower.

On Monday, the day after a Coptic wedding, the nearest relatives on both sides spend the day at the groom's house. The bride waits on her company in person, and every guest presents her with some gift, according to his means. This gift may be a diamond or a sum of money from 1*l.* to 10*l.*; and every donor receives in return a handkerchief embroidered by the bride. The friends of the family also contribute gifts in kind towards the wedding feast.

The Copts are devoted to children, and rejoice sincerely at the birth of a son or daughter, especially the former. The mother keeps her room for a week after the birth, however poor she may be; there is always some friendly volunteer to do her work. On the seventh day the name of the baby is decided in a sort of family council, and, if it is the first-born, a luncheon is given to all the mother's lady friends. The unfortunate baby begins by being put to all sorts of tests—for instance, a gong is sounded near its ears and it is rocked in a sieve! Some of the babies are very attractive. One of the prettiest and best-tempered babies I know is a Coptic baby of some five months old. He has abundant hair, bright blue eyes, and coos and gurgles with content all day, though he is passed round from one girl to another in a way that many English babies would resent. The mother, poor child! cannot be much over fifteen; but I am glad to say she is the only married one among four or five friends and relatives about the same age or a little older. When the seven-days-old baby has been duly startled, the mother, dressed all in white, takes him in her arms, and carries him in a sort of procession all over the house. All the children invited go first, carrying candles or sometimes incense burners, and singing nursery songs. Cakes are made by the parents of the young mother, called komaya; and a portion of this cake is sent with sweets and dried fruits to the different families connected with the young couple.

In the evening a water-bottle covered with silk and adorned with jewels is placed in a shallow metal basin. Three wax candles are attached to the edge of the basin, and are given each a favourite name chosen by one of the family. These candles are then lighted, and the one which burns the longest gives its name to the child. Each guest at the ceremony is expected to put a piece of money into the basin, and the collection is presented to the monthly nurse, in addition to what she receives from the father.

According to the rules of the Egyptian Church, a man child should be baptised when he is forty days old, a woman child waits till she is eighty days old. Unfortunately, however, the observance of this rule is very lax, and children may be found still unbaptised at the age of five and six months. The baptism always takes place in the church, unless the child be dying. It is done by trine immersion in pure cold water which has been sprinkled with a little consecrated oil. The child is no longer girdled with the belt which used to be a distinguishing mark of the Egyptian Christian.

In the Church of Egypt, as in the Church of Rome, the sponsorship is held to constitute a material as well as a spiritual relationship; and marriages between people so related are forbidden, as if they were consanguineous. A young man cannot even marry the daughter of his godfather or godmother, since she is reckoned his own sister. After the trine immersion the child is anointed with the chrism and given the communion. In baptism children receive a second name in addition to the first—generally that of the saint of the day, unless the parents prefer the name of a favourite saint. Girghis and Miriam (George and Mary) are perhaps the commonest names among the Copts.

Besides these Christian names, many Copts in Government service take a third name for common use which is not distinctively Christian, and this often becomes the name by which a man is familiarly known to everyone, his Christian names being used only in the ceremonies of the Church. Thus a man who was christened Marcus is known everywhere as Skander; a lad christened Vassili (Basil) is sent to school as Zeki. Some of the old Greek names have undergone curious changes since the Copts lost the use of their own language. Philotheus becomes in Arabic Feltaus ; Christodulos, Abd-el-Messiah. Victor is now Buktur ; and Theodorus, Tadrus.

Circumcision is very commonly practised among the Copts, especially in the provinces. But there is none of the disgusting display which signalises it among the Moslems, nor is it enjoined as a religious rite. It is merely a sanitary precaution, taken whenever it seems advisable. The ancient custom of sacrificing a sheep or calf still prevails on the occasion of laying the foundation stone of large buildings, and the same thing is done on the threshold when the house is completed. The flesh, as on the occasion of the wedding sacrifice, is given to the poor.

The men are much more regular in their attendance at church than the women ; and when the latter do go, they appear to talk to each other a good deal, instead of attending to the service. This, no doubt, will be remedied when the women are allowed to resume their proper seats in the body of the church, instead of being relegated to high harem galleries, so placed that it is almost impossible for them to see or hear what is going on. Apparently, before the fear of the Moslems became too strong, the women sat apart from the men, as they do in some English churches, but on the same level, and not screened from view. I have found in one old church four screens. Behind the first were the catechumens, in a space now never used ; then the outer court for the women ; between the second and third screens the men sat ; between the third and fourth, the priests and choir ; beyond the fourth were the three sanctuaries, each containing an altar, of which only the middle one is now used.

In the Church of Egypt, as in the Church of England, the rule is that all members should receive the Sacrament (in both kinds) at least three times in the year, of which Easter is to be one. But whereas in England most members of the Church communicate frequently, and only the very careless abstain altogether, it has become unusual now for even the religious members of the Church of Egypt to communicate oftener than once a year—and this, strangely enough, in Lent! A special sweet wine, called abarka, is used in the celebration of the Sacrament. It is made for the purpose in the churches. Raisins are soaked in water, then crushed, and the juice is refined and left to ferment. This custom became necessary, owing to the frequent and terrible persecutions. In the ninth and again in the eleventh century (see Chapters IX. and XV.) the vineyards were destroyed and the making or importation of wine was absolutely forbidden, with the avowed object of rendering it impossible for the Christians to celebrate their sacred mysteries. Gradually the Moslems succeeded in eradicating entirely the cultivation of the vine and in preventing the importation of wine or fresh grapes. The Christians imported raisins, and made what wine they could secretly in the churches. Now, of course, all the restrictions which made this necessary are abolished, but the Egyptians continue to follow a custom which in its first beginning was held by some rigid ecclesiastics to invalidate the Sacrament. Concerning the vestments and orders of the Church of Egypt we shall write nothing, because it has already been done with the greatest care and detail by Mr. Butler in his ‘Coptic Churches.’

To one reproach among the many so freely and recklessly flung upon them by the ignorant and prejudiced visitors from the West the Copts must plead guilty, without extenuating circumstances.¹ Their churches are rarely cleaned, and their condition in the matter of order and cleanliness is generally disgraceful. There is in most cases a paid servant of the church, but it never seems to occur to him that it is any part of his duty to keep it clean. Still, it must not be forgotten that a hundred years ago our own churches in England were in much the same condition as the churches in Egypt are now. I have before me the recollections of an old lady, in which she describes a state of dirt and disorder in English country churches which might do for a description of the Egyptian churches of to-day—only that in the Egyptian churches we at least should not hear complaints of the women using the leaves of the prayer-books as curl-papers for the adornment of the heads of the young men who sat with them! The Egyptians have already begun to restore their churches; let us hope that at some date in the near future they may realise the duty of keeping them clean.

The Egyptian churches are endowed by the gifts of past and present members of the Church in the same way as the English churches; the offertories are generally very small. But the Egyptian Patriarch has a power something like that exercised by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in England; if he thinks fit, he can appoint a Nazir (or treasurer) to any parish. This official collects all Church dues and rents, &c., and remits them to the Patriarch, who pays a fixed salary to the priest in charge, and applies the surplus of the money to such general Church purposes as he may think fit. It is concerning the administration of funds so acquired that there has been so much dissension between the Patriarch and the reform party. The latter assert, not without reason, that no one man, not even a Patriarch, should be permitted to administer Church funds absolutely at his own discretion and without rendering account of them. They demand that their council of laymen should be consulted in the apportionment of the funds, and in particular that more should be spent on education. The Patriarch, on the other hands, stands by his rights, like the Roman Popes, and with more justice. But it is agreed on all hands that, though the present Patriarch may be unwise and wasteful, he is honest and unselfish in the exercise of his trust. It is to be hoped that on the next vacancy the Egyptians may revert to the customs of primitive Christianity, and choose a learned married priest of tried experience, instead of a saintly but ignorant monk from the Nitrian desert, to be their Papal king.

¹ Justice compels me to mention one. Cairo, on the banks of an unfailing river, suffers in the poorer districts from a scarcity of water. One of the iniquitous acts of Ismail's reign has left the city helpless in the grasp of a single foreign water company, and the natives suffer.

Though there is much poverty, there is little real want or beggary among the Copts, as the well-to-do do not ignore their poorer neighbours, and those who are earning money consider it a matter of course that they should help to support those relatives who are out of work. Except in the Roman fortress, where the tourists have taught them the evil lesson, there are very few Coptic beggars. Even up the Nile, where almost the whole river population has been demoralised by the tourists, the Coptic quarters are still honourably distinguished by the absence of begging. Sometimes the boys ask for books; but in 1894, when I was last up the Nile, though the howling for back-sheesh made the landing-stages unendurable, I still found civility and silence when I turned aside to the Coptic quarters both at Esneh and Assouan. I did not hear the word 'backsheesh' so much as whispered till I went back again into the Moslem town. Moreover, almost all Copts are brought up to some handicraft or trade, if not to Government service, and are rarely idle. Copts are not often found as domestic servants, unless, as one of them naïvely put it, they are not intelligent enough to do anything else.

Since 1884 the Copts have been free from all legal disabilities, and their only real grievance is the persistent favouritism shown to the Moslems, avowedly on account of their religion, by most of the higher Government officials, English as well as Turkish. As almost all the higher officials with whom the English come much in contact belong to the very class most interested in keeping down the Copts, pains are always taken to represent the latter in an unfavourable light, and the Englishman absorbs the prejudice as naïvely as possible. As a rule, he is firmly convinced—unless it should be necessary to cross-examine him—that he speaks from his own experience, and it does not often occur to him that in his arguments he applies the standard of the New Testament to the Copts, and another standard to the Moslems, much lower than that which he applies to himself. I have spoken of the difficulties thrown in the way of the promotion of Copts in the army, and it is the same in almost every other department. Indeed, one Englishman came to Egypt with the avowed intention of employing none but Moslems (probably under the impression that only the Moslems were the true Egyptians), and carries out his intention as far as possible. It seems that no Copt since the time of Mohammed Ali has been made the governor or sub-governor of a province, though in some districts it would be the best and most natural appointment. Still, these are but small hardships for a nation to bear which has suffered so much for over a thousand years, and most of the Copts are sincerely grateful for the protection they enjoy under the ægis of our Queen Victoria.

NOTE.

SINCE these pages were sent to press the Patriarch has increased the Episcopate by the addition of seven Bishops. Four of these are the Superiors of the great monasteries of Egypt. Before this time these communities were directly under the Patriarch, and not under the Bishop of the diocese in which the monasteries were placed. The list of Bishops of the Church of Egypt now stands as follows :

1. BASIL, Metropolitan of Jerusalem.
2. TIMOTHY, Bishop of Dakahlieh, Gharbiah, and Sharkieh.
3. JOHN, Metropolitan of Alexandria, Behera, and Menoufieh.
4. ABRAHAM, Bishop of Ghizeh and the Fayoum.
5. JOSEPH, Bishop of Beni Souef.
6. JACOB, Bishop of Minieh.
7. ATHANASIUS, Bishop of Sanabu.
8. PETER, Bishop of Manfalut.
9. MACARIUS, Metropolitan of Assiout.
10. BASIL, Metropolitan of Abu Tig.
11. MATTHEW, Bishop of Akhmin.
12. AGAPIUS (Aghabius), Bishop of Kenneh.
13. MARCUS, Metropolitan of Esneh.
14. SERAPAMOUN, Bishop of Khartoum and Nubia.
15. SIDERIUS (Sidarous), Bishop of the Monastery of Baramous (Nitria).
16. MARCUS, Bishop of the Monastery of St. Anthony.
17. ARSENIUS, Bishop of the Monastery of St. Paul.
18. PACHOMIUS, Bishop of Deyr Moharrak.

In Abyssinia.

19. MATTHEW, Metropolitan.
20. PETER, Metropolitan.
21. LUCAS, Bishop.

INDEX.

- ABBAS, son of Ebn Touloun, i. 475, 376, 483
 — I., Khedive, ii. 377, 378
 — II., Khedive, ii. 407
 — Wuzir of Zafir in 1149, ii. 82
Abbaside Kaliphs, ii. 101, 103, 1239
Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, ii. 261, 264
Abd Allah, Governor of Egypt in 705 A.D., i. 395, 396
Abd Allah, son of Merwan, i. 417, 418
Abd Allah el Adid el din Allah, last Fatimite Kaliph, ii. 90
Abdallah, Governor of Egypt in 647 A.D., i. 376, 378
Abdallah Ahmed ebn Solaim, envoy to Nubia in 970, ii. 2, 3, 5, 6
Abdallah ebn Mahadi, Governor of Egypt in 795, i. 430
Abdallah ebn Zobier, i. 386
Abdallah-el-Shabroni, Sheikh El Azhar, ii. 313, 317
Ab-del-Al, one of Arabi's Generals, ii. 390
Abd-el-Aziz, Governor of Egypt in 684, i. 386, 387, 392, 397, 412
Abd-el-Hamid, Sultan of Turkey in 1774, ii. 330, 333
 — II., Sultan of Turkey, 1839, ii. 372
Abd-el-Latif, physician, ii. 116, 117, 118
Abd-el-Melek, Hegoumenos of Abu Sefayn, ii. 406
Abd-el-Messiah (see also Christodulos, Patriarch), i. 485, ii. 39, 424
Abd-el-Rahman, Emir, great mosque builder, ii. 326, 327
Abder Rahman defeated by Abd-el-Aziz, i. 386
Abdi Pasha, Governor of Egypt in 1787, ii. 333
Abdun, see Cyril, Archbishop of Abyssinia
Abercrombie, Sir Ralph, ii. 352
Abilius, Patriarch, i. 34
Ablavius, minister of Constantine, i. 160
Aboukir, ii. 341, 346, 351, 390
Abrekkes, ambassador from Nubia, i. 412
Abu Bekr, see El Ikshid, i. 490
Abu Bekr Tarabulsi, Governor of Egypt in 1798, ii. 337
Abu Dakn, his 'History of the Church of Egypt,' ii. 280, 281, 282
Abu El Seoud-el-Jarhi, Mosque of, ii. 326
Abu-el-Serur, poisoned the Patriarch, ii. 12
Abu-l-Abbas, first Kaliph of the Abbaside dynasty acknowledged in Egypt, i. 411-414
Abu-l-Taib, Christian secretary of Nasr-el-Doulah, ii. 50
Abu Salama, see Frumentius, i. 152
Abu Salih, Armenian writer on

- Egyptian Church, i. 405, 414, 463; quoted, ii. 12, 13, 28
 Abu Sefayn, church of, ii. 12, 37
 Abu Sergeh, see St. Sergius, i. 17
 Abu Tige, Roman mission at, ii. 314
 Abydos, i. 3, ii. 379
 Abyssinia, ii. 229, 236, 244, 246-248, 256, 257, 294-296, 398
 — Church of, i. 151, 318, 377, 487; ii. 61, 63, 65, 72, 78, 121, 168
 Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, i. 307, 310, 311, 316
 Achilles, Patriarch, i. 119, 139, 140
 Achilles Tattus, Egyptian author of fourth century, i. 166
 Achilles, head of revolt against Diocletian, i. 116, 118
 Acre, ii. 74, 106, 344, 374
 Adel, Sultan, ii. 138, 141
 Ador, King of the Soudan, ii. 174, 175
 Aeminius, Prefect of Alexandria and pretender to the Empire in the third century, i. 97-101
 Aetius, physician, i. 317
 Afshin, Governor of Egypt, crushed the last great revolt of the Egyptians in ninth century, i. 437
 Agatho, Patriarch, i. 384
 Aghas nominated by Selim after the Turkish conquest of Egypt, ii. 240
 Ahmed, colleague of Ahmed Ebn Touloun, i. 457
 — I., Ottoman Sultan, ii. 258
 — Abu el Kasim, ii. 69
 — ebn Kylag, Governor of Egypt in 932, i. 490
 — — Touloun, Sultan of Egypt, i. 455-458, 468, 471, 481, 482
 — — — Mosque of, ii. 118, 198
 — Pasha, Governor of the Soudan under Mohammed Ali, ii. 376
 — — (Kurshid), Governor of Egypt in 1804, ii. 361
 Ailas, Melkite deacon and secretary to Eulogius, i. 337
 Ain-el-Ghazal, ii. 178, 179
 Akhmin, i. 260, 265, 497; ii. 314
 Akmel-ed-din, Sheikh, ii. 207
 Alamas, Emir under Nasr ebn Kalaoun, ii. 191
 Alexander I., Patriarch, i. 146
 — II., Patriarch, i. 393-401
 — Bishop of Constantinople, i. 159
 — Bishop of Jerusalem, i. 65, 81
 — Severus, Emperor, i. 67, 68
 Alexandria, i. 3, 7, 9; description of, at time of conquest, 10, 20, 22, 30; massacre at, 62; siege of, 97; first cathedral built at, 112, 178, 271, 373; pillaged by Moslems, 433
 — ii. 56, 95, 171, 188, 202, 278, 285, 323, 358, 363, 369, 373, 375, 379, 384, 387, 388, 407, 411
 Al Fustat, see Fostat
 Ali Bey, ii. 319, 320, 321, 323, 327
 — Pasha Gazaili, ii. 360
 — Sultan, ii. 2
 — ebn el Hassan Zahir, see Zahir
 Alouah, ancient Christian kingdom in Soudan, ii. 3
 Alypius, writer on music in the fourth century, i. 165
 Amandus, head of the Gauls, i. 116
 Amaury or Amalric, ii. 92, 95, 96, 97, 99, 101
 Ambrose of Milan, i. 215
 — of Alexandria, friend of Origen, 66, 69, 71, 74
 Ambrosius, apology of, i. 43
 Ammianus Marcellinus, pagan historian, i. 170, 179
 Ammon Menas, Pagarch of Lower Egypt in seventh century, i. 356
 Ammonius Saccas, philosopher of Alexandria in third century, i. 66
 Amr, conqueror of Egypt for the Moslems, i. 350, 352, 360, 363, 364, 373, 376, 377; ii. 75

- Amr, mosque of, ii. 39, 48, 149, 220
 Anak, Emir, ii. 202
 Anastasis, Church of the, i. 231
 Anastasius Byzantine General, i. 361
 — Emperor, i. 311, 314, 320
 — Pope of Rome, i. 228
 Anbar Shenouda, ii. 97; Church of, i. 425
 Andronicus, i. 346, 348
 Angelium, a rival to Cæsareum, i. 325
 Annianus, St. Mark's first convert, i. 21, 27, 31, 34; ii. 45
 Anthony, St., i. 105, 139, 159, 166, 169, 177; monastery of, i. 273, ii. 397
 Antinoe, ii. 314
 Antinous, City of, i. 196
 — death of, i. 37
 Antoninus, Emperor, Itinerary of, i. 42
 Anuph, monk and iconoclast, i. 220, 221
 Apollinaris, Justinian's General, i. 322, 329
 — Melkite Patriarch, i. 190
 Apollonius, Abbot, i. 196
 — Dyscolus, i. 37
 — Martyr, i. 131
 — of Tyana, i. 29, 68
 Appian, Egyptian author in second century, i. 37
 Arabi Pasha, ii. 269, 386, 387
 Arcadius, Emperor, i. 130, 223, 235, 240, 269, ii. 26
 Arcaph, slanderer of Athanasius, i. 157
 Ariadne, widow of Zeno, i. 314
 Aristides, apology of, i. 41
 Arius, i. 140, 146, 153, 158, 159
 Arrian, governor of Egypt and martyr, i. 128, 131
 Arsacius, Bishop, i. 268
 Arsenius, hermit, i. 223, 225
 — Meletian Bishop, i. 155, 157
 — Melkite Patriarch, ii. 11, 18
 Arsinoe, a district in Egypt, i. 356
 Artemius, Prefect of Egypt, i. 178
 Artin Bey, ii. 367
 Asabah, Moslem persecutor, i. 398
 Asama-ebn-Yezid, Governor of Egypt in 705, i. 398
 Assiout, i. 4; ii. 188, 191, 277, 314, 321, 380
 Association for Furtherance of Christianity in Egypt, ii. 410
 Assouan, i. 6, 442, 496; ii. 2, 108, 191, 215, 314, 321, 322, 343, 428
 Atfih, Armenian Patriarch of ii. 78, 191
 Athanasius I. (St.), Patriarch, i. 139, 146, 151, 152, 153, 159, 161, 164, 167, 168, 170, 171, 172, 177, 187, 190, 212, 247.
 — II., Patriarch, i. 316.
 — III., " ii. 163, 165
 — III., Melkite Patriarch, ii. 182, 200
 — Bishop of Sanabu, ii. 407, 408
 — first Roman Catholic Metropolitan in Egypt, ii. 315
 Athenæus, Egyptian author, second century, i. 47
 Athenagoras, philosopher of Alexandria in second century, i. 43, 45
 Athens, i. 10, 238
 Athribis, ii. 379
 Attabek-el-Assaker, ii. 221
 Atticus of Nicopolis, i. 298
 Augustine, St., missionary to England, i. 336
 Augustus Cæsar, i. 1, 6, 7, 10
 Aurelian, Emperor, i. 105, 111
 — friend of Synesius, i. 240, 241
 Auxiditæ, Christian tribe of Pentapolis, i. 241
 Ayoub, father of Saleh-ed-din, ii. 91
 Azabs, one of the Turkish military corps, ii. 298
 BABBAK, Governor of Egypt in 868, i. 454, 457
 Bab-el-Azab, ii. 364
 Bab-el-Futuh, ii. 58, 260, 326
 Bab-el-Louk, ii. 196
 Bab-el-Nasr, ii. 58, 196, 260, 363

- Babylon, i. 8, 12, 21, 35, 42, 44,
 360, 401, 445, 452, 459, 497; ii.
 8, 42, 51, 52, 61, 62, 83, 97, 111,
 141, 145, 194, 278
 Bab-Zawilah, ii. 53, 148, 190, 192, 196, 221, 227
 Baharites, ii. 160, 161, 174
 Baird, General, ii. 355, 356
 Bajazyd, ii. 219, 222
 Baldwin, King of Jerusalem, ii. 74
 Banon, son of Ammon, i. 337
 Barcochba, i. 37
 Barkah-Khan, Sultan, ii. 172, 173
 Barkuk, nominal Governor of Egypt in 870, i. 457
 — Sultan, ii. 214, 215, 216, 217,
 218, 219, 222
 Baronius, a Roman Catholic writer,
 ii. 267
 Barrage, ii. 377
 Barsanuphians, i. 391
 Basil, Bishop of Cæsarea, i. 186, 205
 — King of Nubia, ii. 65
 — St., ii. 85
 — of Seleucia, i. 291
 Basilicus, Emperor, i. 307
 Basilides, i. 39
 Baucalia, i. 22, 23
 Bedr-el-Gamal, the Armenian, ii.
 55, 64, 65
 Bedr-en-Naib, Governor of Cairo in
 1291, ii. 179
 Behnesa, ii. 191, 293
 Bekr, one of the Christian nobles of Egypt, ii. 34, 36, 37, 58, 59, 60, 61
 — Pasha, ii. 339
 Belbeis, i. 359; ii. 92, 96, 389
 Belluga, Cardinal, ii. 315
 Benedict XIV., Pope of Rome,
 ii. 315
 Benjamin, Patriarch, i. 348, 351, 354, 374, 383, 403
 Berber, ii. 368
 Berekeh, friend of Barkuk, ii. 214
 Berenice, i. 6
 Bernard Samuel, ii. 341
 Bers Bey, Sultan, ii. 228, 230
 Berthier, ii. 348
 Beryllus, Bishop of Bostra, i. 74
 Beyrout, ii. 107
 Bibars I., Sultan, ii. 164, 165, 166, 169, 170
 — II., Sultan, ii. 186, 193
 Bir-el-Gernous, ii. 293
 Bismarek, ii. 382
 Blandina, i. 43
 Blemmyes, i. 221, 282
 Boghos Bey, ii. 367
 Boha-ed-din, Wuzir of Saleh-eddin, ii. 109, 111, 115
 Bonakis, general on the side of Heraclius, i. 341, 342
 Bonaparte, ii. 336, 338, 340, 341, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347
 Bonose, general on the side of Phocas, i. 342
 Bostra, i. 61, 74
 Boulac, ii. 187, 196, 230, 278, 326, 337, 339, 350, 379
 Bourrienne, ii. 348
 Bruce, English traveller, ii. 322, 323
 Bruchium, i. 65, 97
 Busiris, i. 117
 Butler on Coptic Churches, ii.
 425
 Butros Pasha Ghali, ii. 403
 Byzantium, Imperial power transferred to, i. 148
 CÆSAREA, ii. 106
 Caffarelli, general under Bonaparte, ii. 342
 Cairo, i. 16, 35; ii. 51, 52, 95, 96, 145, 171, 192, 230, 278, 285, 303,
 306, 314, 325, 326, 330, 337, 340,
 345, 348, 352, 354-357, 379, 389
 Caligula, Emperor, i. 5, 8, 10
 Callistus, i. 185
 Capitulations, ii. 284
 Caracalla, Emperor, i. 62, 65
 Carausius, i. 116
 Carpocrates, i. 39
 Cassianus, John, i. 271
 Cassius Avidus, i. 44
 Catechetical School, i. 44, 46, 49, 56, 272

435

Byzan-oul of Con-30, 161, 214

1, 402
2
ii. 19
n, i. 366
103, 408,

54

uncil), i.

ntine, i.

the Le-195

36, 486,

273-282,

inia, ii.

2

2/

(Date)

8/1/35

(Signature of Reader)

M. J. ...

(Letter and Number of Seat)

Permission to use the Reading-Room will be withdrawn from any person who shall write or make marks on any part of a Book, Manuscript, or Map, belonging to the Museum. Readers must not, under any circumstances, take a Book, Manuscript, or Map out of the Reading-Room. Before leaving the Room, Readers must return Books, for which they have put in Tickets of application, at the Centry Counter and reclaim the Tickets. They are responsible for the Books so long as the Tickets remain unclaimed. Press Marks should be quoted from the General Catalogue, not from the Subject Index.

Press Mark.
(From General Catalogue).

Name of Author (with Initials) or other Heading of Work.
Sadler's

Date of Publication.
1692

Title of Work. (If part of a series, specify the part of the series and the volume or part required).

The text begins with some of the ...

This space for official use only.

707. v.
9(3)

PLEASE RESTORE EACH VOLUME OF THE CATALOGUE TO ITS PLACE AS SOON AS DONE WITH.

P.F. 8
14 902

- Cyril III. (the infamous) Patriarch, ii. 139, 140, 141, 142, 144, 145, 146, 147, 178, 226
 — IV. (the Reformer) Patriarch, ii. 380, 397, 398, 401, 402
 — V., present Patriarch, ii. 404, 405, 407, 408, 409
 — Lucar, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 252, 253, 254, 261, 262, 264, 269, 272
 Cyrus, i. 349, 355, 361, 367, 368, 369
 — poet, i. 265
- DAFER, see Zahir
 Daher, see Zahir
 Dalmatius, son of Constantine, i. 160
 — hermit employed by Cyril, i. 280, 281
 Damanhour, ii. 188, 191
 Damas, General, ii. 351
 Damascus, ii. 370
 Damasus, Pope of Rome, i. 200
 Damian, i. 332, 340
 Damietta, ii. 100, 129, 130, 131, 133, 134, 152, 171, 285, 289, 323, 345, 349, 360
 Daniel, monk, ii. 19
 Daoudar, chancellor, ii. 221
 Dardanus, town in Pentapolis, i. 255
 David, King of Abyssinia, ii. 245
 — King of Nubia, ii. 169, 170, 176
 — Pasha, ii. 243, 245
 — ebn Johanna ebn Laklak (Cyril the infamous), ii. 124, 125, 132, 136, 137, 138, 139
 — le Lew de Wilhem, ii. 266, 270, 271
 Delta, ii. 289
 Demetrius, Patriarch, i. 24, 46, 47, 51, 53-58, 64-72
 — II., Patriarch, ii. 403
 Dendera, ii. 379
 Denys of Antioch, i. 433, 435, 436
 Dermes, or Darmus, i. 463
- Desaix, General in the French Invasion, ii. 343
 Deyr Abu Sefayn, ii. 97 note
 — Anbar Peschoi, ii. 311
 — Anbar Shenouda, ii. 311
 — Babyloun or Bablân, i. 35 ; ii. 98
 — Basatin, ii. 63
 — Ibrim, ii. 104
 — Suriani, ii. 396
 Didymus, i. 169, 185, 272
 Dimiana, Saint, i. 125-128
 Diocæsarea, i. 201
 Diocletian, Emperor, i. 111, 148, 166, 406
 Diodorus, murdered with George in 361, i. 178, 180
 Diognetus, i. 43
 Dion Chrysostom, i. 29
 Dionysius, Count, i. 157
 — Patriarch, i. 71, 72, 75, 76, 81, 82, 83, 86, 90-95 ; on Apocalypse, 96, 97
 Dioscorus, one of the Tall Brothers, i. 224, 229
 Dioscorus, Patriarch, i. 255, 256, 272, 282, 284-288, 289-299, 301, 307, 316
 Dioscorus II., Patriarch, i. 319
 Djezzar, Pasha, ii. 341
 Domentianus, Byzantine General, i. 364, 367
 Domitian, Emperor, i. 27, 34
 Donatus, i. 144
 Dongola, i. 379, 380, ii. 3, 28, note, 105, 170, 176, 368
 Dracontius, murdered with George in 361, i. 178, 180
 Dragon, nickname of Diocletian, i. 123
 Dugua, General, ii. 338
 Du Puy, General, ii. 340
 Du Roule, ii. 296, 297, 329
- EASTER, question of, i. 213
 Ebn-el-Assal, Author of the Compendium of the Canons, ii. 403
 Ebn Aziz, Persian painter, ii. 67

- Ebn Touloun, mosque of, ii. 299, 302
 Edesius, i. 151
 Edfu, ii. 379
 Egyptian Church, see Church of Egypt
 Eibeg, Sultan, ii. 158, 161
 El Adel, brother of Saladin, ii. 106, 119, 121, 122, 124, 127
 — Alfdal, ii. 33, 69, 74, 75
 — Amin, son of Haroun el Raschid, i. 432
 — Arish, frontier town, i. 359, ii. 343, 349
 — Ashraf, Sultan, ii. 177
 — Askar Kadi, ii. 259
 — Azhar, University, ii. 10, 189, 208, 306, 342
 — Aziz, Kaliph, ii. 11, 18
 — — son of Saladin, ii. 113
 — Bogha, ii. 214, 215
 — Gai-el-Yusufi, ii. 213
 — Ghuri, Sultan, ii. 235, 236, 237
 — Hakam, Coptic historian, i. 429
 — Hakim, ii. 20, 21, 23, 24, 32, 39, 114
 — Ikshid, dynasty of, i. 483, 490
 — — Sultan, ii. 2
 — Kahira, Cairo, ii. 26
 — Kindi, Arab historian, i. 429
 — Kosseir, ii. 26
 — Madrasseh-el-Zahirieh, ii. 220
 — Mahdi ebn Mansur, i. 430
 — Mahmoudi, Sheikh, ii. 223, 224, 225, 226, 227
 — Mamoun, i. 432, 435, 436, 438
 — Mansur, i. 423, 424
 — Moallakah, Church of, see Moallakah
 — Monsour Haji, ii. 218
 — Montaser, Governor of Egypt in 846, i. 446, 447
 — Muaiyad, mosque of, ii. 227, 306, 307
 — Mustain, ii. 223, 225
 — Mutasem, i. 438
 — Mutiwakil, i. 446, 449
 — Omari, adventurer in the Soudan, i. 461-469
 El Saida-el-Setouhia, mosque of, ii. 326
 — Shabka, the betrothal ring, ii. 416
 Elephantine island, i. 6
 Elfi Bey, ii. 360, 362, 363
 Elianus, Gaulish general, i. 116
 Elias, ii. 296
 — commander in Lower Egypt, i. 325
 Elizabeth, Queen of England, ii. 265
 Embaba, ii. 276, 339
 Emir Akhoun, ii. 221
 — Meglis, ii. 221
 — el Zeloech, ii. 221
 Ephraem, Patriarch, ii. 11, 12, 37
 Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, i. 232
 Esneh, ii. 428
 Erython, town in Pentapolis, i. 254
 Ethiopia, i. 6
 Eudocia, wife of Theodosius II., i. 265
 Eudoxia, i. 232
 Eulogius, Melkite Patriarch, i. 336
 Eumenes, i. 39
 Eusebius of Cæsarea, i. 165
 — of Dorylænum, i. 296
 — of Nicomedia, i. 144, 153, 156, 158, 161
 — of Vercellæ, i. 183
 Eustathius, i. 431, 432
 Eutyches, i. 280, 285, 291, 299, 316
 Eutychiuss, Melkite historian, i. 350, 491
 Evagrius, Prefect, i. 216
 — on controversy, i. 312
 Evoptius, brother of Synesius, i. 238
 FACILIDAS, King of Abyssinia, ii. 275
 Fadail, Christian confessor in 1418, ii. 226
 Fakr-ed-din Osman, Sultan, ii. 231
 Farag, Sultan, ii. 222, 225
 Farama, city of, near Pelusium, ii. 74

- Fausta, wife of Constantine, i. 150
Fayez, ii. 90, 91
Febronia, martyr, i. 414
Felix, Pope of Rome, i. 311
Ffoulkes, Knight Templar, ii. 94
Fikarites, ii. 283, 303
Flavian of Constantinople, i. 285, 287, 292, 293
Florence, Council of, ii. 231
Florus, Prefect of Alexandria in 451, i. 303
Fostat, i. 381, 386, 401, 402, 425, 445, 452, 459, 471, 475, 481, 497; ii. 8, 52, 111, 148, 149, 150, 151, 187, 192, 194, 278
Frederic Barbarossa, Emperor, ii. 107
Fremona, town in Abyssinia, ii. 256
Friant, General, ii. 353
Frontonius, i. 42, 106
Frumentius, first bishop in Abyssinia, i. 151
Fueh, crusaders at, ii. 119, 135
Funeral customs, ii. 413
- GABBARTI, ii. 283, 284, 301, 307, 326, 333, 334, 338, 340, 345, 350, 351, 353, 356, 358, 359
Gabriel, Patriarch, i. 486, 487
 — II. " ii. 76, 78, 79
 — III. " ii. 165, 166
 — V. " ii. 225, 226, 229
 — VI. " ii. 233
 — VII. " ii. 244, 246, 248
 — VIII. " ii. 252, 267
 — Christian confessor in 1012, ii. 25
Gaianites, sect founded by Gainas, i. 391
Gainas, heretical bishop, i. 241, 324
Galba, Emperor, i. 27
Galerius, Emperor, i. 115, 132, 136, 187
Gallienus, Emperor, i. 93, 97, 104
Gallus, brother of Julian, i. 161
Gangra, i. 300, 306
- Garbiah province, ii. 191
Gautheame, Admiral, ii. 348
Gaza, ii. 101, 325, 370
George, Arian bishop, i. 175, 178, 179, 180, 196, 270
 — Egyptian messenger to Abyssinia, ii. 316
 —, Metropolitan of Abyssinia, ii. 72
 — of Nubia, i. 441, 444, 463; ii. 2, 52
 — the Pagarch, see Makaukas
 — Saint, i. 123-125
 — Saint, church of, ii. 40
Gerasimus, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 275, 277
Germanus, Bishop, i. 79, 91
Geysh, i. 484
Gilboa Mount, resort of Tall Brothers, i. 230
Girgeh, i. 271; ii. 314
Gizeh, i. 360; ii. 276, 286, 287
Godfrey, King of Jerusalem, ii. 74
Gordian III., Emperor, i., 74, 75
Gospel, according to the Egyptians, i. 48
Gratian, Emperor, i. 204, 209
Gregory of Cappadocia, i. 162, 166
 — the Great, i. 336
 — of Nazianzen, i. 168, 205
Grimshawe, Rev. T., ii. 396
- HADRIAN, Emperor, i. 36, 38, 40, 41
Hafiz, ii. 75, 81
Hageb el Hogab, title of Head Chamberlain, ii. 221
Hakim, mosque of, ii. 224
Halca, bodyguard of Sultan, ii. 156
Hamra, quarter of Cairo, ii. 189, 191
Hanniballian, i. 160
Haramites, guild of artisans, ii. 283 5
Haroun, son of Khamarayeh, i. 484
 — el Raschid, i. 431, 432, 438

- Hashem, i. 403, 406
 Hassan, Pasha, Turkish general,
 ii. 330, 331
 — Pasha-el-Khadam, ii. 249
 — ebn Sohail, governor of Egypt
 in 747, i. 408
 — mosque of, ii. 309, 330
 Heikel, ceremony of the, i. 426; ii.
 80, 126, 165, 356
 Helena, Empress, i. 150
 Helias, monk, i. 155
 Heliogabalus, Emperor, i. 66, 67
 Heliopolis, i. 3, 7, 13, 26, 35, 362,
 458; ii. 163, 232, 350, 379
 Helladius, priest of Jupiter, i. 219
 Helwan or Helouan, i. 388, 394,
 459; ii. 328
 Henoticon, instrument of Union, i.
 311 Hephæstion, Egyptian author, i.
 166
 Heracles, i. 58, 61, 64, 71-73, 74, 75
 Heracleopolis, i. 356
 Heraclius, Emperor, i. 349, 354, 358, 367
 — Eparch of Africa, i. 341
 Hermes Trismegistus, i. 47
 Hermopolis, i. 184
 Herodian, historian, i. 68
 Hierax, monk, i. 97
 Hierotheus, Melkite Patriarch in
 1825, ii. 394
 Hilarius, notary, i. 172
 Hilary, Pope of Rome, i. 307
 Hodges, Colonel, delivers ultimatum to Mohammed Ali; ii. 373
 Honorius, Emperor, i. 223
 Honorius III., Pope of Rome, ii.
 130
 Hosam, Emir, ii. 207
 Hosius of Cordova, i. 144, 167, 176
 Hugh of Casarea, ii. 94
 Hussein, Pasha of Egypt, ii. 276
 — mosque of, ii. 326
 Hutchinson, General, ii. 352, 354,
 355, 358
 Hydrax, town in Pentapolis, i. 253
 Hymenæus, see Eumenes
- Hypatia, i. 218, 242, 258, 272
- IAMBlichus, Egyptian author, i.
 165
 Ibbas, Bishop of Edessa, i. 328
 Ibn Katib, architect, i. 473
 Ibn Said, quoted, ii. 148
 Ibrahim, Governor of Egypt, ii.
 259
 — King of Nubia, i. 411
 — a Kurd, holds Nubia, ii. 104, 105
 — Bey, ii. 326, 328, 330, 331, 332, 334, 337, 339, 341, 346, 360
 — Pasha, Governor of Egypt under Murad III., ii. 249, 250
 — Pasha, son of Mohammed Ali,
 ii. 370, 377, 381
 — Soufy, robber chief, i. 467, 468
 Ibrim, ii. 285
 Ibshadi, name of Nikius, i. 411
 Ignatius of Antioch, ii. 141
 Illus, courtier of Byzantium, i.
 309
 Inal, ii. 232
 Innocent, Pope of Rome, i. 235
 Isaac, Bishop of Harran, i. 422
 — Bishop of Wissim, i. 445
 — Metropolitan of Abyssinia, ii.
 122
 — Patriarch, i. 307, 392
 Ischyras, dissenting minister, i.
 154, 157
 Ishbîlîya, Spain, ii. 149, 150
 Isidore, monk of Nitria, i. 164 — of Pelusium, i. 265, 266, 268, 273, 277
 — priest of Alexandria, i. 213, 227
 Isis, i. 5, 12, 24, 65
 Ismail Bey, ruled Egypt 1710-
 1723, ii. 304, 305, 306, 309, 328,
 331, 334
 — Pasha, Khedive, son of Ibrahim, ii. 381, 382, 383, 385, 386
 — Pasha, son of Mohammed Ali,
 ii. 368, 369
 Issa, son of Zafir, ii. 82

- Iwaz, or Ouad, Moslem robber chief, ii. 303
- JACOB, a Copt at the time of the French Invasion, ii. 351, 353, 380
- Patriarch, i. 434, 436, 440
- Jacobite sect, i. 331
- Jaffa, ii. 106, 325, 344, 370
- Jakmak, Sultan, ii. 230, 231
- James I. of England, ii. 263, 265, 272
- or Jacobus Baradœus, i. 330
- of Babylon, i. 485
- Janissaries, ii. 237, 298
- Jeremiah, ii. 11
- Hermit, i. 314
- the Prophet, i. 6, 478
- Jerome, i. 169, 195, 224
- Jerusalem, ii. 74, 107, 133, 371
- Jews at the time of Roman conquest, i. 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14, 15, 16, 17, 29, 30, 31, 32, 36, 40.
- Joas Bermudez, ii. 244, 246
- Johar, ii. 1, 2, 6, 10
- John, Abbot of St. Anthony, ii. 231
- Abbot of Nitria, i. 338
- Abbot of Scetis, i. 225
- of Abu Nefer, ii. 23, 35
- the Almoner, Byzantine Patriarch, i. 344
- of Bana, i. 441
- Emperor of Abyssinia, ii. 166
- Governor of Abyssinia, i. 335
- Hemula, i. 316
- III., King of Cyprus, ii. 228
- of Lycopolis, i. 197, 264
- of Nikius, i. 14, 132, 187, 211, 285, 305, 315, 322, 363
- Nikiota, i. 318, 319
- IV., Patriarch, i. 431
- V., " ii. 84, 86
- VI., " ii. 115, 120, 147
- VII., " ii. 166
- VIII., " ii. 184, 193
- IX., " ii. 193
- X., " ii. 212
- John XI., Patriarch, ii. 229
- XII., " ii. 234, 244
- XIII., " ii. 244, 246
- XIV., " ii. 250, 255
- XV., " ii. 271, 277
- XVI., " ii. 292, 294
- XVII., " ii. 309, 310, 315
- XVIII., " ii. 333
- Philopompus, i. 373
- St., Church of, ii. 40
- of Samanhoud, i. 413
- of Sebennytos, i. 384, 386
- Secretary of Ebn Touloun, i. 478
- Talaia, i. 309
- Joinville, Sieur de, ii. 154, 156
- Jonathan of Cyrene, i. 31
- Joseph, Hegoumenos of Babylon, ii. 406
- Metropolitan of Abyssinia, ii. 246
- Patriarch, i. 443, 446, 447
- Josephus, Flavius, i. 29
- Jovian, Emperor, i. 187, 188
- Julia Mœsa, i. 66, 67
- Mammea, i. 68
- Soëmia, i. 68
- Julian of Carthage, i. 116
- Emperor, i. 161, 177, 180, 185, 186, 222
- Patriarch, i. 45
- Julius Africanus, i. 74
- Pope of Rome, i. 162
- Justinian, Emperor, i. 322, 327, 329, 330
- Juvenal of Jerusalem, i. 292, 298
- the poet, i. 33
- KAFR-DOWAR, ii. 390
- Kafur, Wuzir of Egypt in 953, i. 492, 496
- Kait Bey, ii. 232, 233, 234
- Kalaun-el-Elf, Sultan, ii. 172, 173, 174, 176
- Kamil, Sultan of Egypt, ii. 122, 123, 124, 127, 128, 129, 133, 135, 136, 137, 138, 141, 147
- Kansu, see El Ghuri, Sultan
- Kantara, i. 349

- Kara-Gouch, see Boha-ed-din
 Kasir, painter, ii. 67
 Kasr-el-Ain, ii. 303, 337
 Kasr el Shamr or Kasr-el-Shamma,
 i. 15, 445; ii. 27, 190
 Kassem-Bey, ii. 283
 Kassemites, ii. 283, 303
 Keft, see Koptos
 Keith, Admiral, ii. 349
 Kenz, children of, ii. 215
 Kerim el-din, Kadi, ii. 193, 194, 197
 Kerwan, see Cyrene
 Ketbogha, ii. 181
 Khalig, i. 375
 Khalil, Pasha of Egypt, ii. 276
 — Melek el Ashraf, Sultan, ii. 177, 181
 Khamarayeh, Sultan, i. 433
 Khamil, Sultan, i. 474
 Khan Khalil, building of, ii. 177
 Khandak, ii. 191, 298
 Khandala ebn Sefayn, governor of Egypt under Kaliph Hashem,
 i. 402-404
 Khankah, ii. 202, 259
 Khartoum, ii. 376
 Khayr Bey, ii. 240
 Khayr-ed-din, ii. 240
 Khereu, i. 365
 Khor-ed-din, ii. 129
 Khosref, ii. 359
 Kilus, Bishop of Fueh, ii. 119, 120, 121
 Kiriakous, i. 411
 Kirwan, Cyrene, ii. 10
 Kleber, General, ii. 338, 348, 349, 350, 351
 Klysmā, i. 42
 Konieh, ii. 370
 Koptos, ii. 106
 Korah ebn Sherik, governor of Egypt in 705, i. 396, 397
 Kosseir, ii. 356
 Kurshid Pasha, ii. 361, 362
 Kynopolis, i. 4; ii. 379
- LÆTUS, i. 51
 Lajm, Mameluke Sultan, ii. 181
- Lamisse, General in French Invasion, ii. 351
 Lane, E. W., ii. 371
 Leo, Emperor, i. 305
 — Pope of Rome, i. 284, 285, 293, 294
 — Pope of Rome in 451, ii. 64
 — Tome of, i. 295
 Leonides, father of Origen, i. 51, 52
 Leontius, Byzantine General, i.
 361
 Leptis Magna, i. 476
 Lewatah, a Berber tribe, so called,
 ii. 49, 51, 56
 Liberius, Pope of Rome, i. 177
 — Prefect of Egypt, i. 325
 Library, i. 10, 373
 Lieder, missionary, ii. 396
 Likanios, ii. 316
 Longinus, i. 104
 Louis IX. of France, ii. 152, 153, 155
 — XIV., ii. 294
 Loulu, Moslem general, i. 475
 Lowe, Sir Drury, ii. 389
 Lucian, i. 47, 112
 Lucifer, Bishop of Calaris, i. 183
 Lucius, Arian, i. 187, 189, 200, 203, 204
 Lucuas of Cyrene, i. 36
 Lupus, prefect, i. 36
 Luxor, ii. 314, 322, 329
 Lycopolis or Assiout, i. 197. See Assiout
 Lydda, ii. 325
- MACARIUS of Alexandria, i. 198, 201
 — ascetic, Bishop of Tkouu, i. 288
 — of Egypt, Magnus, i. 108, 198, 201
 — a monk employed by Athanasius,
 i. 154, 157
 — Patriarch, i. 489
 — I., Patriarch, ii. 19
 — II., ii. 73
 — St., Monastery of, ii. 136, 140
 Macrinus, Emperor, i. 65-66

- Mahmoud Sami, one of Arabi's companions, ii. 390
 — Sultan, ii. 372
 Mahmoudieh Canal, ii. 369
 Mahomed II., Ottoman Sultan, ii. 231, 258
 Makaukas, i. 352, 355, 356, 357, 362
 Makorrah, province in the kingdom of Nubia, ii. 3
 Makrizi, i. 15, 350, 462; quoted, ii. 26, 73, 154, 162, 181, 183, 185, 191, 198, 213, 230
 Manfalout, ii. 188, 191
 Manicheans, i. 206
 Mansoura, i. 492
 Mansourah, ii. 131, 154, 285
 Mansur, ii. 74
 Marákish, Morocco, ii. 149
 Marcellus of Ancyra, i. 190
 Marcian, i. 295, 298
 Marcus Abouna, ii. 294
 — Aurelius, Emperor, i. 43, 45
 — Fuxia, ii. 269
 — Metropolitan of Alexandria, ii. 403
 — Secundus, Prefect, i. 65-66
 Mareotis, i. 130, 154, 408
 Mari Mena, i. 130, 408, 409, 446
 Mark, King of Nubia, i. 411
 — ebn Kunbar, ii. 86, 87, 88
 — Melkite Patriarch, ii. 115
 — Patriarch, i. 431
 — IV., Patriarch, ii. 212
 — V. „ ii. 270
 — VII. „ ii. 309
 — VIII. „ ii. 356, 360
 — St., Church of, ii. 40
 — St., mission to Egypt and death, i. 19-23
 — ebn Zaara, ii. 87, 89
 Martina, i. 367
 Masr, ii. 96, 278
 Masr-el-Askar, ii. 9
 Masoud, sent as spy to Nubia, ii. 105
 Massowah, ii. 3, 256
 Matarieh, i. 13; ii. 83, 282, 286
 Matthew I., Patriarch, ii. 217, 218, 225
 — II., Patriarch, ii. 232
 — IV. „ ii. 279
 Matthew Righet, Pope's Vicar, ii. 357
 Maurice II., Emperor, i. 335
 Mavia, Queen, i. 203
 Maxentius, i. 136-137
 Maximian, Bishop, i. 281
 — Emperor, i. 115
 Maximin Daza, Emperor, i. 136, 139
 Maximinus, Emperor, i. 73
 Maximus of Alexandria, i. 206, 207
 — Patriarch, i. 105
 Melania, i. 195
 Melek-el-Ashraf III., Sultan, ii. 212, 213, 214
 — IV., Beis Bey, ii. 228
 Melek-el-Kamil, see Kamil
 Melek-el-Saleh, ii. 145, 146, 150, 153, 160
 Meletian heretics, reception into Church, i. 421
 Meletius, Bishop of Assiout, and head of a schism in fourth century, i. 135, 136, 145, 153
 Meletius Piga, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 252, 253
 Melkite, i. 16-17, 331, 403, 428
 — Church, ii. 393, 394
 Memnon, Bishop of Ephesus, i. 279, 281
 Memphis, i. 3, 4, 14, 33, 184; ii. 250, 379
 Mena, King of Abyssinia, ii. 247
 — I., Patriarch, i. 423, 426
 — II., ii. 19
 Menas, chief of Green Faction, i. 366
 — Pakubios, i. 355
 — St., Church of, ii. 40
 Menna, or Mena, martyr, i. 130
 Menou, General, ii. 351, 352, 355
 Menouf, battle of, i. 342
 Mercurius, Bishop of Wissim, ii. 58, 60
 — King of Nubia, i. 411
 — St. (Abu Sefayn), i. 186, 187
 — St., church of, ii. 40, 63, 97
 Merwan, i. 386
 — II., i. 403, 413, 414, 446
 Messih Pasha-el, Khadam, ii. 249
 Metrophanes, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 264, 266, 273, 274, 275, 277

- Michael, Archangel, ii. 415
 — Bishop of Tanis, ii. 13, 52
 — Bishop of Xoïs, ii. 23
 — Monophysite, Patriarch of Alexandria, ii. 89
 — I., Patriarch, i. 407, 410, 411, 412, 419, 422, 423
 — II., Patriarch, i. 449, 481
 — III., Patriarch, i. 17, 477, 481, 485
 — IV., " ii. 66, 72
 — VI., " ii. 233
 — of Pelusium, i. 440
 — Sabaan, renegade, ii. 217
 — of Toura, ii. 229
Mines, i. 5-30
Moallakah, church of, ii. 27, 28, 59, 124, 139, 142, 179, 999, 400
Moallem Ghali, ii. 360, 366, 367
 — Ibrahim el Johari, ii. 331
 — Malati, ii. 359
 — Risk, ii. 322
Moawiyah I., i. 382, 383
 — II., i. 385
Moez, i. 496; ii. 1, 48
Mohalla-el-Kebir, i. 472; ii. 311
Mohammed, i. 352
 — Abu Dahab, ii. 323, 324, 325, 327, 331
 — Ali, ii. 352, 358, 359, 360, 364, 393, 428
 — ebn Bekr, i. 381
 — Governor of Egypt, ii. 259
 — Rogeb, ii. 312
 — el Yadaksi, ii. 312
Moses, hermit, i. 202
 — of Khorene, i. 271
 — Maimonides of Cordova, ii. 116
 — of Wissim, i. 404, 407, 411, 415, 417, 424
Mosleima, i. 392
Mosque of Amr, i. 376
 — Ebn Touloun, i. 472-474
Mouletezzims, ii. 242
Mouski, ii. 190
Moussa, i. 425
Moustain, i. 453
Murad Bey, ii. 326, 328, 330, 332, 334, 337, 339, 343, 345, 351
 — II., Ottoman Sultan, ii. 228, 229
Murad III., Ottoman Sultan ii. 249
 — IV., " " ii. 272, 276
Museum, i. 10, 43
Mustanzir, ii. 38, 39, 43, 46, 50, 55, 63, 67, 73, 82
Mustapha II., Ottoman Sultan, ii. 283
 — agas, military corps, ii. 298
Mutewakil, ii. 213, 216
Muzahem, Governor of Egypt in 866, i. 454

NACHLI Bey el Barati, ii. 399, 400
Naib, Governor of Cairo, ii. 221
Napier, Commodore, ii. 375
Nasif, Pacha, ii. 350, 353
Nasr-ebn-Kaloun, ii. 177, 181, 182, 186, 187, 197, 201, 202, 203
Nasr-el-dyn-Hassan, Sultan, ii. 203, 211
Natron, see Nitria
Naucratis, i. 3
Nebuchadnezzar, i. 14
Nekam, renegade, returned to suffer martyrdom, ii. 41
Nelson, Lord, ii. 336, 341
Nero, Emperor, i. 29
Nerva, Emperor, i. 34
Nestorian, heresy, i. 277
Nestorius, i. 295, 316; ii. 64
Nezib, battle of, ii. 372
Nicea, Council of, i. 142
Nicephorus, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 277
Nicetas, general of Heraclius, i. 343
Nicholas, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 130, 131, 134, 153
Nicodemia, Diocletian's persecution begins at, i. 122, 143
Nikius, city of, i. 130, 390
 — John of, i. 14, 132, 187, 211, 219, 285, 305, 315, 329, 389
Nikopolis, i. 10
Nile festival, ii. 184
Nilometers, i. 875

444 THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

- Niouti, i. 463, 466
 Nitria, i. 42, 108, 130, 174, 225, 226, 228; invasion by Theophilus, 229, 273, 326, 332, 384, 407, 433; ii. 50, 59, 136, 329, 391, 396, 407
 Noph, i. 6
 Nordern, Fredk., his book on Egypt, ii. 310
 Nour-ed-din, Sultan of Damascus, ii. 91, 93, 101
 Novatians, i. 206, 274
 Nubar Pasha, ii. 382
 Nubia, i. 42, 379, 411, 417, 441-444, 461-469
 Numerian, i. 115

OBEID ALLAH, i. 400
 Odenathus, i. 104, 195
 Odjaks, ii. 70
 Old Cairo, see Babylon
 Olympius, i. 215, 216, 217
 Omar, i. 352, 353, 354, 361, 373, 376
 Ombos, i. 4
 Ommyades, i. 383
 Onion, i. 7, 13; destruction of, 32
 Orestes, i. 274
 Origen, i. 49-72; ordained at Cæsarea, 69; resigned catechetical school, 70; excommunicated, 73, 80, 81; death, 87; his book on principles, 169; condemned by Theophilus, 328
 Osman el Bardissi, ii. 360, 361, 363
 Osman Bey Zulficar, ii. 309
 Osman, Sultan, ii. 371
 Ortokide Turks, ii. 70
 Oxyrynchon, i. 4, 195, 356

PA HEBERT, ii. 311
 Pachomius, abbot, i. 152
 Palæbisca, town in Pentapolis, i. 253
 Palæmon, hermit, i. 153
 Palladius, prefect, i. 200, 208
 Pamoun, metropolitan of Nubia, ii. 52

 Pamphilus of Cæsarea, i. 76
 Pancrates, poet, i. 37
 Panephyssus, see of, ii. 35
 Pantænus, head of catechetical school, i. 45-47
 Parabolani, clerical guild, i. 276-298
 Paris, i. 177
 Parthenios, Melkite Patriarch, ii. 357
 Pascal, Pope of Rome, ii. 74
 Paton's History of Egyptian Revolution, ii. 338
 Paul, see also Vasah, ii. 16
 — Abbot of Bonet, i. 267
 — Bishop of Tyre, i. 156
 — Patriarch, i. 325
 — proposed Patriarch, ii. 123
 — Prefect of Samanhood, i. 341, 343
 — St., Monastery of, i. 327
 Pedro Pæz, ii. 256, 257
 Pelagius, Pope of Rome, i. 336
 Pelusium, i. 42, 359; ii. 74, 96
 Pentapolis, i. 20, 22, 102, 375
 Pergamus, i. 310
 Peschoi, Hegoumenos of Haret Zawilah, ii. 406
 Peter, monk, heads schism, ii. 139
 — Abouna of Abyssinia, i. 487
 — Deacon, i. 423
 — Hegoumenos of Faggala, ii. 406
 — the Hermit, ii. 70
 — Mongus, Patriarch, i. 303, 308, 311, 316
 — I., Patriarch and martyr, i. 132
 — II., Patriarch, i. 190, 200, 205, 207, 208
 — III., Patriarch, i. 330-332
 — VI. „ ii. 309
 — VII. „ ii. 394, 397
 — the Reader, i. 276
 — St., i. 13, 19, 22
 Phares Oktai, ii. 161, 162
 Philæ, i. 6, 201, 375
 Philagrius, i. 162
 Philemon, martyr, i. 131
 Philip, Emperor, i. 76, 79
 — of France, ii. 108

- Philo, philosopher, i. 8, 9
 Philotheus, dean of Cairo Cathedral, ii. 404, 406
 — Patriarch, ii. 14, 17, 19, 21
 Philoxenos, Pagarch, i. 357
 Pierus, head of the Catechetical School, i. 76
 Pindar, Sir Paul, ii. 274
 Pinoution, monk, i. 289
 Pinnes, Abbot, i. 155
 Pistus, excommunicated priest, i. 161, 162
 Plotinus, i. 68, 75
 Pooocke, traveller, ii. 310
 Pœmen, monk, i. 220
 Poitiers, Count of, ii. 153
 Politian, Melkite Patriarch, i. 431
 Polycarp, i. 43
 Ponsonby, Viscount, ii. 372
 Portuguese interfere in Abyssinia, ii. 236
 Potamiœna, martyr, i. 51
 Potammon, Bishop, i. 156, 166
 Poussielgne, Finance Minister under Napoleon, ii. 340
 Probus, Emperor, i. 105, 111
 Proterius, Melkite Patriarch, i. 302, 304, 305
 Pshati, Egyptian name for Nikius, i. 390
 Psoius, deacon, i. 325
 Ptah, temple of, i. 327
 Ptolemais, i. 3, 111
 Ptolemy the geographer, i. 44
 — Philadelphus, i. 7
 Pulcheria, Empress, i. 293, 298
- QUADRATUS, Apology of, i. 41
- RAHMANIEH, ii. 338, 352
 Ramleh, ii. 325
 Raphael, buys see of Panephythus, ii. 35
 — King of Nubia, ii. 28
 — St., church of, ii. 40
 — Tuky, ii. 315
 Ras Noubet-el-Omra, ii. 221
 Ras Noubet-el-Thani, ii. 221
- Rasceti, ii. 135. See Rosetta
 Regnier, General, ii. 343
 Remoboths, i. 198
 Renaudot, quoted, ii. 130
 Rhinocolura, i. 202
 Rhoda, island of, i. 360, 363, 375, 471; ii. 58, 150, 160, 237, 356
 Rhodon, head of the Catechetical School, i. 272
 — Prefect of Egypt, i. 325
 Richard I., of England, ii. 108, 109
 Rifaat Pasha, ii. 374
 Rifaiyeh, mosque of, ii. 385
 Robinson, English engineer, ii. 329
 Rodowan, revolt of, ii. 76, 77, 80, 81
 Roger, Count of the Normans, ii. 80
 Rome, i. 10
 Rosetta, ii. 171, 285, 329, 338, 343, 352, 354, 390
 Rufinus, i. 108, 169, 195, 196, 224
 Ryme, quoted, ii. 338, 347
- SADRËS, guild of artisans, ii. 285
 Sadleir, Sir E., translates Abu Dakn, ii. 282
 Said Mohammed Kerim, ii. 336
 — Pasha, ii. 378, 380
 — Theophilus, physician, i. 481
 Saida Aisha, mosque of, ii. 326
 — Sekina, mosque of, ii. 326
 — Zeinab, mosque of, ii. 326
 St. Bacchus, church of, see St. Sergius
 St. Barbara, ii. 201
 St. Francis of Assisi, ii. 128, 129
 St. Mark, church of, at Alexandria, ii. 133
 — head of, taken to Venice, ii. 227
 St. Mena, see Mari Mena
 — church of, i. 402; ii. 189
 St. Mercurius, see Abu Sefayn
 St. Sergius and St. Bacchus, church of, ii. 11, 73, 125, 132
 Sakhara, ii. 287, 293, 379

- Salahieh, ii. 325, 350
 Saleh-ed-din Yusef, ii. 91, 95, 100,
 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 109
 Salisbury, Bishop of, ii. 109
 Samuel, Patriarch, ii. 393
 Sandys, English traveller, ii. 254
 Sanutius, see Shenouda.
 Scenæ Veteranorum, i. 35
 Scetis, i. 109, 201
 Sebastian, i. 176
 Sedfeh, ii. 314
 Segued, King of Abyssinia, ii. 248
 Selim I., Ottoman Sultan II., 236, 237, 238, 239, 242
 — II., Ottoman Sultan, ii. 245
 Senaar, ii. 368
 Sendata, Bishop of, ii. 147
 Serapion, i. 170
 Serapis, i. 3, 4, 10, 23, 40, 55, 179, 211, 215, 222
 Sergeh, see Abu Sergeh or St. Sergius
 Severus, Emperor, i. 49, 62
 — historian, ii. 13
 — monk, ii. 60, 64
 — Patriarch of Antioch, i. 318
 Seyf-el-Din, Sultan, ii. 113, 116, 164
 Seyf-el-Doulah, i. 492
 Shahin, ii. 288
 Shajar-el-Dur, ii. 153, 155, 157, 161, 162, 163
 Sham-en-Nessim, feast of, ii. 304
 Shamse-ed-Din, historian, ii. 301
 Shamse-ed-Doulah, ii. 104, 105
 Shauer, ii. 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96
 Shebreiss, ii. 339
 Sheikhoun, Emir, ii. 205, 207
 Sheikh el, Hefni, mosque of, ii. 326
 Shekander, ii. 169, 175
 Shemamoun, ii. 175, 176
 Shenana, Bishop of, ii. 35
 Shendy, ii. 368
 Shenkir, ii. 3
 Shenouda Abouna in Abyssinia, ii.
 294 — of Akhmin, i. 260, 279, 280
 — Bishop of Babylon, ii. 66, 72
 — Pagarch, i. 357
 — Patriarch, i. 452, 453, 476
 — II. „ ii. 34
- Shenouda Seltaun Segued, Emperor of Abyssinia, ii. 256, 257
 Sherif-El-Din el Kurdi, mosque of,
 ii. 326
 Shiracouh, ii. 91, 92, 93, 94, 95,
 99 Shoubra, ii. 233
 Siderius, i. 190, 254
 Sidi-Ahmed-el-Bedowi, ii. 308
 Sidi-el-Dessouki, ii. 308
 Sidi-el-Shaffei, ii. 308
 Sidon submits to Saladin, ii. 106
 Silvester, Melkite Patriarch, ii.
 252
 Simon, Patriarch, i. 388, 389, 392
 Simplicius, Pope of Rome, i. 310
 Sisinnius, Bishop, i. 268
 Sitte Dimiana, i. 125, 128
 — Miriam, i. 18
 Sixtus VI., Pope of Rome, ii. 255
 Smith, Sir Charles, ii. 374, 375
 — Sir Sidney, ii. 344, 346, 347, 349
 Sonnini Mons., ii. 328, 329
 Sophronius, Melkite Patriarch, i.
 444, 446
 Soudan, i. 6, 377, 441
 Souhag, Red and White Monasteries near, i. 151
 Souiah, capital of Alouah, ii. 4
 Spahis, military corps, ii. 298
 Spalatro, Archbishop of, ii. 267
 Sponsorship, ii. 423
 Stamboul, i. 149
 Stephen of Thebes, i. 485
 Stilas, commander in Alexandria,
 i. 306
 Suakim, ii. 3
 Suez, ii. 259, 289, 382
 Synesius of Cyrene, i. 237-258
 Syrakus, ii. 202
 Syria, i. 7, 351, 455
 Syrianus, Byzantine general, i.
 172
- TABENNA, i. 152, 184, 185, 196, 279
 Tabennesi, see Tabenna
 Tahir Pasha, ii. 359

- Tajedin, ii. 211
 Taj-ed-Doula, ii. 76, 77
 Tandeta, ii. 51
 Tanis, i. 491, ii. 52, 379
 Tanta, i. 269
 Taphanes, i. 6
 Tattam, Rev. Henry, ii. 395
 Taz, Emir, ii. 213
 Tel-el-Kebir, battle of, ii. 389
 Tennis, i. 434
 Tewfik, Khedive, ii. 383, 384, 386, 406
 Thalia, Sultan, ii. 82, 83, 90
 Thebaid, i. 3, 37, 281, 329
 Thebes, i. 3, 14, 38; ii. 379
 Thecla, Egyptian lady, i. 270
 Thekla Haïmanout, King of Abyssinia, ii. 297
 Themis, ii. 379
 Theodora, Empress, i. 160
 Theodore, Abbot of Pherine, i. 267 — Abbot of Tabennesi, i. 184
 — Bishop, i. 440
 — Gaianite Bishop, i. 392
 — General, i. 337, 366
 — of Mopsuesti, i. 328
 — Patriarch, i. 402
 Theodorus apostate, ii. 164
 Theodorus, ii. 316
 Theodosius, Byzantine General, i. 361
 — Emperor, i. 197, 204, 208, 210, 215, 216
 — Melkite official under Said ebn Yezid, i. 384 — Patriarch, i. 324, 350; ii. 182
 — II., i. 277, 279, 293
 Theodotus, Roman general, i. 97
 Theognostus, head of the Catechetical School, i. 119
 Theonas, i. 112, 172, 175, 200
 Theophanius, i. 492. ii. 19, 34
 Theophilus, i. 211, 212, 213, 215, 220, 223, 225, 226, 231, 243, 247, 253, 259, 264
 Thmuis, i. 170
 Thoas, official in Pentapolis, i. 252
 Tiberias, submits to Saladin, ii. 061
 Tiberius, Emperor, i. 9
 Tiberius II., Emperor, i. 334
 Timotheus, Archdeacon of Alexandria, i. 274
 Timothy (Salofaciolus), Melkite Patriarch, i. 306, 307, 308
 — I., Patriarch, i. 208, 210, 211
 — II. (Ælurus), Patriarch, i. 303, 304, 305, 306
 — III., Patriarch, i. 320, 321
 Timour, or Tamerlane, ii. 219, 222
 Tobia Ghali, ii. 367
 Toura, convent of, ii. 192, 229
 Touran, Shah, last free-born Sultan, ii. 153, 154, 161
 Tripoli, in Syria, ii. 177
 Tuman Bey, last Mameluke Sultan, ii. 11, 237, 238
 UNION, Act of, i. 354
 Urban VIII., Pope of Rome, ii. 272
 VALENS, Emperor, i. 188, 200, 203, 204
 Valentinian, Emperor, i. 39, 294
 — Gnostic, i. 39
 Vansleb, Dominican, ii. 279
 Vasah, or Paul, convert and martyr, ii. 14, 15, 16
 Ventriloquism, i. 5
 Vespasian, Emperor, i. 27, 28, 30, 33
 Victor, Metropolitan of Nubia, ii. 56
 — of Tabennesi, i. 279
 Vigilius, Pope of Rome, i. 329
 Vitellius, Emperor, i. 27
 Von Huga, Cardinal, ii. 253
 WADY HALFA, i. 6; ii. 367
 Wady Natron, see Nitria
 Wahabis, ii. 364, 365
 Walker, Captain, ii. 272
 Watson, Colonel, ii. 389
 Wedding customs, ii. 415
 Whately, Miss, ii. 403

448 THE STORY OF THE CHURCH OF EGYPT

William of Tyre, ii. 94

Wine, i. 5

Wissim, i. 405-407

XOIS, Bishop of, i. 477; ii. 67

YAZOURI, Wuzir to Mustanzir, ii. 67

Yemen, ii. 259, 260

Yezid, i. 385

ZA DENGHEL, Emperor of Abyssinia,
ii. 256

Zacharias, i. 411

— son of George of Nubia, i. 464, 467

Zacharias, King of Nubia, i. 442

— Patriarch, ii. 22, 23, 24, 34

Zachary of Tamiathus, i. 485

— of Wissim, i. 440

Zafir, ii. 81

Zahir, ii. 34, 38, 193

— Sheikh of Acre, ii. 321, 325, 327

Zehry, ii. 188, 189-191

Zeno, Emperor, i. 307

— Pagan physician, i. 178

Zenobia of Palmyra, i. 104

Zobeir Abdallah ebn, rival kaliph to Merwan I., i. 386

Zoilus, Melkite Patriarch, i. 326, 329

Zulfikar Bey, ii. 284, 305, 309

THE END.

Abu Daker	280	247.
Education	282	347.
Norden	310
Pocoune	310.
Risk	322
Russians	325
Jaest	353

for Franciscan convents - see Proctor - Description of the East. London MDCCXLIII.

- x Carlo 28. Mine pulled down. Under me further who is under me further also.
- Fairman 58
- A. M. M. 77.
- Georg 82.
- F. M. 84.

x another kind of paper sent to universities for Rome - These universities in Rome Egypt would be - prohibited by dependent in Egypt others belonging to universities (France) of paper in - France

